Unlike the Opposition's recipes, the Budget is a Budget for stability, growth and prosperity. It will drive down inflation, for which the Opposition have no policy, without harming production and exports. It will increase saving to fund more investment and it will ensure that the United Kingdom can meet the challenge of the coming decade.

4.50 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I now realise that when the previous Chancellor described 1990 as a year that would be dull, he meant not just that the economy would have a dull face but that the Budget would be dull and all the speeches about it from Ministers would be dull.

I am surprised that we did not hear from the Secretary of State this afternoon a statement about the amendment that has just been made to the Budget, especially as it refers to the policy that the right hon. Gentleman was prominent in introducing—the poll tax—the policy which he used to call the flagship policy.

On Tuesday, when making his announcement about the capital ceilings for poll tax rebates, the Chancellor refused on principle to provide those rebates to Scottish pensioners. On Wednesday, the Chief Secretary said that it could not be done in practice. Today we have the Cabinet in full retreat.

The Secretary of State for Scotland should have come to the House this afternoon to explain the change of policy, to explain why it took the Opposition to secure that change, to explain what will be done to pay for the £4 million and which parts of the Scottish budget will be cut to make way for that expenditure and to explain that it is not the moderation of the poll tax that is now necessary, but its complete elimination.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry did not say that, in the Budget speech, the Chancellor had to admit that inflation will be above 7 per cent. by Christmas, the highest in Europe; that manufacturing industry will stagnate this year, the worst performance in western Europe; that interest rates will remain high during the year, and they are the highest in western Europe; that the downturn is likely to be quite severe, as the Chancellor put it; and that business investment will fall by 1 per cent. The Chancellor also said that unemployment may rise over the year. None of that was mentioned today by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): The hon. Gentleman says that British industry will stagnate this year. Does he still stand by the Labour proposal to introduce a payroll tax of 0·5 per cent.—a tax on the payroll of every company in Britain—and, if so, what does he think that would do for the stagnation of British industry?

Mr. Brown: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would listen to what is being said. I said that the Chancellor reported that manufacturing industry will stagnate this year.

Mr. Hind: Answer my question.

Mr. Brown: I will answer the hon. Gentleman's question when he gets his facts right. The Chancellor said that manufacturing industry will stagnate this year—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order.

Mr. Brown: Our commitment to invest in training is well known and is expressed in our policy review. If the hon. Gentleman wants to read that, he can pick up a copy for £2·50 from the Labour party office.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful for that information. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the policy review proposals in relation to industry are still the policy of the Labour party?

Mr. Brown: Of course the policy review proposals on trade and industry are still this party's policies. The policy review was passed by the party's annual conference. I have been going round the country talking to representatives of business and industry and they have made it clear that they want the implementation of Labour's policies to deal with the problems of the economy—[Interruption.]

The hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) spoke about manufacturing output. It is interesting to note that at the last general election the hon. Gentleman said: "inflation to be further reduced"—

Mr. Hind: It was.

Mr. Brown: He said:

"interest rates falling . . . inflation, scourge of the poor and elderly, is under control."

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): The hon. Gentleman says that industry is waiting for the implementation of Labour's policies. Will he confirm that a payroll tax, as spelt out in Labour's policy review, would add £1 billion to industry's costs? Or does he intend to fudge what he is saying this afternoon as he did in "The Money Programme" on BBC television at the end of February?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been noting what has been happening throughout the country. Good firms are complaining about the performance of bad ones.

Mr. Tracey: Answer my question.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brown: I am answering. Firms are saying that it is totally wrong for companies that do not train to poach people from other firms. They want policies that will deal with the situation in which half the people in British industry are at present not receiving any in-work training. Indeed, 100,000 young people leaving school and entering work are not receiving any training either. That is why they need the statutory underpinning that Labour policies will provide.

We needed an investment Budget to deal with the problems of training in industry, a Budget that would pave the way for negotiations to enter the European monetary system, a Budget that would do something about the problems that industry now faces, with investment flat and falling away.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Since the Italian lira and the French franc entered the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS, those two currencies have been devalued against the mark by more than the pound. Will the hon. Gentleman explain how membership of the ERM would provide the stability of sterling which presumably he seeks?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to be part of this debate. He should realise that the pound in relation to the mark has moved from 3·20 to 2·60 and now stands at about 2·70. It is precisely for the achievement of stability that industry wants us to open negotiations to join the ERM. The hon. Gentleman knows that many of his hon. Friends support that policy but dare not speak up because of the policy being pursued by the Prime Minister.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): The Labour party does not seem to have grasped the point. Since the ERM was established, the Italian lira has devalued against the deutschmark six times and the French franc has devalued four times. The idea that joining the ERM by itself provides monetary stability is abolute nonsense.

Mr. Brown: France has 3 per cent. growth and 3 per cent. inflation and does not have the problems that we have as a result of the policies that have been pursued by Her Majesty's Government.

We needed a Budget that would deal with the problems of investment and training, that would begin the negotiations to enter the EMS, that would do something about the problems of investment, that reflected the new consensus in Britain that is led by the Labour party, but which the Government are unable to join. We have had instead a Budget containing a series of small measures—on small business debts, on the poll tax, on football and on nurseries—about which we have been pressing the Government for some time.

At the heart of the Budget is a yawning gap, a massive failure to address the central problems that the economy faces. What is left when we strip away from the Budget the measures that were pre-announced for the Budget of 1991, the measures that were re-announced from the Budgets of 1988 and 1989 and the measures that the Chancellor announced but which would have been better announced by the Secretary of State for the Environment, the Secretary of State for Wales and the Secretary of State for Scotland?

The Budget was dressed up to sound good on Tuesday, it drew scepticism on Wednesday, and today, Thursday, its hollow reality is being exposed. It contains nothing to bring interest rates down, nothing to raise investment this year and nothing to deal with our supply side problems.

What does the Secretary of State do in Budget week? What is his contribution? He goes to Cambridge—one of his few public engagements in the country. It was so important an engagement that it was worth the effort of an advance press release, a speech and, I gather, even a photo call. Did he go to Cambridge to open a factory, to encourage small businesses, visit a science park or talk about new technologies? No. The purpose of his visit to Cambridge was to launch his new insolvency service for British business. Is not it grimly symbolic that the most conspicuous event in his diary for this week was the opening of the insolvency service in its new status as an executive agency?

I have here a press release which says that the right hon. Gentleman launched the insolvency service as the Department of Trade and Industry's latest and biggest executive agency. This is what he said in Cambridge:

"In making the Insolvency Service one of the new Next Steps agencies, we recognise that the major part of its business is the execution of Government policy."

Perhaps there could be no better commentary on this week than that the Secretary of State heard the Budget on Tuesday and, on the following day, opened the new insolvency service.

We have the highest interest rates in Europe, the biggest trade gap, the worst inflation, the slowest growth and the lowest investment.

I come first to the Government's promise to create zero inflation. They have pushed up water charges by up to 20 per cent., electricity by 7 per cent., rents by up to 50 per cent., prescription charges by nearly 9 per cent.—affecting everyone. At the same time, inflation in Japan is just 3 per cent., in Germany less than 3 per cent., in France just over 3 per cent., and in America 5 per cent., while the average in the EEC is 5 per cent. Here it is 7·7 per cent. and rising.

It is not international economic factors, it is not the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, it is not the oil sheikhs, it is not international situations and commodity prices beyond our control, and it is not the unions, as the Secretary of State tried to say. There is no one to blame for the inflation that has risen after 10 years but the Government themselves, through mistakes made in Downing street and mistakes that will continue throughout this year and even in the next few weeks as public sector rises continue.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Would the hon. Gentleman care to tell us when a Labour Government last had inflation of 5 per cent. or below?

Mr. Brown: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that in the last full year of the Labour Government, 1978, inflation was at the European average and falling, even when massive oil problems throughout the world were affecting the economy. This year our inflation is well above the European average and the cause is problems created in the Treasury by Ministers themselves.

I come to interest rates. We hear business men throughout the country complaining about high interest rates and the impact they have on industry. Yesterday we heard the Engineering Employers Federation, the small businesses federation and various business federations throughout the country complaining about what the Government's Budget had not done. We heard the finance director of one of Britain's largest companies saying that interest rate policy is more applicable to a three-ball shop. How slowing down manufacturing industry is good for the country needs explaining.

What do the Government do? What is the Conservative party's policy? What do they say to these business men throughout the country about the impact of interest rate policy? I have here the Conservative party's own document, "The Economy: Questions and Answers". [Interruption.] Indeed, very useful and very interesting. We see on page 212:

"Don't higher interest rates increase the cost of borrowing thereby hitting industrial investment?"

[HON. MEMBERS: "Read the answer."] It goes on to say that, as the great majority of investment is funded from firms' own funds, the key to boosting investment is to create conditions to create profits. But, as the House knows, profits are not being sustained; businesses are having great problems. Then it says:

"British business is actually less exposed to high interest rates than it has been for a number of years."

[Interruption.] The Financial Secretary says, "That's right," but there has been a doubling of interest rates over the last 18 months.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has totally missed the point. Is he not aware that, as British industry is making record profits, far higher than it ever made under a Labour Government, it can finance a very high proportion of its investment without borrowing at all? That is the point which the hon. Gentleman failed to give when quoting from that document. He does not seem to understand it.

Mr. Brown: I do not know whether the Secretary of State is aware of what is happening throughout the country. Bankruptcies are rising by 19 per cent. in the construction trade, 20 per cent. in food and drink, 30 per cent. in the furniture trades, 40 per cent. in clothing and textiles and more than 50 per cent. in services, according to the latest survey. Yet he says that there is nothing to worry about. Bankruptcies have been rising in every region of the country and particularly in the south, and this is industry supposedly less exposed to high interest rates than ever before.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Clearly, the Secretary of State is not aware that the business sector is now in massive deficit.

Mr. Brown: I thought that the Secretary of State would know that business borrowing has had to increase from £10 billion to £23 billion and that there has been a 67 per cent. increase in interest payments. But now he tells us that industries are less exposed to high interest rates than ever before. It is no wonder that all the business federations in this country are appalled at the failure of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to act.

Our complaint is that these are problems not just of the last two years but of the last 10 years. Our argument is not just that interest rates, inflation and the trade gap are the worst in Europe. It is that a consumer boom without adequate investment in training and technology was bound to be unsustainable and to lead to the problems that we face. Without the necessary investment in our future, the problems with which the Secretary of State now has to cope will remain.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West) rose——

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way again; I have already given way many times.

When the problems of the economy are not just problems of demand but problems of capacity, not just problems of consumption, but problems of investment, and not just problems of the short term, but problems of the long term, a Budget that fails to address the shortage of capacity, the downturn in investment and the challenges of training and technology is the wrong Budget for Britain, based on the wrong analysis and pursuing the wrong policies.

If the problem was only demand and not capacity and investment, if it was only consumption, as the Chancellor wanted us to believe yesterday, why has industrial production been falling? Why has manufacturing output fallen for four months? Why has investment fallen in the last three months? Why, this year, will investment be flat in this country, indeed declining, for many sectors of the economy but will rise in every other country—by 5 per cent. in Germany and France, 4 per cent. in Italy and more in many other countries? Why are we producing less in many of the important sectors of our economy than we produced even in 1979? Metal goods, mechanical engineering, motor vehicles, drink and tobacco, textiles, man-made fibres—these are all sectors in which we are now producing less than we did in 1979. Is not it true that, industry by industry, sector by sector, we have abandoned products and processes, leaving the field to foreign competitors, and that the Government have done nothing about it?

Faced with the worst trading start that Britain has had in any year in its trading history the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry might have been expected to take the trade deficit seriously. Instead, he said that the trade deficit was good. Britain is now in deficit in high technology as well as in traditional industries; in deficit over the year with eastern as well as western Europe; in deficit in the last six months in invisible as well as visible goods. Yet this is barely worthy of a mention by the Secretary of State responsible for industry and trade in this country.

We used to be told not to worry about the manufacturing deficit because there was a large invisible surplus. That surplus has fallen from £9 billion in 1986, to £5 billion in 1988 and to just over £2 billion in 1989, and is predicted to fall to £1·5 billion in 1990. We have had a deficit in invisibles over the past six months of £700 million —a deficit not just in holidays and travel, but in aviation, shipping, services and consultancies. We have had a deterioration in City earnings and a deficit caused by the massive interest payments we are having to make for the hot money that must be brought into this country.

Ours is now an economy increasingly at the mercy of hot money flowing in from overseas. The trade figures published today, with the emphasis on the invisibles position and how it is deteriorating, show that this is not a "loadsamoney" economy benefiting the people of Britain: this is now the hot money economy of benefit to the speculators of the world. The problems on the invisible and visible side of our trading performance cannot be addressed by a Government who insist on cutting and cutting the industry budget and the training budget in the run-up to 1992.

Although we have all these problems—although we import 50 per cent. of our cars, 60 per cent. of our washing machines, 80 per cent. of our dishwashers and 90 per cent. of the most modern computer equipment; although we import massively, especially from the European Community countries—the only question that is asked of the Department of Trade and Industry is not what it will do, but what excuse it will give for doing nothing.

Dr. Hampson: I have much sympathy with the hon. Gentleman on his point about improving efficiency on the supply side, and especially with his point on training. However, does he recognise that there is a lead time in education and training of 10 to 15 years? Does the hon. Gentleman remember that the only Government since the war who cut the proportion of young people going into higher education were the Labour Government just over 10 years ago and that the only Government who cut the amount of money going into further education were the Labour Government? To deal with the unemployment of young people, the Labour Government had the youth opportunities programme, which created jobs counting lamp posts in Barnsley. That is the level of training with which they left this country, as the hon. Gentleman should know.

Mr. Brown: That is not the case, and it does not help to begin to solve the massive problems this country faces. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the problems are now urgent, why does not he persuade the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and for Employment to act on our present training difficulties and training shortages? The problem is that there are no lengths to which the Department of Trade and Industry is now not prepared to go to do nothing.

I make no apology for raising the matter of the Al-Fayeds. We know now from the accumulated evidence that they were guilty of proven and persistent misrepresentation. We know that they were found guilty by the inspectors of misinformation and deception, and that there were accusations of dishonesty. We know that the inspectors wanted them to be disqualified as directors and we know that, under section 8 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, at which the Secretary of State chose to look, provision is made for such disqualification. What did the Secretary of State do? Absolutely nothing. His Department is the do-nothing Department, where anything goes.

What had Ministers previously said about the importance of the disqualification of directors provisions in the legislation? The Secretary of State for Employment, when he was Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—the City Minister—said:

> "The Government confirms its determination to support the disqualification provisions as a major deterrent to unacceptable conduct by a minority of company directors."

The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry —the City and consumer Minister—who is now Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said:

> "The Act poses a real deterrent. It demonstrates our commitment to ensure that the public and shareholders are protected against the small minority of directors who are tempted to abuse their position."

He was explaining that the disqualification procedure was not only a punishment for those who erred, but a deterrent, to uphold the standards of the City.

Will the Secretary of State tell me what is left of the deterrent, when even proven wrongdoers go scot free without punishment? At what point is the public interest protected? Left with no possible means of acting to reinforce that deterrent, the Secretary of State does nothing. His is a do-nothing Department where anything goes. If it will not act where there is proven and persistent misrepresentation, in what circumstances will the Department act? How can the standards of the City be upheld by a Department that refuses to act when all the evidence is there?

What of the rest of the Department? There is the same do-nothing attitude where anything goes in the rest of the Department. The Secretary of State announced the abolition of the market sectors division a few weeks ago. It was set up only two years ago by his predecessor as a new initiative and as the interface between the Department's headquarters and industry. How is the abolition of that division represented in the press release? It says:

"The DTI given fresh focus . . . A more concentrated focus on long-term issues."

If the abolition of the market division is described as a new focus, will abandoning regional policy be presented as a breakthrough for the north, or will cutting export services be described as winning the trade war? The Secretary of State appears determined to walk away from his responsibilities for the regions, for new technology, for standards, for consumer protection and for city regulations—responsibilities that all other Governments accept as part of their duties. He is in the process of winding down the Department. It is a reworking of one of the best-known maxims in politics—"If you can't stand the heat, close down the kitchen."

I have just seen the Department of Trade and Industry advertisements, such as "Where are you?" and "Ou etes-vous?", and other advertisements in Spanish, French, Italian and German. At first I thought that "Where are you?" was the Secretary of State trying to get through to industry, but I now know that "Where are you?" was industry trying to get through to the Secretary of State. When we need a presence, there is a void. When industry needs an advocate, it does not even have an apology. Instead, we have a whole Department devoted to doing absolutely nothing.

I want to tell the Secretary of State what he should have said. When research and development, expenditure on the regions and incentives for investment are all behind what other countries can offer, when we spend a smaller proportion of our national income on those vital services, when market forces on their own have failed, when other countries with less to gain do more, but we with most to gain do least, and when even in America, the Government are considering an office of civilian research and a congressional report is demanding an industrial strategy, I urge the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in the interests of the trade and industry of Britain, to respond to the gap in research, in technology, in training and in investment. He should do so not by cutting the Department's budget further, as he plans to do, but by responding to the consensus that is developing throughout the country that we should invest for the long term, that we should tackle our supply side problems, that there should be a genuine partnership between Government and industry and that Britain works best when Britain works together.

The Budget does nothing for the vast majority of families whose child benefit has been frozen. The Budget does nothing for the vast majority of pensioners whose pension rise has already been wiped out.

The Budget does nothing for the vast majority of home owners who will have to live with high mortgage rates for many months. It does nothing for the crumbling and underfunded public services, because the Chancellor wants whatever Budget surplus he has left for tax cuts and not for public investment.

This Conservative Government do nothing for our industries and companies, which have looked to them and now feel betrayed again and again. The Budget offers nothing for the future. This is a Government not of economic miracles, but of missed opportunities, not of long-term resolution, but of short-term expedients. This Government have walked away from the central challenge of our industrial economy and the country will judge them harshly for it.

5.18 pm

Mr. Ian Stewart (Hertfordshire, North): We have just heard a remarkable speech from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). It was remarkable for its almost entire lack of serious content. The House and others will note that the only matter of substance that the hon. Gentleman vouchsafed about Labour party policy in this important Budget debate was that it was Labour policy to impose a tax on the payroll of British companies in the hope that that would in some way make them more efficient. The points that the hon. Gentleman tried to brush aside with a louder and more hectoring tone in response to inquiries from my hon. Friends about what the Labour party would do and about his understanding of the exchange rates, interest rates and inflation showed the emptiness of the Opposition's position on the Budget's central issue.

I want to deal with two matters arising from the Budget statement, which I thought was an extraordinarily skilful and successful presentation of the problems and the way in which the Government propose to tackle them. I was disappointed by the final remarks of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. As he approached his peroration, he said that he would tell us what needed to be done, but he then threw away the next half-dozen pages of his text. That demonstrated the nature of his approach to the problems.

The two points to which I want to refer have already been raised in this debate. The first relates to the exchange rate mechanism and membership of the European monetary system, and the second is about inflation.

I have listened to the debates and I believe that there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about the practical implications of what is involved in membership of the European monetary system. One of the arguments for early entry of sterling into the exchange rate mechanism is apparently that it would make life easier for industry. However, alongside that there is an assumption that somehow entry would provide a comfortable way out of high interest rates. I do not believe that that is possible. I want to explain why the practical reasons argue against an early entry of sterling into EMS, and why it is deceptive to suggest that entry is feasible under current circumstances.

The present exchange rate of the deutschmark, which is about 2·72 to the pound, is the current rate at which we can exchange pounds for deutschmarks today. However, let us consider what the exchange rate would be in this case. If we wanted to do a deal today to make an exchange transaction in 12 months' time, there would be a discount of about 15 pfennigs. That is a premium in favour of the deutschmark and a discount against sterling. The exchange rate would be not DM2·72, but about DM2·57.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

That is miles outside the band in which the currencies operate within the exchange rate mechanism. It is about 5 per cent. instead of 2·25 per cent., which is the normal band.

It would not be possible for the exchange rate mechanism to operate with sterling within it if the forward rates for six months out or a year out were not within the standard bands on which the mechanism is based. That is an overwhelming and decisive argument why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is correct to believe that we should not hasten to join the exchange rate mechanism until inflation and interest rates are lower. If we were to join now, interest rates would come down, but that would not assist the battle against inflation, as it would actually generate more expansionary economic and monetary conditions in this country, which would set off the inflationary spiral once again.

Those of my hon. Friends, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and others who feel attached—sometimes I believe for emotional reasons—to membership of the exchange rate mechanism are missing a central point. Until the mechanism was consistent with the proper conduct of monetary policy in this county and would contribute to the effective management of monetary conditions that would lead to a reduction in inflation, membership would be not only unwise but be positively counter-productive. It would be more difficult—if conditions eventually became suitable for our joining—for our entry to come about.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right to restate the Madrid conditions and to say that we need lower inflation and lower interest rates before such a major step can be taken. When the time comes and those conditions are fulfilled, that will be another matter. However, for the time being, it is misleading to suggest to industry that its problems can be solved by early entry into the mechanism.

Mr. Riddick: My right hon. Friend has suggested that there will still be a time for membership of the EMS, perhaps when inflation has come down. However, I have still not heard any convincing arguments in favour of joining the EMS. Why do we need to join even when the conditions are right?

Mr. Stewart: If the exchange rate for sterling could be kept more stable against European currencies, I concede that that would be an advantage. It remains an open question whether it will be consistent with the proper conduct of our domestic monetary and economic policy for sterling to belong to the exchange rate mechanism. However, I am willing to contemplate that possibility and it is only sensible to consider it seriously if the conditions laid down at Madrid are fulfilled. If we tried to enter too early, that would cause far more difficulties than we face now in organising suitable monetary conditions in the fight against inflation. It is deceptive to suggest that entry is possible now.

I should not consider it improper for sterling to join the exchange rate mechanism, if circumstances permit in due course, with a much wider band than the present 2·25 per cent., which applies to most of the currencies in the system. Over a considerable period, rather higher interest rates have been required in this country to keep the lid on inflationary pressures than in some other countries. No doubt in Germany that is because of the terrible experience of the inflationszeit a generation or two ago and the deep impact that that has had on the financial psychology of two or three generations of German citizens.

It is also partly due to the different structure of their financial institutions. We should have to see progress in removing artificial constraints to German institutions investing in British or foreign bonds as well as the dismantling of exchange controls by the countries that still have them. I have an open mind about the practicality of that in due course. However, I want to emphasise that it is not in the bounds of possibility for entry to happen in the immediate future and it is misleading for anyone to suggest that that is the case.

My second point relates to the inflation rate. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred in his Budget speech to retail price inflation, and there are references in the Red Book to retail prices index inflation. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have increasingly come to believe that the RPI is no longer a realistic basis for measuring the level of inflation. It should no longer be the key against which various benefits and other commitments are uprated.

Including mortgage interest rates in the RPI exaggerates the rate of inflation when interest rates are rising. It understates it when interest rates are falling. The RPI fluctuates far more violently than the underlying level of inflation. That has a practical as well as a psychological effect. When inflationary pressures develop, if the Government are wise—as this Government are—they will take corrective action by raising interest rates to tighten monetary conditions. However, that very act will add to the recorded figure for the retail prices index and will then appear to suggest that inflationary pressures are building up as a direct result of measures taken to cool down those inflationary pressures.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor also referred to the effect of more than 1 per cent. on the RPI, which will come through in the next month or two as a result of increased expenditure by local government through raising the community charge. I wonder whether it makes sense to include local government expenditure—financed locally—in the RPI, but not to include central Government expenditure funded by central taxation. After all, if an increase in the rates or community charge to fund extra local Government expenditure represents an increase in the retail prices index, all that the Government would have to do would be to give local authorities £10 billion or £20 billion and fund the whole of education, the police service or whatever. The retail prices increase would fall to zero and might even be negative. But everyone would know that the extra money was merely being collected by the central Exchequer instead of town halls. It would not represent an actual change in the economy.

The distortion in the way in which the RPI is constructed means that we have a figure of almost 8 per cent. inflation at present, whereas the underlying level is only 6 per cent. If we add on a percentage point or more for changes in local government expenditure and further increases caused by rises in mortgage interest rates, we simply create an entirely artificial yardstick by which to measure inflation. We encourage unrealistic wage claims and slow down the process of change in employers' and consumers' understanding of what the inflation level is. Therefore, we make our task of using monetary measures to get on top of inflation harder.

I tabled a question some time ago to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury about the implications of the construction of the RPI. He told me that most public service pension schemes and allowances such as the principal Civil Service scheme, the local government superannuation scheme, the police pension scheme, the retirement pension, widows' benefits, attendance allowance, the invalidity pension and so on are all uprated by reference to the RPI. The artificial distortions in the retail prices index mean that in some years those items are uprated by more than the underlying rate of inflation and in other years by far less.

I wish to suggest to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer through my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that we should take the opportunity over the next 12 months to plan to switch to a different index of inflation that does not include the interest cost of acquiring the capital assets of houses, which by no stretch of the imagination can be described as retail expenditure, and a more sensible approach to the treatment of local government expenditure. We need an index of inflation which is realistic, which enables monetary and economic policy to be conducted in a more sensible fashion, and which does not produce such misleading swings in the RPI upwards and downwards, which do not represent changes in the underlying level of inflation.

The reason why I ask my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to speak to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in good time is that during the next year or two there will be an excellent opportunity to make such a change. It should be made only at a time when those who receive upratings of pensions or allowances would do better as a result of the change than if we stuck with the RPI.

Just as the RPI goes up too far when interest rates rise, so it goes down too far when interest rates fall. When interest rates fall, the underlying inflation rate is higher than the retail prices index. The change could be made so that the beneficiaries of the various pensions and allowances upratings did better at the outset. Over time, it would even out and there would be no difference, but the adjustment would be more in line with the real level of inflation and not with a figure that is becoming increasingly artificial and unrepresentative of the rate of inflation.

During the coming months we shall have many debates about the inflation rate. Hon. Members will be referring not to the inflation rate but to the retail prices index, which is a misleading indicator. Over the next few months, I do not expect inflationary pressures to increase, but the RPI will increase. We can look forward to interest rates coming down in the next year or two. That will reduce the RPI artificially. We may see the same reaction to that in the media and the press as we see in headlines when inflation rises.

It is not healthy or sensible to conduct economic policy on the basis of an indicator that is so far removed from reality. The items that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer included in his Budget speech have drawn attention to the fact that the index can rise or fall by 7 per cent. as a result of factors that are not related to inflation.

As a footnote to what I consider a skilful and admirable Budget, on which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should be congratulated, I ask him to look further at the presentation of the inflation rate. Also, he should not hesitate to spell it out in discussions on the exchange rate that the Government do not have any political reason for being obstinate in not allowing sterling to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system, but that there are good practical reasons for not entering it and it would be against the interests of Britain to do so when conditions are not appropriate.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I shall try to be brief because many hon. Members wish to speak. I wish to highlight two areas of economic policy. First, as a Scot, I must mention again the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that the amount of savings that people could have before being disqualified from a community charge rebate was to be raised from £8,000 to £16,000. The manner in which the House heard today of the change announced by the Secretary of State for Scotland was also most unsatisfactory. He should have come here to make a statement from the Dispatch Box because we have applied pressures not only on the Chancellor but on the Scottish Office.

First, I must put the record straight. One newspaper from the popular press said that the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) was among the first to rise to his feet to protest that the increase in the amount of savings allowed would not be retrospective in Scotland. He was not among the first—he was the very first—and that is how it should have been reported. Those of us who know him well were somewhat surprised at the way in which he protested—it was completely out of character for him to interrupt the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in such a fashion—but such was his anger and so greatly was he incensed at the manner in which the announcement was made that hon. Members, at least on this side of the House, owe him a debt.

I used to enjoy the verbal swordsmanship between my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden and the Secretary of State for Scotland when both were on their mettle. It was something to see two trained advocates arguing the merits or demerits of legislation. It is extremely sad to see the demise of the Secretary of State for Scotland. He is not the man he was and he does not argue his case with the passion that he used to show. Clearly, his heart is not in the statements that he is forced to make. Sometimes he seems to be unaware of the statements prior to being handed them. Certainly he seems not to be well briefed on them. While the stature of my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State and others on the Opposition Front Bench grows daily, the Secretary of State for Scotland is sadly but a shadow of his former self.

Frankly, we in Scotland feel that, the sooner the right hon. and learned Gentleman packs up that job, the better for Scotland. I hope that he will read in Hansard what I have said about him in the Chamber. If I get the opportunity to do so in one of the Corridors, I shall tell him to his face, because that is how I think that people should hear such things. As the right hon. and learned

[Mr. William McKelvey]

Gentleman is not in the Chamber in person, however, and as I have not had time to change the address that I wish to give to the House, he may have to hear it this way.

Although there appears to have been a change of heart about the rebate which is supposed to be paid to people in Scotland, hon. Members should be aware that the subject is not closed just because a statement has been made. I remind the House that in October last year there were rumblings of discontent about the poll tax at the Conservative party conference. The rumblings then began to gather strength and out of the blue—perhaps one should say, "out of the true blue"—policy was change on the hoof. There then followed an announcement by the Secretary of State for Scotland that transitional payments would be made to those who had to lay out more than £3 extra per week. That was interesting and good news for those of us in Scotland trying to protect the poorer people in our society who could not afford to pay the poll tax.

Shortly after Christmas, I received a letter from the Secretary of State in response to a letter than I had sent to him asking when the scheme would be put into operation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the scheme was still being finalised. To this day, it appears that the scheme has not yet been finalised. Not one person in Scotland is in receipt of the transitional payment.

I do not know when the scheme will be finalised, but I know that many people with small resources are greatly in need of transitional payments and are subject to abject poverty because the Scottish Office is unable to finalise the legislation and bring the scheme into being. I can advise the Scottish Office that when the legislation is finalised it will be almost impossible to put it into operation through the computer for at least another year. I have received representations to that effect from Strathclyde regional council.

I therefore advise the House that any further policy which is made on the hoof to placate some of the forthcoming poll tax payers here in England may take years to come into operation. I hope that, by then, the poll tax will have disappeared from the statute book, because people will understand the difficulties of implementing such an obnoxious, unwanted and unwarranted form of taxation.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that many people are incensed because, although the Government announced that anybody paying more than £3 per week more in poll tax than in rates would receive a rebate, the rebate is to be based only on the notional poll tax, rather than on the real poll tax? The Government's explanations do not wash. People feel that they have been cheated—and, indeed, they have been cheated.

Mr. McKelvey: The hon. Gentleman makes a correct point. People are cheated not just once, but twice, if not thrice, because those provisions may never come to pass. If the Secretary of State is a man of honour, I trust that he will repair that anomaly before relinquishing his office, as I am sure that he will.

Having dealt with one pending resignation, I now press for another. I refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose treatment of the Scotch whisky industry is utterly unacceptable. I am sure that the anger of the Scots will be heightened even further when they hear of his sabotage of that industry. The deal that has been struck is incredible, as is the way in which the Chancellor has treated that industry.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there has been a fall of 30 per cent. in the real value of the duty on spirits, including whisky, in the past 10 years? The Scotch whisky industry has fared extremely well under the Government.

Mr. McKelvey: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will accept that, of the £8, the price at which a bottle of whisky retails in the shops, £6 is tax. That is a whacking great tax. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will also understand that, as we move towards 1992, when we hope that there will be an equalisation of measures such as the taxation and excise duty on spirits, we are not doing any favours to the Scotch whisky industry.

Incidentally, Scotch whisky is produced almost entirely from products which are themselves produced in Scotland. Apart from the cork in the bottle, everything else—including the bottle, the label and the contents—is produced in Scotland. The £1·5 billion that the Scotch whisky industry earns for this country in exports is therefore the true figure. It is not like the export of cars, for instance, half of which are produced from imported parts. The Chancellor should recognise the value of that true figure of £1·5 billion.

I notice from the press that the Revenue currently gives £350 million to the Treasury and that it is expecting a further £20 million as a result of the 10 per cent. rise in duty. I do not understand the way in which the Treasury works—the figures mystify me. From simple mathematics, I should have thought that 10 per cent. of £350 million worked out at roughly £31·5 million, so where is the missing £11·5 million? I can only assume that the Treasury is including in its calculations the assumption that, because the price is increased, customer resistance will also increase, which will reduce sales in the home market so that the Treasury takes less in tax.

The Scotch whisky industry is extremely important to the economy of Scotland. More than 8,000 people are directly employed in that industry. There is more than the possibility of a threat—there is a real threat—to some of the jobs of those workers, especially in the bottling sheds. The Government and Conservative Members cannot simply pass off what has happened as an increase which should have been made years ago and say that the relative value is the same as 10 years ago. All hon. Members should recognise that a tax of £6 on a £8 item is a colossal tax.

My main complaint about the Chancellor's activities in relation to duty relates to the increase of just 7p on a bottle of wine. Up in Banchory, workers at the distillery cannot understand why the Chancellor has imposed an additional tax on whisky. Those workers will not be dancing in the streets, although people will certainly be dancing in the streets of Bordeaux when they read what the Chancellor has done in relation to wine, which will be imported in ever-increasing quantities.

Kilmarnock in my constituency is the home of Johnnie Walker whisky. People in the bottling sheds there will be scratching their heads and asking, "Why on earth is the Chancellor increasing the revenue difference between spirits and wines?" I hope that that will be equalised in 1992. The workers in Kilmarnock may be wondering what it is all about, but at this very minute the workers in Koblenz are probably not just naming a holiday after the Chancellor but naming a whole festive season in his honour because of the way in which his Budget will increase imports of their wine.

What the Chancellor has done is absolutely inconveivable. I ask the Government to remember the value of the Scotch whisky industry, the number of people that it employs in this country and the prestige that Scotch whisky enjoys. All of that has been threatened by a Chancellor who has been so ill advised that he does not even begin to understand the difficulties facing the Scotch whisky industry at the moment. It is inconceivable that this should happen at a time when, through the efforts of the Scotch whisky industry—with, I grant, some assistance from the Government—Scotch whisky is managing to penetrate the Japanese market when for years we could not break down the Japanese tariff barriers.

With some help, we have also managed to persuade the South Korean president to remove his country's barriers so that our whisky can penetrate the South Korean market. We now have an opportunity to penetrate the Taiwan market. That increase in exports is extremely welcome and is bringing more and more money into this country as we try to balance our trade deficiencies. Yet the Chancellor kicks the Scotch whicky industry in the teeth by imposing a whacking great increase of 10 per cent. in excise duty.

Like other hon. Members, I must ask, why 10 per cent.? If inflation is running at 7·5, 7·9 or even 8 per cent., why choose 10 per cent.? The answer came when the Chancellor himself said that inflation would go up before it goes down. He has probably chosen the figure of 10 per cent. because he thinks that inflation will increase to 10 per cent. shortly. The Government must then explain why their policies have produced a 10 per cent. inflation rate, which is greater than the figure that they inherited in 1979.

The Government's policies are not working—the House knows it, the voters in Mid-Staffordshire know it and people throughout the country know it. At the next election, which for me cannot come too soon, their voices will be heard. In the meantime, it would benefit the country if not only the Chancellor but the whole Cabinet resigned. I was about to suggest that the Prime Minister should also resign, but I do not actually want that—I want her to stay where she is, because she is our best guarantee that Labour will win the next general election.

5.50 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I apologise to the House for the fact that I cannot remain for the reply to the debate as I am still recovering from a back problem. I am delighted to follow my fellow Scot, the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey). Even though I am a Scot sitting for a Welsh seat, I am well aware of the importance of the Scotch whisky industry. However, methinks he doth protest too much. There is no doubt that the industry has fared very well under this Government. Indeed, during the past 10 years the Treasury has been too susceptible to the industry's persuasive powers.

As I shall explain later, there is a strong argument for a greater over-indexing of spirits than that introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on Tuesday. I am sorry to note that that makes the hon. Gentleman gasp. It appears that the whole of the population of Kilmarnock is employed in the Scotch whisky industry, something of which I was not aware.

The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I am being objective, because Wales also produces whisky. As a Scot, I must tell my fellow Scots on the Benches opposite that they have protested too much about the whole question of the community charge and the change in the capital rule. I am glad to note that my near parliamentary neighbour, the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench. Being a wise man, he has kept a respectable silence during the past 48 hours—as, indeed, have all Welsh Members.

We are aware that the community charge in Wales covers only 15 per cent. of local authority revenue. We do not shout that loudly in the House, especially when so many English Members are present. In Scotland, the community charge covers 18 per cent. of local authority revenue and in England it covers 23 or 24 per cent. That is substantially more. The Scots and the Welsh have done extremely well.

I do not deny that there are good reasons for that, but Scottish Labour Members should be careful. If they ask for Budget favours, everthing will be open to examination and analysis. Difficult questions might be put to Scottish Ministers about the very favourable budgetary circumstances and public spending for Scotland. Similar difficult questions are occasionally raised with Ministers during Welsh questions, even though we try to keep out English Members, especially when good news is about to be announced.

I join in the congratulations extended to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, which came even from the Leader of the Opposition, who was generous and fair. My right hon. Friend's first Budget was an "excellent maiden sortie". The vast majority of Conservative Members thought that it was excellent not only in style but in substance—notwithstanding the short-term reaction from the City. The late Iain Macleod once said that the reputation of a Budget that faced immediate adverse reaction invariably fared better six months later, whereas one that found favour seldom looked so good with hindsight.

In the Budget statement, my right hon. Friend rightly emphasised the high level of business confidence and the underlying strength of the economy. He mentioned the 1,500 new businesses created every week, the rising level of employment and investment and the growth in exports. That strength is evident in my constituency and, indeed, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Wrexham. I am sure that he would agree with that. Our constituencies, together with the constituency of Alyn and Deeside, which is wedged in between, have led the economy in north-east Wales, and in Wales as a whole, out of recession.

There have been substantial reductions in the unemployment rates—52 per cent. cut in my constituency during the past two years. The new jobs created in my constituency have been predominantly male, predominantly full-time and predominantly in manufacturing. Formerly, our jobs were concentrated in just two industries—textiles and steel. Now there is a far more diversified industrial base, resulting in a much stronger local economy which is much more capable of withstanding periods of economic adversity.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his good fortune in his constituency, but in mine many of the new jobs are predominantly female. There is nothing wrong in that, but they are low-paid and, in the main, part-time.

Mr. Raffan: The old cry from the Opposition is that the new jobs are low-paid. Unemployment has been high in our constituencies. Indeed, four years ago male unemployment stood at 42 per cent. in two of my towns. If we can dramatically reduce the unemployment levels even further, wage levels will automatically rise as demand for labour exceeds supply. That is what will happen, and there is evidence of that already in our constituencies and throughout north-east Wales. We must question whether the Opposition are in favour of jobs, albeit relatively low-paid, or whether they would rather not have any jobs. Are they advocating unemployment?

The hon. Member for Wrexham should be more generous about the Government. We on this side are fond of the hon. Gentleman, and the Government have introduced a great deal of industry to his constituency. He knows that he has done extremely well, especially with the Japanese. His constituency is one of the focal points of Japanese inward investment. We have 70 per cent. of Japanese United Kingdom investment in Wales, a great deal of it in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. He prefers to keep quiet about that. The reason why Wales is attracting so much inward investment, especially from the Japanese—who are known to be rather discriminating—is that they believe in the underlying strength of our economy. The hon. Gentleman and his constituents are benefiting from that.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, all the evidence from high street sales, the housing market and imports shows that demand is slowing, but it is not yet slowing quickly enough to curb inflation. In a flexible economy, the slowing of demand should contribute to a reduction in inflation by keeping wages in check. However, it is clear that wage levels are not yet responding to weaker demand. Action is needed to slow the economy further, to take away the demand granted by wage increases and to keep a tight lid on the growth in real disposable incomes. Taxation is obviously an instrument for doing that.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend did not fulfil media predictions that he would not fully index personal tax allowances. That would have hit the better-off, but it would have borne especially hard on those with low incomes as they would have been drawn up, through inflation, into the tax net.

On the question of indirect taxation—this will no doubt cause another gasp and sigh from the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun—some have argued for a standstill in excise duties to keep down the recorded rate of inflation. But there is a strong case for over-indexing cigarettes and alcohol, in particular, more than proposed in the Budget. There is no surer way to deflate demand. Of course, the higher recorded rates of inflation that will occur in the summer as a result—the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun was right about that—will help my right hon. Friend, albeit indirectly, to maintain the high interest rates squeeze.

Over-indexation this year will allow under-indexation next year and so bring a sharp fall in the published inflation rate. That is the reverse of what usually happens——

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Hear, hear.

Mr. Raffan: Perhaps my hon. Friend says that because of experience in his previous incarnation when there were standstills in excise duties. When a Chancellor begins to index again and to increase taxes in line with inflation, having not done so for two years, he will produce a marked inflationary bulge. We do not want that to happen again.

There has been a drop of one third in the real value of duty on spirits during the 10 years of this Government. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have raised duties even more on spirits and alcohol. There are good health reasons for doing so. Sooner or later we shall have to resolve the conflict between the Treasury's eagerness for revenue from the sale of alcohol and cigarettes and their consequent reluctance to impose penal taxation on either, and the massive National Health Service bill that we have to pick up as a result of smoking and alcohol abuse. Sooner or later, the Government must face that conflict.

I strongly support the various measures brought in to encourage savings, such as the abolition of the composite rate tax and the introduction of TESSA. They will help "the culture of thrift", to use one of the memorable sound bites of the Budget, to replace the current epidemic of overborrowing. However, I strongly agree that interest rates must remain the main and most flexible weapon against inflation because they both discourage personal borrowing and reward personal savings.

Like all hon. Members, I want interest rates to come down as soon as possible, but I want them to do so without dramatically reducing the exchange rate, because that not only increases the cost of imports but weakens British producers' resolve not to give in to inflationary wage claims. We do not want to trigger a wage spiral. That is what poses the greatest danger to the economy at present.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said that inflation had proved far more stubborn than anybody had expected. He said, rightly, that the largest factor in that was the increase in local authority spending. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Wrexham is winding up the debate for the Opposition.

Mr. Raffan: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman is nodding. I shall read his speech with great care. I am only sorry that I shall not be here. I am sure that he will want to respond to this point. The Labour-controlled county council in Clwyd, covering my constituency and that of the hon. Gentleman, is greatly increasing projected spending. The hon. Gentleman may well look down at the floor of the Chamber, because the council is increasing spending by £28·5 million or 18 per cent. That is unjustifiable and inexcusable.

Is that a foretaste of what the Labour party would do at national level should the nightmare occur and it got into government? There are so many questions on their policies that the Opposition have left unanswered. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry rightly said, how would a Labour Government effectively control inflation? How much would they add to public spending? I see that the shadow Chief Secretary is present. We read some interesting quotes from her in the press, particularly when she is cornered in television interviews. It is more difficult to corner her effectively here; she is not subjected to repeated questioning here. She always gives vague answers to questions about spending plans and how far the Opposition would raise taxation to pay for those plans.

Any Opposition attacks on Government economic policy will be blunted and rendered ineffective by their inability and reluctance to answer such questions, and their evasiveness and ambiguity when forced to do so. As the months go by and we draw closer to a general election, that will become increasingly apparent.

The trouble with the Labour party is that it is far more concerned to tell us how it would distribute wealth than how it would create it in the first place. We suffered some bad experiences, albeit 10 years ago. Ten years is not a lifetime: it is only a generation ago. We will remind those who have had the good fortune not to live under a Labour Government in this country exactly what happened under the last Labour Government. They promised the earth. They told us how they would distribute wealth, but they could not create it. Ultimately they had to go begging to the International Monetary Fund for the largest loan which that organisation has ever given to any country, banana republics included.

The Labour party has failed to advance a credible policy on interest rates, exchange rates, inflation and spending or to answer the questions, about its spending plans. It promises so much to so many but few believe it can deliver. That is what ultimately undermines its credibility. That is why it will not win the country's confidence at the next general election.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I am pleased to make my contribution today—definitely for the last time as the newest Member and almost definitely, I hope, for the last time as the newest woman Member. I shall be brief, taking note of what the Father of the House told me when I first came to the House—that it is better to be brief than to be boring.

I shall mention a couple of issues in the Budget about which I feel particularly strongly and which I believe should be brought to the attention of the House. There has been much talk about this being a Budget for savers and for women. I shall concentrate on why the vast majority of women have not gained from the Budget. Many women, particularly the low-paid, have lost as a result of Government policies over the past 10 years.

The Budget has done absolutely nothing to help women home owners, who are still saddled with high mortgage interest payments—as well as having to pay the poll tax. It has also done nothing for the low-paid, two thirds of whom are women, or for mothers, particularly those whose child benefit has been frozen since 1987.

There has been just one move forward for women and we all welcome it—the change for women whose children are in workplace nurseries. The Chancellor of the Exchequer finally gave in to pressure from the Labour party and from women throughout the country to go back on a previous Conservative measure. We should not forget that the tax was introduced in 1985 by a Conservative Government. Now they have turned around and flown in the face of what the Chancellor himself said when he was Chief Secretary to the Treasury. Last year he said that the Government would not change that tax, and that its removal would have little effect on creating conditions to enable mothers who wished to work to have access to affordable means of child care.

We welcome that change, but it will affect very few women. Only 3 per cent. of employers' organisations provide workplace nurseries. Not one new child care place will be created by that move. The women who have benefited from workplace nurseries since 1985 have, to date, paid an average of £4,500 in tax as a result. That money will not be refundable. The Budget does nothing for the millions of women who have to make difficult decisions about where and how they will work, whether they can afford to go back to work and how their children will be looked after.

As recently as 26 October, in answer to a question during Prime Minister's Question Time about whether the tax on workplace nurseries would be abolished, the Prime Minister replied categorically:

> "No. Workplace nurseries are treated just as other extra facilities are—as benefits in kind for those earning over a certain salary. It would be quite wrong if those who have nurseries available at work were not to regard that as a benefit in kind while other people who had to make their own arrangements had to pay out of net taxed income."—[Official Report, 26 October 1989; Vol. 158 c. 1041.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has changed that policy, so presumably the Prime Minister has changed her mind—if not, according to the logic of her argument, she will have to come forward with measures to allow all women tax relief on child care. I hope that the Chancellor will bear that in mind.

The second issue that I wish to mention relates to the reduction in tax on football pools and the way in which that money is to go back into football. That is very welcome, and something that Labour and the football industry have been recommending for some time. At last we have a Chancellor who takes a little more interest in sport even than the Minister for Sport. It is very important that that money should be spent correctly, and I am very pleased that it will go to the Football Trust—a body set up by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), who was a member of the then Labour Government. The trust has shown that it can spend money wisely, and the Chancellor's decision was an admission that football has been starved of the funds needed if grounds are to be made safe. The Government have been pushed by the Taylor report into taking that action and of course we welcome it. We need to move towards the provision of all-seater stadiums.

The money provided will help to improve ground safety, but we must not forget other aspects of the game. For instance, it is crucial that entrances to grounds and particularly the number and type of turnstiles should be taken into consideration.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Because of my hon. Friend's expertise in football, I am listening with great interest to her remarks. Does she agree that other sports will also need assistance? I am thinking particularly of cricket and rugby league, which face the same problems.

Miss Hoey: It was my intention to deal with that very point and my hon. Friend's question reinforces that intention.

If it is necessary to provide seating in order to save lives, can we afford to wait so long for action by individual clubs? The estimated total cost of making all football grounds safe is up to £200 million. Surely all works should begin simultaneously. The money could be made available to the football clubs and paid back over a period from the money generated from the extra pools revenue. Where safety is involved, it is not good enough to carry out work gradually—all schemes should be undertaken immediately. Financial arrangements such as I have described could be made.

The Taylor report has had a knock-on effect on sport in general. I am thinking, for instance, of cricket, rugby league and rugby union. Clubs involved in all those sports will have to spend very large amounts of money on their grounds. Where will that money come from? In the case of designated cricket grounds, a huge amount of work will be needed. In the case of cricket grounds, such as the Oval in my constituency, clubs will have to spend at least £1 million in the very short term to satisfy the requirements of the Taylor report.

Sport generates an enormous amount of income for the Government. It is time for the Government to step in and find ways to provide the necessary finance. That is what happens in other countries when safety considerations are involved. The Chancellor gets up to £1 million per year in VAT on the sale of tickets at cricket grounds. That money could immediately be returned to cricket clubs to enable them to bring their grounds up to proper safety standards. I hope that the present Chancellor, who is interested in sport, will take my suggestion on board.

Very few people in my contituency will have been celebrating on the streets following the Budget. The greatest need in my area, just the other side of the river, is for housing, but the Budget contains not one suggestion, not one mention, not one proposal, to alleviate the housing problems in my borough and does nothing for the 15,000 people on the housing waiting lists there. It does nothing to help the many hundreds of families in the borough who are in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. It also does nothing to help people—particularly young people—wishing to move out of the family home, to get married and to set up family life in an independent situation. The Chancellor, in his Budget, seems to have forgotten that this country faces a housing crisis.

As I have said, the Budget does nothing to bring more women back into work, although there are the first signs of recognition that women are needed in the work force and that women want to work. In my constituency, however, many young single parents are sitting in their flats all day because they cannot afford the cost of child care. In those circumstances, it is nonsense for a single parent to go out looking for a job, especially one of the low-paid jobs available in my area. Having taken the first step in respect of workplace nurseries, the Prime Minister must stand by what she said in the House in October.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the Budget as a prudent and responsible package of measures—notably the encouragement to savings in the form of the TESSA scheme and the abolition of the composite rate tax. I am particularly pleased that the Chancellor has introduced measures to encourage still further the process of wealth creation and dispersion. As an honorary director of Job Ownership Ltd., I am delighted with the small but important change in the treatment of capital gains tax—the roll-over relief for ESOPs, the employee share ownership plans. Wider share ownership is an excellent move in the right direction.

The Budget will be seen as having adopted the appropriate fiscal stance for the current stage of the economic cycle. The Chancellor was absolutely right to place himself slightly on the tough side of neutral at a time when the relevant statistics still point in contradictory directions. In macro-economics and in politics it is always a good rule that, if one is not absolutely sure about the side on which one should lean, it is best to remain upright and to maintain broadly the existing policy stance.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) was absolutely right when, in his excellent speech, he said that Labour's policy alternative, so far as one can divine it from the party's policy review and elsewhere, is either vacuous or, in some cases, outright dishonest. As The Independent put it in a recent editorial, Labour policy is really a combination of dating from the 1960s and the 1970s—

"and vindictively higher taxation."

The British public have already begun to see through that particular aspect of Labour's policy. According to a poll conducted recently for the BBC, the results of which were published in The Independent, nearly twice as many people still think that the economy would be weaker, and prices would rise faster, under Labour than under the Conservatives. More than twice as many people believe that, for the average family, taxes would be higher. These are potent public anxieties that reflect the common sense of the British electorate.

Looking to the future, and regarding this excellent Budget as the first in a series of what I hope will be winning Budgets from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I hope that the Government will work towards two further institutional changes, which together would give them an even better chance not just of reducing but actually of eliminating altogether the scourge of inflation.

Let me digress for a moment. I heard the compelling speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart). I should like to place on record my strong agreement with his view on the RPI and the distortions that it can reflect. I hope that, when we come to a quieter period of lower inflation, it will be possible for the Government and the RPI Advisory Committee to look again at this matter. My right hon. Friend's arguments were very persuasive.

In relation to institutional changes, my first and foremost point relates to the statutory position of the Bank of England. I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), for whom I was proud to work for two and a half years at the Treasury, that a new basis of statutory accountability to Parliament for the Bank of England would be in the national interest and in the interests of the British people. There are several reasons why I say that, but there are three principal reasons why the change would be beneficial which are worth putting on record.

The first reason is that it would give undoubted added market credibility to the use of monetary policy as the principal anti-inflationary instrument of the Government and any other responsible Administration. Furthermore, it would assist the Bank of England, as the relevant body, in the administration of monetary policy. It would be the equivalent of good corporate management in a company where a division, or a part of the company, is given clear responsibility for an overriding task—in this instance, the elimination of inflation—and is allowed to get on with the job, with the requirement only that it should report back and be accountable. In this instance, I suggest that the Bank of England should be accountable to Parliament rather than to Ministers.

The second reason why the idea is so attractive is that it would help to entrench a thoroughly non-inflationary approach to monetary policy within our political system. It would thereby help greatly to safeguard what Mr. Enoch Powell used to describe, rightly, as honest money against the temptations of the political cycle.

The third reason—it is probably the least important of the three—is that it would equip us with an institutional framework which would be usefully compatible with the framework that operates already in the countries of our European Community partners, with which, no doubt, we shall be co-operating even more closely in the years ahead within an embryonic system of European central banks.

I do not believe that at this stage in the economic development of the Community we should hasten too precipitately in the direction of a single central bank. Nor do I believe that it is necessary for the co-ordination of fiscal policy to be a vital accompaniment of the co-ordination of monetary policy. If we start from the angle of monetary policy, I think that we shall find that some virtuous consequences in fiscal policy flow automatically in market terms from that.

I say to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs, who I know is listening carefully to the debate, that the statutory accountability of our central bank would be an important buttress to the success of our counter-inflationary policy over the next few years. I hope that it will receive careful attention.

The other institutional change that I would urge upon my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he comes to consider these matters again at the appropriate time is something which I regret has become something of a King Charles's head, although it is none the less important for that. I refer to entry at the appropriate time into the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North has already spoken about the matter and arrived at a different conclusion from the one at which I shall arrive.

It seems from the evidence that I have seen, from the French and Italian experience in particular—in many ways, they started with a more difficult inflationary situation than our own—that, after an initial period of undoubted interest rate volatility, we would see the interest rate premium that we have to pay of 6 or 7 per cent. vis-a-vis West Germany diminish over time to the point where we would not have to pay it at all. We would find that in consequence the financial markets would have greater confidence in the rigour and discipline of our monetary policy. Ultimately, that would greatly reduce the exchange rate fluctuations. That would be a valuable development.

Any senior industrialist or person in financial services will say that, of all the various non-tariff barriers which British industry and commerce are facing, none is more significant than exchange rate fluctuations and volatility. There is no doubt that the nations that have been within the ERM over the past few years and have managed to pursue the necessary monetary discipline to buttress the exchange rate mechanism have found considerable benefit for themselves and their export sector from being within the mechanism. I have no doubt that it would be one of the best ways in which we could take full advantage of the single European market.

Now that most of the external conditions that were set by the Government at Madrid for our full participation in the ERM have been met, I trust that it is only a matter of economic and political judgment before my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer decides that the time is ripe to take Britain into the mechanism.

With the firm foundation of this sensible Budget and the prospect of the institutional changes which I have recommended, we shall defeat inflation, promote the revival of our economy from the present temporarily difficult phase and bring about still further improvements in the prosperity and living standards of the British people.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): With inflation due to rise to nearly 10 per cent. in the next few months, with a rate of economic growth down to a miserable 1 per cent. for the year and a forecast balance of payments deficit of £15 billion—the Government are usually optimistic in such forecasts—in earlier times our economic condition would have been characterised as stagflation, the constant problem of the vilified economic management of the 1960s and 1970s. The Government seem to be trying to give the impression that we face merely a temporary pause in our economic miracle, but we have only to read the forecasts in the Red Book to appreciate that the condition is far more serious than that.

The major indicators show that we are in a worse position than that which we faced at the beginning of the great economic experiment a decade ago. The need for a neutral Budget is clear enough when we are about to face the deflationary effect of poll tax—equivalent to 2p on the standard rate of income tax—as well as an unprecedented rise in council rents of 50 per cent. to 60 per cent. in some areas—and high interest rates. It is clear why the Chancellor of the Exchequer felt unable to take more purchasing power out of the economy.

The growth rate of 1 per cent. includes a significant increase in North sea oil output. That means that non-domestic oil output will increase by an amount so small as to be virtually unmeasurable, and certainly not a reliable figure. It must be a long time since the growth in manufacturing output was forecast as nil for the coming year. In anyone else's language, that means that we are heading for a recession, if not already in it.

A significant increase in unemployment is inevitable regardless of the behaviour of wage bargainers, but there is no forecast in the Red Book or in any of the statements by Ministers of the level to which unemployment is expected to rise. The idea that inflation will fall from well over 9 per cent.—probably nearer 10 per cent.—in the spring to 7 per cent. in the autumn is hard to believe, let alone the notion that it will decrease to 5 per cent. next year. Of course, the Government always forecast that it will fall to 3 per cent. in the year after next, but we never manage to achieve that.

The support that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given to guidelines or a code of practice for credit lending institutions is unlikely to have much effect. It is false to argue that credit controls cannot work in a deregulated financial system. Most non-housing lending is undertaken by banks and building societies which are licensed. A Bundesbank research paper issued this week states:

"Reserve requirements help control liquidity in the money markets as well as automatically acting as a brake on the creation of money."

One of the advisers to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee put the case for direct credit controls clearly when he said:

"Whichever of the monetary policies the Chancellor might choose, his task in making it work would be easier were a minimum reserve asset system restored. The ability to limit money growth with lower interest rates than are at present required would also have a longer-term beneficial effect on inflation by reducing the extent to which capital investment plans are aborted. Indeed the Bank of England can still call for special deposits, and it might be advisable for it to do so."

On other key indicators, fixed investment is likely to fall by 1·25 per cent. this year compared with an increase of 1·25 per cent. forecast as recently as last November. Manufacturing output, which will show no growth in 1990, will enjoy a recovery to only 0·75 per cent. in 1991—far below the rate of growth in other European economies and far below the rate of growth in East European economies, let alone those of our direct competitors. It is very hard to see how such a level of recession will prepare us for the increase in competition in 1992.

British industry will continue to be under-invested, under-trained and inadequately supported by research and development in the next two years, and as far ahead as we can see. The Budget did nothing to meet those inadequacies in British industry which mark us out from our competitors—inadequate investment in new plant and machinery, in training, in research and innovation and in energy conservation. Those should be central concerns for the future.

It is hard to see the tax relief for company contributions to training and enterprise councils as anything more than a gesture. No wonder the proposal has had a lukewarm response from business. It is Government's job to promote and fully fund training for industry—it is not for industry to make donations to training institutions. In any case, funding for the training and enterprise councils has been reduced, despite loud complaints from industry.

Nor has there been a warm response to the ending of tax on workplace nurseries. There are only 3,000 places in workplace nurseries, mostly in hospitals, health authorities and local authorities. Working mothers need a network of nurseries provided by local authorities, or there should be a levy on employers to provide for public child care. In this country, 40 per cent. of three to five-year-olds attend nurseries compared with 95 per cent. in France. Working mothers will gain very little from the Chancellor's proposals.

In this context, it is also right to mention child benefit, which after all partly replaced the tax allowance. It is a scandal that child benefit continues to be frozen, as there is no more effective device for the relief of family poverty.

I welcome the differential tax on unleaded petrol, but I believe that much more could be done to limit environmental pollution by way of taxation or tax relief. A whole range of innovations is taking place throughout Europe using taxation or tax relief to promote environmental protection. In Sweden, there are taxes on sulphur emissions and there will be a tax on carbon dioxide and nitrous oxide emissions, in Norway a tax on emission of CFCs, and in Finland a tax on phosphate fertilisers. In West Germany, motor taxation is being switched from engine size to classification by exhaust emission and noise, and in Italy there are taxes on sulphur dioxide, plastic products and herbicides.

All those means could be used to set the tone for environmental protection, to show that the Government intend to discourage the use of pollutants. A variety of tax penalties and incentives could be used to give signals to industry about the need to reduce pollution or to invest in environmental equipment or energy conservation. The Budget could have provided an opportunity to set the direction for a programme of inducements to reduce pollution, but in that regard, as in most others, the Budget misses the opportunity. It could have addressed the long-term needs of the economy for productive and environmental investment, but in fact it is little more than window dressing by a Chancellor left no room for manoeuvre by his predecessor.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I greatly welcome the Budget. It is doing what the economy requires at present. In particular, I regard the strong commitment expressed by the Chancellor to bear down on inflation and to continue the fight against it as one of the most important aspects of the Budget. Its fiscal stance is about right: fiscal tightness in the economy is at about the right level, just as monetary tightness is at about the right level.

In particular, interest rates are probably about as high as they need to go, because one runs into a law of diminishing returns fairly soon: the higher interest rates go, the less effective they become. This is partly because of the political effects of interest rates, which need not be spelled out, given that we are a nation of home owners, but also partly because of the economic effects of high interest rates on wage rises and so forth. If, however, we accept that interest rates are as high as they need to go, we must also accept a degree of volatility and of uncertainty in the exchange rate which might be difficult to tolerate but which ought to be tolerated until such time as the interest rates have done their work and inflation starts to come down.

The other side of this—also addressed in the Budget and also very welcome—is an emphasis on increasing savings and enabling people to transfer their money into the savings sector. The abolition of composite rate tax is one of the most exciting innovations in the Budget and one which will do a great deal of good, particularly for small savers and especially for the elderly and for young people who, on the whole, will not be taxpayers. It will boost savings and be of considerable benefit to the economy as a whole. Nevertheless, we must wait for the economic medicine to work, and we must try not to get upset about the economic problems that we undoubtedly face in the short term.

It is often said that there are no alternatives to high interest rates, but this is incorrect. There are many alternatives to high interest rates. The great problem is that, on the whole, they do not work. The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) spoke about credit controls. Such remarks are often made about the beneficial aspects of credit controls—the trouble is that they often come from theoretical economists rather than from people who have practical experience of how our banking system currently operates. It is not hard to see how many banks and financial institutions could get round any credit controls that Government imposed.

Mr. John Garrett: I was quoting from a paper by the Bundesbank on the effectiveness of reserve asset ratios and other forms of control. West Germany happens to enjoy an inflation rate of 3 per cent. at the moment, so the West Germans may know quite a lot about the usefulness of such instruments.

Mr. Carrington: The hon. Member anticipates me slightly—I was going to come on to reserve deposits in a moment. The Bundesbank report referred to the German economy and banking system, which are very different from our own and which have different regulatory frameworks, for reasons which I will come to in a moment.

Going back to credit controls, because it is important to realise how mechanisms for getting round them would operate in practice, if a borrower was denied credit by a bank because the bank, for whatever reason, felt constrained not to lend by Government regulations, either that borrower would go to other financial institutions which would not be limited by the regulations imposed by the Government—thus creating an artificial impediment to competition and efficiency in the lending market—or, if that failed, and he could not borrow domestically inside the United Kingdom, in the absence of exchange controls, any borrower of any size—not necessarily a large size—could borrow offshore without problems.

Nor would he have to borrow offshore from an institution which had no presence in the United Kingdom; he could do so from any subsidiary of any institution which was not under Bank of England control. An understanding of the way in which banking control works in the G7 countries and increasingly in the OECD countries means that any bank with its headquarters under the regulatory control of another central bank is controlled by that central bank and not by the Bank of England. Consequently, the ability of the Bank of England to stop a foreign institution lending to British nationals is severely limited. It would not be practical to control it even at that basic level. One has only to look back to the time before exchange controls were lifted to see how inefficient they were in preventing people from borrowing overseas.

Reserve deposits are a little more complicated because they do not have an immediate and direct effect on the lender. They effectively make it more costly for banks to lend, which in turn pushes up the margin or spread that bankers charge on their loans, as happened last time we had reserve deposits, when they pushed up the cost to the borrower, which had the net effect of pushing up interest rates. In addition, there is intermediation from institutions not affected by the reserve deposits. It is difficult to devise a system which catches all the quasi-banks that are capable of lending. One has only to look at the various commercial organisations in the business of providing credit in one form or another to see that, and one has only to look overseas to see the people who would come in to get round the reserve deposit requirements.

German markets still have reserve deposits, but they are being wound down and there is a great argument in Germany about how long they will survive. However, they work in Germany because the German economy is much more closed than ours. German banks maintain a tight control on the availability of the deutschmark, partly through tradition and partly because the German banks own so much of German industry.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman has given us the key to the problem. The Prime Minister boasts from the Dispatch Box that Britain has the most open economy in Europe, but is that not the problem rather than a measure of our success? If we adopted the German model, we might have a more successful economy.

Mr. Carrington: The hon. Gentleman is right, except that the German economy is moving towards us rather than away from us and it is becoming more open. It is not more open, because the German banks still have a stranglehold, which they are slowly being forced to loosen as they start to conform with EC directives and regulations.

One reason why German banks have managed to maintain the stranglehold on the German economy for so long is that it is difficult to do business in Germany unless one speaks the language. I speak from experience, having done a considerable amount of banking in Germany at various times in my career as a banker before coming to this place. It is difficult to do business with middle-sized German companies unless one is a German speaker. The linguistic barriers to entry into the German market for foreign banks are substantial.

Mr. John Garrett: I am greatly enjoying the hon. Gentleman's mini-lecture on banking for undergraduates. It is most instructive, but I took that course almost 30 years ago. Is he telling the House that the 80 per cent. of lending made by banks and building societies to private individuals for non-housing purposes cannot be controlled?

Mr. Carrington: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman finds my speech too elementary. It is a shame that he did not adjust his remarks to take account of the fact that what he was saying was wrong, which would have relieved me of the necessity of having to teach the hon. Gentleman a thing or two.

Intermediation and the ability to borrow overseas is no longer largely dependent on the size of borrowing. In fact, it can be done at low levels for a variety of straightforward technical reasons, but they mean that most individuals, even with small amounts of borrowings, can have access to overseas funds without too much trouble.

The third factor that is also mentioned is the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. It is said that if we join, it will bear down on interest rates and so assist our economy. The commitment in the Budget to join the ERM at some stage in the future when circumstances are right is vital. I am strongly in favour of joining the ERM. Currency stability with our major European trading partners is an eminently desirable goal which would be good for industry.

The only problem that we face at the moment is the straightforward practical one that there is not much to join.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Carrington: If my hon. Friend listens to my speech for a few more moments, he may find that his intervention is less pressing than he thought.

There is not much to join in the ERM at the moment, because we are in for a nasty shock on the ability of European currencies to hold together, particularly now that the Germans are proposing to merge with East Germany at the rate of one ostmark for one deutschmark, which will throw serious pressures on to the German economy. No one at this stage can foretell the effect of those pressures, partly because we do not know how the Germans are proposing to fund it. However, given the way in which Germans have funded things in the past, the likelihood is that German interest rates will rise.

Another consequence is that the deutschmark will become volatile in terms of its historic volatility, and that will not necessarily bear any relationship to the inherent instability and volatility of sterling that we have seen over recent years. Therefore, the ability to hold our currency in the short and even the medium term in relation to the deutschmark within any currency band would be severely constrained.

But that is just a start. The instability of the deutschmark which will be caused by the reconstruction of East Germany is only one aspect of what is happening in Europe at the moment. The European Community will be faced with the major responsibility of ensuring the restructuring of the economies of Czechoslovakia, Hungary and, eventually, Poland. There will be a massive demand on Europe to support those fledgling economies. If we do not, the political risk of those countries ending up in chaos with internal disputes and major border disputes will be serious. That will have major financial consequences for Europe, for ERM and the EMS and it will cause a major rethinking in Europe on how monetary co-operation, let alone union, is to be tackled. At this stage, we cannot foretell how that will come out.

Far from joining the ERM at the moment, we should seek an opportunity, particularly with the French and the Italians, who will be most adversely affected by the immediate changes in the deutschmark, to discuss ways to restructure European monetary co-operation in such a way that we can all co-operate on a basis which will not throw so much dependency on to the monetary control exercised by the Bundesbank as the ERM does at present.

Abolishing the tax on workplace nurseries is a major move in the right direction. To some extent I agree with the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Ms. Hoey) that that is only the start of a major rethink of the way in which we provide support to working women who need or wish to go out to work and want their children cared for during the day. There will always be relatively few children for whom a workplace nursery will be appropriate because of the nature of the mother's work, or the father's work—let us not be sexist about it. I know of a number of instances in which it is more appropriate for the father to take the child to the workplace nursery.

There will be times however, when such nurseries are not appropriate, either for the work or for the child. Many people say that, because of their association with the place of employment, it is not necessarily beneficial for the child to identify itself with being taken by mother or father to the place of work and then being placed in care there. We will need to expand the tax relief to cover other types of nursery provision.

We must also address the question of self-employed women. Almost as much as any other women, they need to be able to afford child care so that their children can be looked after while they are working. At present, child care is not allowed as a business expense for self-employed women, and under no likely arrangement of tax deductibility for child care in nurseries would that be appropriate. I can envisage a position where we will have to allow that expense as a deductible business expense.

My solution would be to raise the higher earnings limit from £8,500, as that would take many people out of taxation and benefits in kind, and would mean that we would save not only the considerable administrative burden in processing all the P11Ds, but ensure that the tax relief went to the least well-off, rather than going, as it will at present—if we expand it—to those who need it less with high marginal tax rates. We should raise the £8,500 higher earnings limit to something more realistic—perhaps close to £15,000.

The Budget is greatly to be welcomed. It is a cautious Budget, but one which keeps the pressure on in the battle against inflation in a highly desirable way that will pay dividends as long as we have the patience to wait for the medicine to work and bring down inflation.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): I took a calculated risk in submitting my name for this debate, as I have suffered from voice problems for a couple of months—probably to the pleasure of Conservative Members, and perhaps occasionally that of some of my hon. Friends. Certainly the chances of my voice fully recovering are somewhat better than the chances of the Government recovering from the economic mess that they have inflicted on the country.

We are told—and it is largely agreed—that this is a neutral Budget. It does nothing to address the gross inequalities in British society, nothing for the 9·4 million people who live on or below the poverty line, including 2·75 million children, nothing for the mass of pensioner couples who, by April this year, will have lost £20 per week in their pensions because of the severing of the link with average earnings, and nothing to make up the loss of child benefit, which has not been increased for the past three years. If anything, the Budget has marginally increased the trend away from direct taxation to indirect taxation and the consequent problems of the poorer sections of society.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that the average couple with the average two children were better off than they had been 10 years ago. However, they now pay 5 per cent. of their incomes in value added tax, as opposed to 2·7 per cent. when the Government came to office.

The Chancellor's attitude to the country's enormous balance of payments problem is certainly less cavalier than that of his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), but he advances similar arguments. The former Chancellor gave three reasons why the trade deficit of £20 billion could largely be ignored. First, he believed that the deficit could be financed by inward investment, as has happened with the trade deficit in the United States in recent years. Secondly, many of the imports that led to that deficit were for capital equipment, which was only a sign of the enormous investment and productive boom in Britain. Thirdly, Government cash reserves were high and could meet any contingencies.

We should look at the sheer volume of the deficit—£20 billion. It is greater still in manufacturing industry. Travelling here this morning, I listened to a city expert talking about the Budget and the general economic position. He said that, even if the Chancellor achieved a reduction in the trade deficit to £15 billion next year, had there been a Labour Government the press and the City would be screaming for the International Monetary Fund to come in and take over the British economy.

The trade deficit can no longer be matched either by invisibles, which for the first time have gone into deficit —another Government record—or by the £80 billion from North sea oil, which has been largely wasted under the present Government. There is no net investment into Britain. In 1989, net capital outflow was £14·5 billion. Combined with the current account deficit, that amounts to a total deficit of some £35 billion, which has to be financed largely by hot money from abroad. That sum amounts to 3·9 per cent. of gross domestic product to cover the curent account deficit, and 2·8 per cent. to cover the capital deficit. That is a total of 6·7 per cent.—again a Government record, and the highest figure in British history.

The United States has a deficit for those combined two figures of only 1·6 per cent. Many of the so-called capital goods imports are classed by economists as intermediate goods, which could be better described as semi-consumer goods rather than capital goods. Britain used to have an export surplus in capital goods. The fact that it is now in deficit is a sign not of the strength of the British economy, but of its inherent weakness.

The right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), when he was Chancellor, talked of the official reserves. He should know a great deal about them—in one day under his Chancellorship those reserves fell by $1 billion. Since 1988, the reserves have fallen from £50 billion to £30 billion. That is why it is necessary to attract hot money into Britain, leading to a constant raising of interest rates and all the consequent damage to the economy and manufacturing production in Britain. That poses an awkward dilemma for the Government. There is a possibility of a recession. We are experiencing that already in Yorkshire and elsewhere in the textile industry, which is the fourth biggest industry in Britain. Once again it is suffering from redundancies, short-time working and lay-offs. In that much-vaunted sector of the economy, the service industries, there have been lay-offs in banking, in the City of London and in other sections of the economy.

Mr. Janman: If we extrapolate from the hon. Gentleman's observations about the economy, it is clear that he is making a case for his party, if it returned to government, to reintroduce the exchange and import controls that the Conservative Government abolished in 1979, and which virtually every economy in eastern Europe is turning away from. If the Labour party won the next election, does the hon. Gentleman think it should reintroduce import controls, exchange controls and capital controls in the British economy?

Mr. Wall: The last thing I have ever been is an import controller. If controls on finance and trade are introduced, they will be a result of what is happening in the world economy, which is now in the seventh year of the longest boom in post-war history. However, it has also been the weakest boom, with the lowest levels of growth and profitability. It is now coming to an end, especially in Britain because of the under-investment and under-capitalisation in the British economy.

Our economy will face the dangers of recession far more sharply than those of our competitors in the Group of Seven. It is in those circumstances that trade wars and restrictions on the export of capital, finance and goods will arise. The conflict between Japan and America that is developing now reflects the difference between a surplus nation—Japan—and its interests, and a deficit nation—America—and its interests. That has nothing to do with political dogma; it has to do with world markets, and it explains why these conflicts will develop.

I should like to give a few more illustrations of the nonsense of the so-called economic miracle. We are told that production has grown enormously, but growth in production in the 1930s was just as great as it has been in the past 10 years. Ignoring oil, which did not exist then, it stood at about 19 per cent. in both decades. Manufacturing output only reached the 1973 level in 1987, following the recession of 1979-81. It is now about 8 per cent. higher, but in the same period manufacturing production in West Germany rose by 40 per cent., in America by 70 per cent. and in Japan by 80 per cent.

It is reckoned that British investment per head is only 60 per cent. of that in Japan and 80 per cent. of that in West Germany, while investment as a percentage of gross domestic product has risen over the past two years from 13·7 per cent. to 17·7 per cent. Virtually all that increase was in the service sector of the economy. Wynn Godley and Ken Coutts in The Political Quarterly reckon that investment in new plant and equipment and in replacing obsolete equipment, compared with the years 1971 to 1979, has fallen by 63 per cent. in real terms.

This morning and yesterday a much vaunted increase in exports was announced, but I would argue that most of that increase has taken place because of the 10 per cent. devaluation of the pound since the present Chancellor came to office. Most capital investment is in banking and finance. As announced in the City today, in industries such as chemicals and metals, important to future exports, capital investment has virtually ceased and most of what is left is in banking, which does not bring in much export wealth to the country.

PA Consultants brought out a report on 400 major international companies. The report showed that only 25 per cent. of United Kingdom manufacturers spend more than 5 per cent. of turnover on training and development; the comparable figures for West Germany and Japan are 71 per cent. and 35 per cent. respectively.

The only aspect of the British economy—and its only attraction—of which the Government can boast are the low wages that British workers are paid, as I well know as I come from the town of Bradford, which has the lowest wages of any town in the British isles. The Budget gave concessions and advantages to savers, which no one would oppose, but Conservative Members may not be aware that many of my constituents who receive their benefits or wages on Thursdays and who work in the mills and foundries will have spent the lot by the end of the weekend and have to eke out Tuesday and Wednesday on virtually no money. The attraction of savings therefore has little meaning for them. The Budget, and the Government and their policies, have done nothing to advance the interests of many of my constituents.

We have heard today about eastern Europe. The Secretary of State talked about the attractions and superiority of the market economy. What the events in eastern Europe have marked more than anything else is the fact that any society which cannot improve its economy within a fairly short period is a society in crisis. That was clearly shown in eastern Europe by the bureaucratic regimes, with all their corruption, nepotism and rottenness and their failure to advance the economies of Russia and eastern Europe. That failure caused divisions.

The British Government face the same problem, albeit on a lesser scale. They can no longer advance the economy of Britain, so what took place in eastern Europe will happen here. Divisions will begin to widen in the leadership of the Conservative party, just as they have developed among the leaderships of Russia and other eastern European countries in the past few months.

Last year there was a leadership contest in the Conservative party in which, for the first time since the Roman emperor Caligula, a group of politicians sought leadership from a quadruped, however well meaning he was at the time. The Tory party now faces a different type of horse—a Trojan horse being prepared within its ranks, probably in Henley-on-Thames. The Conservative party cannot solve the problems of advancing the British economy. It does not matter who leads the Conservatives after the general election, whether it be a horse or someone swinging through the trees, because the Conservatives will be defeated at the election. Then at least we can begin to solve the problems which face working people in this country and to advance the interests of the mass of the population, not just those of a few spivs.

7.8 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): In my relatively short time in the House I have heard quite a few examples of hypocrisy but I have never seen such a display of brass-neckedness as we just heard from the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall). The hon. Gentleman is virtually synonymous with corporatism, high taxation and Government intervention——

Mr. Janman: Stalinism.

Mr. Coombs: That is my hon. Friend's word, not mine. The hon. Member for Bradford, North argued about the benefits of the sort of revolutions that have taken place in eastern Europe. But the Czechs, Hungarians and Poles are all coming to Britain wanting to learn about the policies that this Government have championed——

Mr. Janman: I should like to clarify the terminology for my hon. Friend. It is my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) who is the corporatist; the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) is the Stalinist.

Mr. Coombs: That sounds accurate.

These countries have been coming here because they want to learn about privatisation, the free market, free enterprise and low taxation, all of which have been championed by the Government. So when the hon. Member for Bradford, North tries to argue that these revolutions support his dirigiste, socialist philosophy he is guilty of brass neck of the worst possible sort.

As many of my hon. Friends have said, the Chancellor deserves our congratulations on introducing a balanced, sensible and cautious Budget. It is properly restrictive in monetary and fiscal terms and will produce the proper balance between controlling inflation and avoiding the potential danger of recession. It is in the reforming tradition of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson).

It makes several supply side improvements, particularly in the taxation of husband and wife, in savings, in training and in access to the work force by women. As the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), who is not here now, said, it rightly targets the football industry as in need of specific aid to implement the Taylor recommendations.

It is good to see the markets taking a more sanguine and intelligent view of the effects of the Budget today than they did yesterday. One should not become too worried about what the markets say. I recall that, in 1981, the last time we produced a fiscally restrictive Budget, 365 so-called experts wrote to The Times saying that the Government would preside over an economy that would go into slump and depression, whereupon there followed eight years of unprecedented growth.

So the fact that some commentators are saying that the Budget is not deflationary enough, while others are saying that the Chancellor has been unduly pessimistic about the possibility of controlling inflation, means that he has probably got it about right. He has maintained a consistent philosophy involving low rates of taxation, proper monetary control and improvements on the supply side, a policy that has resulted in eight years of consistent growth.

I represent a manufacturing area, involved mainly in consumer durables, particularly the carpet industry. Although there has obviously been a slowdown in the consumer durables and carpet sector in recent months—as should have been the case, with higher interest rates; they were designed to achieve that end—industry bears in mind the economic background against which the changes are taking place.

Companies recognise that they have been making better profits than at any time in the past 20 years. Indeed, when I visited a company in the traditional metal-bashing industry last week, I was told that the firm made 12 per cent. on turnover before tax, which is an extremely good example of some record profits that have been achieved in recent years.

Investment has improved in my area, as it has throughout the economy. Companies are employing more people, and between December 1988 and December 1989, unemployment in my area dropped by over a third, to only 4·2 per cent., compared with about 16 per cent. seven years ago. That has been due to the massively improved performance of companies in the area.

I believe that companies would not expect an athlete to go on breaking records year after year. There must be a time to slow down, take stock and draw breath. That is what 1990 will prove to be. There is no doubt that the Chancellor's deflationary measures are working. Consumer spending is slowing and there is a fall in orders and some retrenchment.

The difference between the present fall in orders and retrenchment and other such movements in the past is that industry is today far better equipped to deal with that type of mini-recession. It is leaner and more efficient. The stock against output figures have dropped dramatically recently as destocking has taken place.

The growth in world trade is healthier, more firms are turning to export markets and our exports are increasing twice as fast as world trade as a whole. Indeed, a carpet company in my area, Brintons Carpets Ltd., probably the biggest, increased its exports last year by no less than 50 per cent. Businesses are better prepared on this occasion in terms of their financial ratios and gearing for the downturn that we are currently experiencing.

With imports flat and exports growing fast, the Chancellor may have erred on the side of pessimism in estimating that the trade balance will improve to only £15 billion this year. I estimate that there is a good chance of it improving much more quickly.

The British Textile Confederation is prepared to see the multi-fibre arrangement wither on the vine, provided that GATT is adequately reformed to achieve a level playing field for exports. But it is concerned lest the Government and the European Commission do not take tough enough action against countries such as Turkey, which are effectively subsidised by their Governments and are dumping goods into this country.

Turkey is now the largest exporter of textile goods to Europe. There are effectively no duties on its imports to us, yet when we try to export to Turkey, the duties average 200 per cent., including a contribution to that country's national housing fund. That is a particularly virulent form of protectionism, which must be addressed quickly by the British Government and the European Commission.

Continued progress in improving our trade balance will depend on our competitiveness. While last year our unit wage costs increased by only 4 per cent.—although in many countries they did not increase at all—if productivity begins to slacken this year as capacity restraints are reached and as investment growth levels off, our competitive edge may be blunted unless there is a significant restraint on wages. That is crucial for our strategy, and I hope that groups such as the Engineering Employers Federation recognise it.

We cannot take seriously the Labour party's regard for wage costs. Between 1974 and 1979, when Labour was in office, unit wage costs in Britain increased 50 per cent. faster than in any other European country, which inevitably damaged our competitiveness. Labour now proposes a payroll tax of 0·5 per cent. of turnover, which would cost industry £1·25 billion a year, and which again would damage our competitiveness.

Even the Labour party's advisers have estimated that Labour's proposals for a minimum wage—half annual industrial wages working up to two thirds on hourly earnings—would cost, because of reduced competitiveness, about 750,000 jobs once that policy had been fully implemented. How the Labour party can have any credibility, bearing in mind its industrial strategy and proposals for improving competitiveness, is beyond belief.

With industrial profit margins being reduced, there is a chance that industry will hold the line and that unit wage costs will be held down. That will be made more difficult because the labour market everywhere is extremely tight. I pointed out that in my constituency unemployment had fallen by a third in the past year. Skilled people are at a premium and every day one hears of companies, particularly smaller ones, poaching skilled people from their larger competitors.

With that in mind, I urge on the Government two sets of policies which I believe still to be crucial if we are to improve the supply side of the economy. The first set concerns training. There is no doubt that the new training and enterprise councils—one has been set up in Wyre Forest entitled CETEC, the Central England training and enterprise council—will do an enormous amount to ensure that the £18 billion spent by private industry and the £3·5 billion spent by the Government on training will be devolved to where it will be used best and more efficiently.

Equally, the improvements made by the Education Reform Act 1988, devolving more power to colleges and polytechnics, which can thereby improve their links with industry, will result in them providing courses that are more in tune with the needs of industry. Equally, it is good to see that the Government are still committed to doubling —albeit the figure has improved dramatically over the past 10 years, with 1 million people in higher education—the participation rate in higher education, when it fell under the previous Labour Government. All those things are very important.

The one area in which training seems to be missing out is the small business sector. It is good that 1,200 new companies are formed every week. The problem is that those companies need skilled labour and they are often not training themselves but poaching from other companies. Ninety per cent. of training is done by firms with more than 10 employees, while firms with fewer than 10 employees account for one third of industrial output. So we must do something to ensure that smaller companies have an incentive to do the training audits and the training and therefore produce their own skilled people. I believe that a form of accelerated tax relief might well be in order.

The second set of policies that is extremely important —as has been recognised in the Budget—concerns increased participation of women in the work force. Already in this country we are extremely well developed —if I may use the expression—with regard to the number of women in the work force; 44 per cent. of the work force are women. Indeed, I am told that between 1987 and 1988 there was a net addition of 474,000 women to the work force, 81,000 of whom were part-time, so the vast majority were full time. Between 1988 and 1989, 516,000 women were added to the work force, and the number is going up all the time.

The contribution of women is vital; there is no doubt about that. By 1995 there will be 1 million fewer 18 to 25-year-olds than there were in 1985, so we need all the skilled labour, whether women or men, that we can lay our hands on. Separate taxation will be an encouragement to women to come into the work force, and flexible working and home working are things that the companies can arrange in their own interest.

In that regard, the proposal for workplace nurseries is excellent but, like my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), I do not think that it goes far enough. Only 2 per cent. of working mothers—about 2,000 at present—can take advantage of workplace nurseries. The proposal set out by the Treasury in the Budget militates against small firms that cannot organise their own workplace nurseries. It discriminates against women who are not provided with a workplace nursery by their own firm but who send their children to private nurseries. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham said, it also discriminates against self-employed women, who are becoming a more important part of the work force.

I appreciate that there is a delicate balance between encouraging parental responsibility, encouraging women to look after their own children and making sure that delinquency is minimised as a result, and improving the supply of women to the work force and therefore the efficiency of the work force. But I believe that the Government would not err, especially given that the arrangement that they are at present considering would cost only £10 million a year, according to the Budget details, if they gave tax assistance for direct payments by firms to private nurseries on behalf of their employees. In addition, I believe that expenses up to a certain limit per child for self-employed women should be regarded as deductible.

Both sets of policies, concerning training and increased access for women, will be crucial in improving the non-inflationary growth potential of the economy. The only disappointing part of the Red Book was that it talked about a maximum non-inflationary growth potential for our economy of 2·75 per cent. We have just been told that the economy has been growing at 3 per cent. a year over the past eight years, on average. I think that we ought to be able to grow considerably faster than that. It is only by supply side measures of this type that that will be achieved.

In the long term, the most imaginative schemes in the Budget are those for savings. Labour Front-Bench Members talk about support for savings, but the Labour Government diminished the real value of savings by an inflation rate that touched 27 per cent. in their last year in power. They imposed an investment income surcharge and hiked up taxes so that people could not save out of their disposable income. But now, pretending that they have changed their spots, Labour Members are proposing further taxation of investment income, in terms of national insurance contributions being levied on investment income. That is hypocritial nonsense.

The new scheme is radical. It goes far beyond any suggestions that I have seen in the past for tax advantages for savings. Indeed, the only suggestion that I have seen, which was worth thinking about, was by Professor Mervyn King of the London school of economics, who talked about tax-free retirement accounts, where one would not be able to get one's hands on the capital after five years, as in the Government scheme, but not until one was 60. So the scheme is radical, it will be very popular and I believe that it will be economically useful. Indeed, it is very good value for the taxpayer at £200 million a year.

This is a fair, sensible and intelligent Budget, based upon the sound economic achievements of the past 10 years. The blather, huff and puff and political sleight of hand that we heard from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) are not worth talking about in the same breath. Unlike him, this Budget takes up the economic challenges facing this country properly and seriously, and we commend it to the House.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I shall not detain the House as long as the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) did; I am sure that a lot of his hon. Friends will be very pleased about that.

Tory Members have been whistling in the dark, keeping their fingers crossed and hoping that everything will turn out all right. The euphoric days of the past are well behind them now and they are in some kind of trouble. The Budget was not designed to solve the problems of the country. It was designed for the Mid-Staffordshire election today and for the local elections, in the hope that it would keep up the morale of the party and somehow or other get people who are deserting the party in droves to vote for the Conservatives. It will not have any lasting effects at all. Nowhere does it face up to the problems. It is a tinsel Budget, tinsel in the shop window, with no substance.

If we were a European football team playing in the European League, we should be at the bottom. The goals against us would be remarkable—the highest level of inflation, the highest deficit and the lowest level of growth. The directors would by now be saying that they have every confidence in the manager, and we all know what that means. It is what the Tory grandees have been saying about the Prime Minister, and it usually means that it is time for the person to go.

We can well understand why that in happening. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, inflation is starting to go up. It will go up to 9 per cent., which was almost its level when the Government came to power, so what have all the sacrifices of the past 10 years been for? Inflation is going up again.[Interruption.] I know that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) likes to mumble from behind, but what have the sacrifices been for? We are now facing all the problems that we were assured time after time that various Tory Chancellors would solve. None of the problems has been solved, and we are no nearer a solution than we were before.

It was remarkable today that the Prime Minister claimed as a success story a £1·4 billion deficit for last month. She claimed it as a success story because the figure had come down from £2 billion. Even on the Chancellor's own figures—he talked about a £15 billion deficit for the whole year—that month's deficit would lead to an annual deficit of £16·8 billion if it were repeated throughout the year. Where is the success story there?

We now know that there will be very little growth in the economy. The Chancellor said that growth would be about 1 per cent. overall, yet to listen to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry today, one would think that we had a remarkable growth record and that we were doing better than most of our competitors. Here again, we are bottom of the league.

The Chancellor talked about the manufacture of television sets as a success story and said that we did not have a deficit in them. He was really talking about Japanese-manufactured television sets. From time to time, Conservative members wax eloquent about how the Japanese companies that have settled here in the motor industry will get rid of our deficit in European trade. They fail to say that we destroyed our own British television set industry just as we have largely destroyed our indigenous motor manufacturing industry. In research and development, we are dependent on other nations.

We have been hearing about employment prospects all afternoon from Conservative Members. An article in The Times today says:

"Bubble 'may burst on work prospects soon'".

According to a survey carried out by Manpower,

"only one in four employers intend taking on staff in the next three months."

The economy is starting to run down. That was the Chancellor's fear when he worked out the Budget. If he did too much, he would have pushed us into recession, which is a real problem. He has preferred to do nothing, which will not lead to economic growth.

Conservative Members often talk about the Japanese. I wish that they would study the way in which the Japanese do things. At present, there is an upturn in shipbuilding, for example. However, we cannot take advantage of it. We are still closing two of our most modern yards. I am sorry that the Minister for Industry has gone because he is trying to pick up the pieces in Sunderland. What is happening in Japan? The Japanese have put their yards into mothballs and now that there is a pick-up in shipbuilding——

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Does the hon. Gentleman realise that there is no spare capacity in the Japanese shipyards for an order before 1993 and that, in South Korea, inflation is running so high that the yards there have priced themselves out of the shipping market?

Mr. Hoyle: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman makes my case for me. Instead of closing the shipyards in Sunderland, we should be bringing them back into production to take advantage of the upturn in the market about which the hon. Gentleman is talking. The South Koreans are, of course, now having to charge more sensible prices. That is why the Japanese have benefited and why their shipyards are working to capacity. We cannot do that. We are left with Harland and Wolff and one yard in Scotland. Those are the only places where we can make the vessels now in demand in the world market, yet we could have used the two yards in Sunderland. It is a pity that we did not put them in mothballs. It would have have been better if we had put the Trade and Industry Front Bench—especially the Secretary of State after his performance this afternoon—into mothballs.

Mr. Tony Banks: They are the only balls he has.

Mr. Hoyle: I bow to my hon. Friend's superior knowledge of the Secretary of State's anatomy, but I know that British industry is not safe in the Secretary of State's hands or in those of his ministerial team. We are in a mess.

The Chancellor recognised on Tuesday that he is striking a fine balance. To be successful, he not only needs a fair wind, but the world economic policies must be right. He is dealing with matters over which he has no control. Yet listening to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, one would have thought that everything in the garden was blooming. He never learns anything. All that I can say for him is that even when one thinks that he has given a truly awful performance one can guarantee that the next one will be even worse. That is the problem.

Time is short for us. There is more than 50 per cent. import penetration in important sectors of industry. Not long ago, we heard from Conservative Members that the electronics industry was one of the sunrise industries which would save our economy. Now we have a large and increasing deficit in electronics. I have already mentioned the motor industry, in which there is more than 50 per cent. import penetration. We are now trying to ensure the survival of the last British company in the motor car industry.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest has a great interest in the textile industry. He knows that that industry is facing more than 50 per cent. import penetration as well. Is the hon. Gentleman waiting for me to give way?

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): Do not encourage him.

Mr. Hoyle: He needs no encouraging. He had a fair crack earlier. Like me, he is concerned about what will happen to the textile industry and he mentioned the unfair competition in relation to Turkey and other countries. It would be a tragedy if we destroyed the last remnant of the textile industry because of high imports.

Our record on training in Britain is abysmal, as we provide almost no training and much of it is not real training. The Government take people off the unemployed lists, but those people turn up again months later having had no real training. There is a contrast between school leavers in this country and school leavers in West Germany. In West Germany, 90 per cent. find a job. Most of them obtain apprenticeships which lead to qualifications. It is no wonder that we are falling behind.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest talked about small firms and said that they do not provide training, but poach skilled employees from other firms. If they will not play their part, we should make them pay something towards real training. The Government are giving up their training role and relying on the voluntary sector, but we know that the private sector will not train people. The good firms which train people lose them to small firms which attract them by offering slightly higher wages.

We have also heard about the invisibles today. We used to depend on the invisibles. Not long ago Conservative Members used to say that it does not matter about manufacturing because we have the invisibles.

Mr. Tony Banks: They are really invisible now.

Mr. Hoyle: As my hon. Friend says, we cannot see them now—they are completely invisible. They are in defecit and there is no sign of an improvement. The problem has been caused by hot money and high interest rates, and the invisibles have suddenly vanished.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Just like Labour policies.

Mr. Hoyle: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is talking in his sleep again. It will not be very long before he can have a long sleep. I am afraid that his seat is in some jeopardy, but we will miss him in this place, if only for his remarks which none of us can understand.

Invisibles were supposed to save the present Government and, presumably, future Conservative Governments, but they have vanished. We have not yet faced the rigours of the single market and what might happen to our insurance or banking systems. Frankfurt may even bid to take over from the City of London.

One would not have known from any of the Conservative speeches today that the country faced a crisis. We are on the threshold of the single European market which offers great challenges. If we had the right training and the right enterprise in which help is provided for industry, and if we had the right transport system, we could meet those challenges. Unfortunately, we are getting none of those from the Government.

The Government will blunder into 1992 and the single European market and we shall be decimated because we are not providing the training. We are also providing no research. If we want to compete with West Germany and Japan on research for civilian purposes, we must spend 50 times as much as we are spending now. Similarly, we need 50 times as many industrial research scientists as we have now.

I rather surprised the Minister for Industry by explaining that Siemens of Germany trains more qualified graduate electrical engineers than are trained in the whole of the United Kingdom. That is a sorry story. We are not prepared for the single European market. The Germans, French and Italians are far better prepared and their industries are in better shape than ours. We must also face the Japanese and the Americans. However, there is complacency on the Government Benches about the problems that will beset us when we enter the single European market. We should be able to welcome that market just as we should be able to welcome the fact that eastern Europe is opening up. There are great opportunities for British industry in that area if we are equipped to enter it. Unfortunately, we are not so equipped.

Manufacturing industry is being crippled by high interest rates. It will be investing less, when it should be investing more. We are not providing the training required for a modern industrialised society. The balance of trade will not come right for the Conservative Government, although they have had the advantage of oil, which the Labour Government did not have.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): Nonsense.

Mr. Hoyle: I know that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury likes a fight—that has been well recorded. He has to say, "Nonsense," because he is on the Treasury Bench, but he must be aware that we are ill prepared to meet the challenges in Europe. If the Chief Secretary says "nonsense" again, he is more short-sighted than I believed him to be. He knows that I am right and that he has presided over the decline of British industry. In the early 1980s, the Government destroyed industry and we lost one third of our manufacturing industry. When the Government refer to a boom, they have very little basis for such a claim.

There is not much hope so long as the Government remain in power. Their ideas and policies belong to the 1980s, not to the 1990s. The sooner we have a general election the better, even though we shall lose some of the familiar faces on the Conservative Benches. The sooner we elect a Government who will be responsible and believe in industry and training and will meet the challenges the better—and that Government, of course, will be a Labour Government.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Some hours ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) reminded me of a parliamentary truism by telling me that the best way to keep a secret in the House is to include it in a Back-Bench speech during the Budget debate. Listening to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) it became abundantly clear that by this time in the Budget debate just about everything that can be said has probably been said by hon. Members on both sides of the House. That is probably why the Press Gallery is empty. Nevertheless, I want to raise several points on behalf of my constituents.

I thank my right hon. Friends the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury for listening to our representations and for increasing the capital allowed against community charge rebate claims.

Many of my constituents are retired and have sold family homes and invested in smaller homes, houses, bungalows or flats. They prudently put the remainder of their money aside as savings to provide for their old age in the certain expectation that they will have bills to meet over many years. They have found it offensive that their prudence has been reflected in the amount that they have been required to pay in the past while others, some of them couples living together, have been allowed much larger capital sums in the bank.

The measures in the Budget on savings will be extremely welcome to many of the people in that category. I am delighted that the Government have recognised the need for prudence and thrift and have tried to recognise and encourage the culture of thrift.

I wish only that my right hon. Friends had gone further and, while reconsidering, had looked again at the uniform business rate and in particular at its effect on mixed hereditaments. Many small hotel and guest house owners and shopkeepers in my constituency own or live in mixed hereditaments. They will bear a disproportionate burden of increased taxation because they will have to pay increased business charges as well as community charges. I hope and believe that as the regulations and legislation are reviewed, my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury will find it possible to take account of the genuine needs of a relatively small, but significant, number of business people.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the increase from £8,000 to £16,000 of capital. The change will benefit a few of my constituents. More would benefit if the Government also reconsidered the taper between £3,000 and £16,000. Many people who think that they will receive help will not receive it. Is not it also a fact that the more that we alter the position, the more the people who do pay will have to contribute unless there is help from the Treasury?

Mr. Gale: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. The Treasury has considered the matter. I believe that the concessions in the Budget will affect a significant number of people positively. Above all, the concessions will send out the right signal. In the past we have said to perhaps too many people that it is no longer worth saving or, if one sells one's house, putting the money aside. It was better to some extent to spend the money and rely on benefit. The message that is now being sent is a Conservative message and the right one. It is the message that it is worth providing for one's old age by putting a capital sum aside, that people will benefit fully from doing so and will not be penalised for having a relatively small sum of money in the bank. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I believe that the Treasury has got the balance right.

My last point is a matter already raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) and for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs). Tax concessions have been offered on workplace nurseries and playgroups provided by the employer. It is a particularly welcome step in the right direction. I have many constituents who have children and would like to return to work. I have several employers in my constituency who would like to entice married ladies with children back to part-time or full-time work, depending on the ladies' personal circumstances. Employers have found that those ladies have been dissuaded from returning to work because of the additional burden of taxation that they will face.

I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Fulham and for Wyre Forest that we have not gone far enough. As I understand the new regulations, and as they have been explained to me by Inland Revenue officials, we shall remove from personal taxation the benefits of workplace nurseries and playgroups provided by an employer or a group of employers who have joined together to provide a communal creche facility. The relevant factor in that equation appears to be that the employer must have a stake in the workplace provisions.

In my constituency, we hope that, in the near future, a 170-acre business park will be constructed. It strikes me that it would make eminent sense for the developer to include in the heart of the business park a workplace creche. Under the proposed regulations, unless each and every employer has a stake in that creche, it will not qualify for tax relief. That seems to be an oversight.

I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, who took the matter a stage further. He said that a significant number of ladies, sometimes single ladies, would dearly like to set up in business and be self-employed. They find it impossible to do so because they cannot provide care for their children while they work. I hope that the Government will reconsider the matter and at the least permit employers, and particularly small business men who might not have the resources or space to provide creche facilities, to contract out child care for the children of their employees while they are at work.

I entirely accept the potential dangers of allowing tax relief to the employee on money paid for the purpose of buying child care, but I can see no reason why it is not possible to extend the scheme further so that the small business man can buy care from a private child minder or nursery. That would make a significant difference and bring into this new pool of people to whom we wish to give opportunities, the employees of small business men as well as those of larger companies that may take advantage of the concessions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Valley was right to highlight the potential dangers of encouraging too many ladies to return to work too soon. A delicate balance needs to be struck between encouraging ladies to return to work and make the most of the opportunities that will be available in coming years, and creating a generation of child-minded or latch-key children. We all accept that that is a delicate balance, but there are social advantages, particularly for lone parents—male and female—in extending the opportunity to go out to work to those who find that their entire lives are spent at home. We should offer them not only the financial but the social advantage of getting out of the house for a few hours a day, perhaps in part-time work, in the knowledge that not all the money that they earn will be eaten up in providing care for the children whom they have to place in either a nursery or creche while they are at work.

I welcome the announcement. I believe that it will be positive. I ask my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to re-examine the possibility of extending the facility further to enable small businesses and the self-employed to take advantage of a worthwhile concession.

7.56 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): One point that has not been made so far in the Budget debate is that at the heart of the Budget there is a huge silence about the real problems of increasing low pay in Britain.

In the concluding statement of his Budget speech, the Chancellor said:

"this is a saver's Budget . . . It helps the less well-off. It sets the right course for the '90s."—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 1026.]

I confront that claim with two facts. First, the figure for average weekly savings in west Yorkshire is one of the highest in the country, at £5·84 a week. That is higher than any other region in Britain, apart from the north-west. It is a strange irony that the areas that save the most and give the most in charitable donations receive some of the lowest pay in Britain. West Yorkshire is one of the lowest-paid regions. Only 28 per cent. of the people have an income of over £245 a week, and that is after 10 years of this Conservative Government.

I challenge the Chancellor's notion that his Budget helps the less well-off. It is not a Budget for social justice. It does nothing to root out endemic poverty, particularly among those in low-paid work. The minor alterations to the capital rules for access to social security benefit are no big deal for the poor.

The detailed measures in the Budget simply tinker at the margins. They go no way towards tackling the structural factors underlying the British economy as a result of the Government's policies of the past decade. If anything, they reinforce the current trend towards a two-tier economy, with those in relatively secure, full-time work, with rising incomes, in one tier and those in temporary, part-time, low-paid work, trapped in the low-wage economy, in the bottom tier. The long-term structural trend towards part-time work in the service sector is directly linked to the decline and erosion of the manufacturing base to which my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) referred.

We are therefore entitled to ask, "What does the Budget do for the those on low pay?" The short answer is that, after 10 years, the better-off have become even better off as a result of the Government's tax-cutting policies. This is the 1990 start-of-the-decade Budget that offers absolutely no help to the 7 million people in Britain who are on low pay and who pay taxes. This start-of-the-decade Budget contains tax cuts for companies, charitable donors, savers and the City, but it does nothing to assist the poorest wage earners to meet the extra costs of higher rents; higher mortgages; higher gas, electric and water charges; higher prescription charges; or the cost of the poll tax. The Government and their policies are directly responsible for all those increases. This start-of-the-decade Budget ensures that the 1990s will be the decade of the low-paid if the Government remain in office.

The Budget is tough, but it is particularly tough on those in low-paid work who pay taxes. As a result of the Budget and the poll tax combined, the direct tax burden on a family of four on half average earnings is proportionately three times as big as it was in the financial year 1978-79. When the poll tax bites in April, a family on half average earnings will be about £1·80 a week worse off because of the Budget. Overall, two out of three households will lose and nearly 60 per cent. of households earning less than £75 a week will lose money.

Many more people will be drawn down into dependence on means-tested benefits. About 5,000 will be drawn into income support, and 1·19 million people will be drawn into housing benefit as a result of the high poll tax charges that the Government are imposing. As tax allowances have not kept pace with earnings, 85,000 more people will be drawn up into the tax net, which means that they will be caught hard in the poverty trap.

What did the Chancellor do to ease the burden on the low-paid or to help the less well-off, as he claimed? He made matters worse, The poor will not be better off, because the changes in the Budget have to be coupled with the effect of the poll tax. The London School of Economics has a computer model—TAXMOD—which has been used by the Low Pay Unit to analyse the combination of the Budget changes and the introduction of the poll tax in terms of the gainers and losers in our society as from 1 April this year. It shows that those on a weekly income range of between £150 and £175 a week—on an average income of, say, £162·50 a week—will lose the most because of the Budget. On average, they will lose £2·54 a week. All those on wages between £75 and £275 a week will lose between £1 and £2·50 a week. In other words, a family on about half average earnings will lose £1·80 a week. A household with earnings equivalent to the Council of Europe's decency threshold of £160 a week will lose £2·54 a week on average.

Such is the crushing burden of the introduction of the poll tax that, coupled with the effect of the Budget, 64 per cent. of households in Britain will lose as much as £15 a week from 1 April 1990. Nearly 60 per cent. of households earning below £75 will lose; nearly 60 per cent. of home owners will lose and 56 per cent. of tenants will lose. For heads of households who earn £157 per week, the changes will mean a weekly loss of £10.

However, worse even than the effect on individual incomes is the effect of the Budget when a combination of incomes is taken into account. Hon. Members should bear it in mind that the loss to a married couple will be £2·07 per week and that households with children will lose £2·35 per week. In other words, married couples with children will lose the most.

A detailed analysis of the effects of the Budget and the poll tax combined shows that this is tantamount to an anti-family Budget for those in poverty or on low pay. In real terms, there is a heavy tax burden increase on those with children, who also have increasing prices to pay, not least as a result of the loss to families because of the freeze in child benefit. In Yorkshire alone, 1,090,000 children will lose out as a result of the Government's failure to uprate child benefit.

Before we are told about workplace nursery tax—welcome though the concession is—let us make it absolutely clear that four in five couples where the wife works will lose an average of £2·79 a week anyway, which will begin to eat into that concession.

During his speech, the Chancellor stated:

"we tax people on low incomes who should not be taxed", and that following the removal of composite rate tax for non-payers with savings,

"tax will fall on those who should pay it, and will not fall on those who should not pay it."—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 1023.]

Although the Chancellor made that statement, he did absolutely nothing about it in the Budget itself. The Budget retains the Government's built-in bias against the low-paid. In case some may think that that is an overstatement of the Government's policy, I remind the house of the Government's policy as stated in their White Paper, "Employment for the 1990s", which was published in December 1988. Chapter 3 was entitled "Barriers to Employment: Pay". Pay is obviously, therefore, regarded as a barrier to employment. The Government are pricing people into work, regardless of whether those people can afford to live on the rate that they are offered. That is part of the Government's deliberate policy to manufacture low pay.

That policy was made even more explicit in a recent speech by the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs. In his address to the February conference of the Confederation of British Industry on the subject of "the Japanese electronics industry in Britain", the Minister declared that one of the great advantages for Japanese industrialists investing in Britain was the "low cost of the workforce".

He said:

"Britain has one of the lowest labour costs in the EC—one half of the costs in Germany and one third of the costs in France or Italy. Only Greece, Portugal and Spain are cheaper. The workforce is also skilled and flexible since it is not limited by rigid labour laws. For example, women are permitted to work the same hours as men including—unlike in some countries, including Japan—a night shift."

It is not the welcome that we are worried about; it is the terms of that welcome to the Japanese. The Minister welcomed them to a low-wage economy in which women are allowed to work a night shift although that is not allowed in Japan. So much for family values. Boasting about low wages is an insult to many of the people whom I represent and to hon. Members who represent other constituencies in west Yorkshire.

In my constituency, some home workers earn £4·50 for knitting a sweater that can take about 30 hours, while others pack cards for catalogue companies and earn 50p an hour or less. According to the Yorkshire and Humberside Low Pay Unit, although the average male adult full-time earnings are £269·05 a week, the average female adult full-time earnings are only £182·03 a week. In Leeds, 12,000 men and women earn below £100 per week; 54,000 men and women earn less than £140 a week, and if the overtime earnings are excluded, the figure rises to 68,000 people.

About 6,000 women in Leeds work part-time for less than £2·20 an hour; 15,000 work for less than £2·50 an hour and 30,000 work for less than £3 an hour. That is a damn sight less than hon. Members earn per hour. In other words, the structural shift from manufacturing to service work has a parallel shift from full-time to part-time work, and concomitant with that shift is an increase in low-paid work and family poverty.

On 14 November 1989, I tabled a parliamentary question asking for a breakdown of the employment trends in Leeds during the 1980s, based on the standard industrial classification. The figures clearly show that between 1981 and 1987 the total number of jobs fell by about 7,000—full-time jobs fell by 8,600 and part-time jobs increased by 1,400. The number of manufacturing jobs fell by 13,900, and there was no increase in the number of full-time jobs for men in the service sector. Of the 10,000 new jobs in that sector, 7,000 were full-time jobs for women—paid at a lower rate than men—and a further 2,000 were part-time jobs for men, with the final 1,000 being part-time jobs for women. Therefore, there was no overall increase in employment. Indeed, there was no real increase in part-time employment for women. The new jobs in the service sector simply replaced those lost in manufacturing.

There is a switch from men to women, but with that has come a reduction in pay because women generally are paid less than men. The Government might claim that the vacancy columns show that there are hard-to-fill vacancies, but that is because those jobs are extremely low paid. Despite the doctored unemployment figures, the figure for my constituency is 7·8 per cent., with pockets within that standing at 20 per cent. Some 10,583 people —16 per cent. of my constituents—are on income support; 2,800—4 per cent.—are on family credit. What are their prospects under the Budget?

Paragraph 3.48 of the Red Book states:

"With output growth expected to be low in 1990, the sharp rise in employment of the last few years is likely to tail off and unemployment may rise. But the employment and unemployment outlook depends crucially on wage settlements."

The message is absolutely clear—that there is more unemployment to come, so cut wages; women's work and work in the service sector will be all. It is a return to the classic Tory message.

A survey in The Sunday Times covering the top 250 companies in Britain showed that their directors had pay rises of 28 per cent. during the past year, and that their average pay was £221,000 a year. That is a startling contrast to the average pay of £10,206 for their employees. We are entitled to ask why the poor and those with low wages are kept down and effectively priced out of our society while the rich are encouraged to become richer.

Since 1979, the bottom 50 per cent. of British society have lost £8·50 per family because of the Government's tax changes, while the top 10 per cent. have gained £40 per family. That is not a version of trickle-down economics; it is more a direct redistribution from the poorest to the richest. We must not forget that the Social Security Act 1989 put in place the very mechanism that will cause people to accept jobs whatever the low wage offered. If this Government's so-called economic miracle is to be measured by anything, it should be by their exclusion of the poor and the low-paid in society.

The Budget reinforces the Government's deliberate policy to push down wages and to shift from the one-nation approach, involving a jobs-for-all social democracy, to a two-nations approach in which there is a clear structural rift between the rich and the poor. The Budget underlines the fact that the 1990s will be the decade of low pay. It is too late for the Government to change their economic strategy. The only option for the people of Britain is to change the Government.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): Page 16 of the Red Book shows a chart which sets out the course of house price inflation since 1983. There was an acceleration in prices towards the latter part of 1987, and in 1988 there was a significant surge. I believe that that significant surge in house prices had a great deal to do with our present difficulties, acting almost as an engine for inflation in other parts of the economy.

Home owners, as holders of rapidly appreciating assets, realised that they could borrow against those assets, and they also felt more inclined to borrow. The growth of credit then fed upon itself. House prices were driven up beyond the reach of first-time buyers. People mortgaged themselves to the hilt to buy homes and, having done so, then felt the need to press for greater wage increases. Again, that meant inflationary pressure.

There were other effects. Companies in my constituency and throughout the south and south-east found themselves short of skilled labour. They tried to recruit from other parts of the country where the labour market was less tight, but found that the high cost of housing in the south and south-east was a great deterrent to such recruitment —and so the rigidity of the labour market was reinforced.

Part of the reason for the tendency towards house price inflation—which has been a feature of past economic booms, including the economic boom of the past three years—is the incentives for home ownership. I am all in favour of retaining existing incentives, because home ownership is excellent and should be encouraged, but we must face the fact that there has been an imbalance.

For too long, the incentives, the advantages and the tax breaks have been excessively loaded towards home ownership. A redress of that imbalance is badly needed. That is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was so right to shift the emphasis to other forms of personal saving, giving them the incentives and tax benefits that have been enjoyed by home owners. That is a significant move, which will benefit the economy, and perhaps, when the economy booms again will reduce the risk of house price inflation taking off as it did in the last boom.

My right hon. Friend's theme of thrift fitted in well with his announcement of the capital limit for community charge benefit being raised from £8,000 to £16,000. If my correspondence and my experience of my constituency surgery are anything to go by, the original £8,000 limit was a source of great grievance and resentment. People thought of it as a tax on thrift and a penalty levied on those who had worked hard and saved for their old age, whereas those who had blown it, those who had spent their income rather than saving, benefited from rebates.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) is in the Chamber and he should take his seat.

Mr. Irvine: The level at which the community charge benefit cut-off was fixed was widely seen as unfair, and I am glad that the Government were wise enough to listen to the representations made to them by many hon. Members and to act accordingly.

[Mr. Irvine]

Another group of people are affected by the community charge in conjunction with high mortgage interest rates. I am concerned about young couples where the wife has stopped work to look after the children. Mortgage interest rate increases hit such couples hard and the community charge reinforces the impact of that, particularly when the husband is the only earner in a family with an income just above the cut-off point at which he would be entitled to a rebate.

There is a good deal of force in the argument that wives and mothers in such families have made to me—that the Government are moving towards independent income tax for women but that, when it comes to qualifying for community charge rebates, the women's income is not considered in isolation but is taken together with her husband's. There is a risk of such couples facing considerable hardship. I hope that the Treasury Ministers and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will take account of that.

In my constituency, the community charge is £440, and it will be no surprise to hon. Members to learn that there is a Labour borough council. It is true that the county council is Conservative, but the county council's budget is only 9 per cent. above the standard spending assessment. Yet Labour-run Ipswich borough council's budget is 96 per cent. above the standard spending assessment—the second largest percentage overspend in the country.

Mr. Janman rose——

Mr. Irvine: I am afraid that I do not have time to give way.

Although that degree of overspend is very much the fault of the local authority, it does not mitigate the hardship that families such as I have mentioned may suffer.

One welcome item of news in my right hon. Friend's Budget and one which will certainly receive great praise in Ipswich was the generous and well judged financial boost to the game of football. The Taylor report and its implications were bound to put heavy burdens on the finances of football. I know that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury was also a supporter of Ipswich Town football club, and perhaps he still is, despite his move to the constituency of Mid-Norfolk. It is important that the Government have listened to the representations on behalf of the game of football, because that welcome boost of what is calculated over the next five years to be £100 million will make a significant difference to the game's well being.

By and large, I share the view that the Budget has the balance about right. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor confronted dangers from both sides. There was the danger of being too easy on inflation. Some of the financial markets yesterday showed that they thought that he had fallen into that trap, but they were wrong and, judging from their much steadier performance today, it looks as though they have altered their judgment.

My right hon. Friend could also have fallen into the trap of overkill. Not only are interest rates high, but he is also running a pretty tight fiscal policy. The combination of those two factors is already beginning to work its proper and intended effect.

The magnificent surge in investment by British industry during past years is beginning to show in the immensely encouraging export figures—[Interruption.] Contrary to the jibes and jests of Opposition Members, there are definite and significant signs that things are coming right. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has got it about right—the balance is correct—and in the coming months and years we shall see the benefit of his wisdom and the correctness of his fine tuning.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is interesting to follow the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine), who is another Conservative Member who has suddenly discovered that the impact of the poll tax is not all good when examined against the detailed problems in a particular constituency. He was right to express concern about those families he described, but he should also realise that the Government have got the facts and figures wrong in their peculiar standard spending assessment system. The idea of blaming the local authority because it has spent over and above the Government's recommended expenditure is to miss the target. The real target should be those in Marsham street who got the SSA wrong in the first place.

I wonder how much longer we shall have debates like this, when we go though an annual parliamentary ritual. The Budget is largely irrelevant in terms of setting the economic scene for the year ahead. We then have three and a half days, after the Budget has already been analysed to death by the commentators, in which to debate it in Parliament. I wonder whether that is the best use of our parliamentary time. On a night such as this, I begin to feel like one of the last few guests left at a boring party. The days have gone when Mr. Gladstone used to stand at the Dispatch Box and speak for seven hours, often without notes. The sort of things he said then would clearly affect the economy in the next 12 months and influence future events.

When I heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer speak, I thought that he was delivering his speech with his fingers crossed. He would have to do that, because what happens in the British economy is determined far more by what happens in Tokyo, Frankfurt, Washington and other capital cities around the world than what is said in the Budget speech at the Dispatch Box. Budgets are becoming rather like yesterday's newspapers—forgotten almost as soon as the Chancellor utters the last words.

I was amused by the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), the former Chancellor, sitting during the Budget speech like the ghost of Christmas past. He had given the present Chancellor many of his problems by virtue of the enormous tax cuts that he handed out to the rich in 1989. He had a bit of a cheek to turn up to see his successor clear up the mess.

It would be churlish not to congratulate the present Chancellor, who is a former distinguished member of Lambeth borough council. Indeed, he is one of a group of ex-Lambeth councillors in the House, including myself, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley). Of those Members, the Chancellor has done the best—so far. The rest of us stand around with our fingers crossed, just as the Chancellor did when he was making his speech on Tuesday.

What the Chancellor presented was a Budget for the party. His purpose was to stimulate the party, to try to do something about the depression that now sits on Government Members. That is why they were all waving their Order Papers at the end. It was a Budget for the party, not a Budget for the country. Most Conservative Members are grateful just to wake up in the morning and find that they are still Members of Parliament. So long as that is the case, they will remain cheerful. But they are living very much on borrowed time, just like the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the economy. As has been said, the Chancellor tinkered with the problems of the British economy; deserves to be called Tinkerbell.

The Budget did not address the underlying structural weaknesses of the economy. The skids are under this Government. It is obvious to everybody, inside and outside the House, that they are out of touch with reality. When a Government get totally out of touch with the outside world, one knows that they are finished. They start to believe their own propaganda. In the speeches that we have heard tonight, there has perhaps been more realism, but some things that Ministers have said, and certainly what the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said today, might lead one to believe that we have an economic miracle on our hands, that our problems are the problems of success. A £21 billion balance of trade deficit, including a deficit of £16 billion on manufactured goods, is some miracle.

There was a time when this country, decade after decade, ran a surplus in manufactured goods. In fact, it was a Conservative Government who took us into deficit for the first time since the Napoleonic wars. In the past, people would say, "Never mind—the invisibles are saving us." But the invisibles, too, are now disappearing. The situation is going from bad to worse. Our inflation rate of 7·7 per cent. is double that in the major countries with which we compete, and there is talk of a dramatic increase of up to as much as 10 per cent. We have the highest interest rates in Europe. We have heard the litany many times, but what we have heard is true; these are all facts. If this is what the Tories call a miracle, I urge caution on any of them before they attempt to walk on water.

The only miracle that I can see is the disappearance, over the past 10 years, of £84 billion of North sea oil revenues, £27 billion of privatisation receipts, and £24 billion from land sales—a massive total of £135 billion. In exchange for that, after 10 years, we have one of the worst economies in the EEC. We have seen poverty and homeless double. We have transport chaos all around us, particularly in London; we have a crumbling infrastructure in the country as a whole; and we have stunning growth in social and economic division. It takes enormous skill for a Government to take in such resources and squander them. Without North sea oil revenue, the continuing crisis in the British economy would have become a calamity of proportions not seen in Europe since the 1930s.

I take no pleasure in saying these things. People involved in party politics experience some warmth from seeing their political opponents in real trouble, but I think about the impact that all these problems—the problems that these statistics reveal—create for the people in the London borough of Newham, which I represent. It is not the Chancellor who will have to live with the consequences of his Budget decisions; it is the people in the country. He has been getting it wrong in the same way as the Government have been getting it wrong almost every year since 1979.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry claimed that we had a success story in achieving last month a balance of payments deficit of £1·4 billion. That is now success for this Government. The figure has gone down from £2 billion to £1·4 billion. Anywhere else in the EEC, figures of that sort would be considered absolutely disastrous, but in Britain in 1990 a Tory Government claim that they are somehow a mark of success. The whole economic language has been totally distorted by this Government. It is "Maggie in Wonderland": words mean exactly what she wants them to mean. That is the reality of our economy in 1990.

The City did not like the Budget very much. But, of course, I do not like the City very much. I have never been particularly keen on people who simply make money out of money. There is no patriotism in capitalism. Hot money follows the highest returns. The Government have had to make sure that in this country the highest returns can be obtained through high interest rates.

The Chancellor and other Ministers claim that the purpose of high interest rates is to control inflation, but high interest rates themselves create inflation by putting up prices, especially for industry. High interest rates are really needed to prop up the pound. Our economy does not have the structural strength to entice people with money to invest it here on the grounds that they will get a good return. Money is here only to earn high interest, and as soon as interest rates come down, the money goes elsewhere. There is more certainty in the economic strength of other European economies.

The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) referred to the more restrictive nature of the German economy. He talked in particular about the banking system in Germany. It is certainly true that the system there is far more restrictive than the system in this country, but that is also true of the Japanese economy and banking system. The hon. Gentleman knows far more about banking than I do, but I should think that the same is probably true of virtually every other European economy also. The Prime Minister has made it a boast that we have the most open economy in Europe, but because of all the structural weaknesses, an open economy, as she describes it, is a source of difficulty. It is rather like having a patient on a life support system and leaving all the windows open and hoping that somehow the patient will recover.

Mr. Carrington: Do the hon. Gentleman's remarks imply that he would advocate the return by his party to exchange controls?

Mr. Banks: Straight away I say yes, but the party does not say yes. That is the big difference. I want to give an honest answer to the question. The leadership of the Labour party must think about what will happen when there is freedom to move money out. I did not see the centre pages of the Daily Express, but I heard something about them on the radio. Apparently the Daily Express said that, had there been a Labour Government, even more billions would have gone out of the country because of the freedom of exchange. That is a problem that we must address.

[Mr. Banks]

I am quite sure that the leadership of my party is as acutely aware of it as are the leader writers of the Daily Express, and far more aware of it than I am, and I am quite sure that they will address it in terms of their preparedness to act when we win the next election. But I say again that my answer is that I should support a return to exchange controls.

In Newham last night, I did a bit of research into reaction to the Budget. I must confess that my methodology was not based on scientific sampling techniques; actually, it was based on some discussions in a snug at my local pub , the Builder's Arms. The Budget did not go down very well in the Builder's Arms. The beer did, but the Budget did not. The Chancellor said—and it has been repeated—that this is a savers' Budget, but the point that was made to me in the pub last night is that we do not have very much in the way of savings. Fares have gone up by 15 per cent.; rents are going up by about 27 per cent. as a result of the provisions of the Local Government Act 1988; gas, electricity and water charges have gone up. Mortgage repayments have gone up by £153 a month on average since June 1988. Poll tax, of course, will add about 0·75 per cent. to 1 per cent. to the retail prices index.

Those are all Government own goals in the stoking up of inflation. They all represent charges on people's income or supplementary benefit moneys, for example. People do not have money left at the end of the week, or month, to put into new and fancy forms of saving. Will the Budget measures tempt people to save or will they merely ecourage savers to switch their savings from one form of savings to another.

The people in Newham do not choose between expenditure and savings. They do not say at the end of the week or the month, "We have this amount of money left over so we shall put it into savings." They will not examine all the savings plans that are available before opting for the one which the Chancellor of the Exchequer says offers the best return. Instead, they have used their savings to finance day-to-day expenditure. Most of them do not have any money left at the end of the week or the month to put into savings.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented a tinkering Budget. It has been described as neutral, but I would say that it is largely irrelevant to the real problems of the economy. It seems that Britain is heading pell mell towards the status of a banana monarchy but without the benefit of bananas. I suppose that a banana monarchy would be the best description of a country that is led by a semi-demented petty tyrant in No. 10 Downing street. Fortunately, the skids are under her, and that started tonight.

8.41 pm

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): It is a stated truism that it would not have made any difference what Budget the Government had introduced. Like Pavlov's dogs, the Opposition would have done entirely the predictable. They have attacked the Budget, and they would have attacked any other Budget that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced. We all know why that is so. It is clear that some Opposition Members do not like the Budget, but the Opposition's profession is to run down the United Kingdom's economy. That sort of cynicism in British politics has been punished before, and I have a suspicion that it will be punished yet again. We all know that what we have heard over the past two days from the Opposition has been uttered merely for electoral reasons.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was correct when he said:

> "During the last year, business confidence in Britain has remained a good deal stronger than many expected."—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 1010.]

It is certainly a good deal stronger than the Opposition wanted it to be. The economic facts of life have been blithely ignored by every Opposition Member whom I have heard this evening. The technique of politics would appear to be to ignore facts and to pour out unsubstantiated opinions.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cran: No. I know that some of my hon. Friends wish to contribute to the debate.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was correct to underline the fact—it has been ignored by the Opposition this evening—that new business formation is at a record level. The number of those who are in employment is, again, at a record level. It is astonishing that 27 million men and women are employed.

I was astonished when I heard the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), who is a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, as I am, say that business investment is low. In fact, it is at a record level. So is company profitability, but I must say to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury that although it may be at a 20-year high, it is not high enough by international standards. We would want to see it improved.

I am prepared to be lectured by those who have done better than the record that the Government can present, but I must stress that that does not include the Opposition. When they had the opportunity, they failed dismally and entirely. I see no reason to suppose that they would do anything different if they ever had responsibility in future, although I doubt very much that they will have.

Opposition Members have ignored what is happening in the regions, especially in the northern regions. They know as well as I do that we have seen something which has not been evident before in post-war years. The northern economies have been recovering far faster than anyone expected, and in some instances faster than the southern regions. That includes, definitely, Yorkshire and Humberside, the region which I come from.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cran: No. Some of my hon. Friends wish to speak, and I wish to allow them to do so.

I do not expect Opposition Members to accept what I say. That being so, I am happy for them to adopt that approach. Let us remember, however, what was said at the Yorkshire and Humberside council of the CBI, which was reported on 14 March 1990, which means that the quotation is entirely up to date:

> "the general picture is of employment prospects and investment holding up well. From its current firm base, the Yorkshire and Humberside economy can now be expected to begin to grow more quickly."

That runs contrary to the rubbish which I have been hearing all evening from Opposition Members. They say what they do because they want to win the next general election. That is why they ignore the facts.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cran: No. Sit down and listen to some of the truth, for a change.

Opposition Members might believe what is said by the Labour leader of the Humberside county council. At the end of last year, he said:

"Humberside continues to receive record levels of investment enquiries, many from overseas companies . . . For example, planning applications for industrial and commercial floorspace are up on last year's total by 20 per cent."

For the purpose of my argument, he neatly added:

"And it should be remembered that we are building upon a record year in 1988."

Let us examine what the largest company in my constituency, British Aerospace, is doing. A news release from 14 March 1990, says that 1989 has been

"another record year for profits and turnover . . . During 1989, 60 per cent. of British Aerospace sales were overseas and in the last 10 years the direct contribution to the UK balance of payments . . . was over £20 billion."

That is the proper argument, not the nonsense that I have heard from Opposition Members about the rundown of British manufacturing. The progress that we are seeing in the country generally, and especially in Yorkshire and Humberside, would go out of the window if inflationary pressures were allowed to get out of hand.

I am clear in my mind, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in his, that inflation is public enemy No. 1. When I was the northern director of the CBI, based at Newcastle from 1979 onwards, I saw at first hand what inflation does to a regional economy, to the companies in that economy and, unfortunately, to the work force. Jobs were like snow on a spring day—here today and gone tomorrow. I left an extremely demoralised region. That is not the position now. Opposition Members should go to the north-east to see what is happening there now.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is absolutely correct to put the control of inflation at the top of his list of priorities. It is therefore axiomatic that high interest rates are indispensable. I do not need lectures from Opposition Members or anyone else to tell me that high interest rates are unpopular; my mail tells me so. Mortgagors do not like the present level of mortgages, and I understand that. It is understandable that small businesses do not like high interest rates because of the money they have to borrow.

I am afraid that I must tell them quite simply that it is better for their budget to be stretched now than for them to have no budget at all in the future, because that is what would happen if inflation were allowed to get out of control. Opposition Members are experts at allowing inflation to get out of control; their record on that is second to none, and we should lose no opportunity of reminding them and the British people of that.

I entirely accept that fiscal policy has a supporting role. I also accept that the stance that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has adopted is a tight one. I just wonder whether it is tight enough, and I slightly reserve my position. Having said that, I echo the words of other Conservative Members: the reaction of the City yesterday was histrionic and totally unjustified. Happily, that has been rectified today, and I think that it will continue to be so.

On the subject of business taxation, I have one carp —I could go on a lot longer, but I know that other Government Members would like to speak—which is a question mark over corporation tax. In 1983-84, corporation tax was under £8 billion; in 1988-89, it was £18 billion. The Financial Secretary would say—indeed I will do it for him—that that reflects growing profitability. So it does. Under this Government, companies have actually been allowed to make profits to invest, and that is why we have 27 million people in work.

The Opposition totally failed to do any of those things. Nevertheless, when the opportunity occurs, I think that the business community is looking for those rates to be re-examined because, as a proportion of GDP, our corporation tax levels are the highest in Europe. I do not think that they should remain there.

The Budget has been innovative in the encouragement of savings, but I am cynical about whether it will have the desired effect. I am a cross between a Scotsman and a Yorkshireman, a devastating combination as far as the saving ethic is concerned. I have been saving since I was so high because it was inculcated in me; my parents insisted that I save threepenny Post Office savings stamps. That has all gone, for reasons that I am not sure I entirely understand. My savings ratio is such that, if it were repeated by everybody else, we would have very high levels of unemployment—so I do not suggest that others follow in my footsteps.

While I wholly accept what the Chancellor says about the need to encourage saving, I am bound to say that, if one cannot persuade people to save at present high levels of interest, I wonder if they will be encouraged to save by the introduction of the TESSA scheme. I hope that it will work, but I just wonder whether it will.

With those few caveats, I am very supportive of my right hon. Friend's Budget and I congratulate him on it. Yesterday, the shadow Chancellor appeared to me rather like a Church of Scotland minister, giving a sermon which was rather too trite for me and rather too trite for the British people. There was a smirk on his face which I have a feeling he will regret when the Budget bears fruit in coming years and we win the next general election.

8.54 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I notice that the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) has not lost his combative style, which I first encountered when we were candidates for our respective parties in 1983. It is appropriate that I speak after him because, not surprisingly, being the leader of my party in Scotland I cannot speak on this Budget without making some reference to the poll tax. In my constituency, Conservative councillors will have some difficulty in resigning because there is only one left—and the hon. Member for Beverley may soon find himself in the same situation, the way things are moving.

The statement on Tuesday was extraordinary, but what is even more extraordinary was that the Chancellor, who admittedly is always cool and impassive, seemed totally oblivious of the reason why heat was being generated on the Opposition Benches and north of the border. The idea that there should be some increase in the capital exemption below which people qualify for benefits was trailed in the press and generally acknowledged as something that the Government were planning to do, so it cannot have been a surprise. I even had letters from constituents last week, saying that, if such a relief were brought in, they hoped that I would do my best to ensure that the Scots were treated equally with the English, and I did—the tragedy for the Conservative party is that the Secretary of State for Scotland did not.

In consequence, the Secretary of State for Scotland has a considerable amount of egg on his face. He failed to defend Scottish interests in the Cabinet. He then compounded the felony, having apparently—although it is not clear—been hauled over the coals by the Prime Minister, by insisting yesterday that it was quite impossible for any retrospective measure to be introduced in Scotland. Then, at half-past two this afternoon he tells a packed press conference that he has found the money and is going to introduce a retrospective scheme.

Interestingly, the right hon. Gentleman found the money because his colleagues in the Cabinet had abandoned him to his fate; they had decided that on this occasion the Secretary of State for Scotland would not have the support of the Cabinet and that he must get out of a mess of which he had failed to warn them in advance. Consequently, although it is welcome news for up to 20,000 people in Scotland who will benefit from the change, the fact remains that these social security benefits will have to be financed out of the Scottish Office budget. That is extraordinary when, in England and Wales, the benefits will effectively be financed out of the Department of Social Security budget. Such a precedent will create problems in future.

The shambolic consequences of the poll tax, of which this is just the latest twist, only reinforce my view that it will eventually have to be swept away because it is so inefficient, ultimately to be replaced by a local income tax which is a much simpler administrative system and also takes proper account of ability to pay. But that will have to await even more shocks for the Government and, I suspect, the annihilation of the Conservative party north of the border.

Today's debate, at least as far as the Front Bench spokesmen are concerned, relates to trade and industry. The Secretary of State had the audacity to come to the Dispatch Box and announce a £1·4 billion deficit as good news. He is the only member of the Cabinet who could have done that, completely insensitive to the reactions of everyone around him.

Despite the best endeavours of Conservative Members, it cannot be claimed, and the Government do not claim, that the economy is in the best shape. The Government maintain that they have it under control and that it will all come right, but they cannot blame our current problems on the Labour Government. It is not my task to defend the Labour party, but after 11 years in office the Government must explain the current position in terms of their own record.

There are one or two points that the country should address in greater detail and to which all parties should give more thought. I welcome the Chancellor's positive measures to encourage savings and thrift. No one disputes that they are desirable. We have an open, free market system with a minimum of regulation and control, in which companies can sell and be sold, be broken up, bought, amalgamated or merged with far greater freedom than in other countries.

The only other major economy to operate in that way is the United States, and it is interesting to note that the United Kingdom and the United States both operate major balance of payments deficits. In contrast, West Germany and Japan, which operate on an institutional basis with a high savings ratio and a high degree of thrift and long-term commitment, have the strongest balance of payments surpluses.

It is all very well for Conservative Members to denounce what they regard as the rigid stranglehold of the banks on the German economy, but one of the beneficial effects of the structure of the German and Japanese economies is that it creates a climate in which long-term investment is positively encouraged and financiers and the financial backers of industry share that commitment because they are part of the process and are locked into the system. They are usually major shareholders and they usually participate in the board and its decision making.

That is the fundamental difference between our economy and the German economy. We are driven by short-termism, which often undermines investment generally and investment in training and in research and development in a way that the German system does not. If Germany is moving in our direction, we should also be moving in its direction if we are to ensure that in the long term we have the necessary savings, investment and long term commitment.

It is important that we see workplace nurseries not just as a benefit to women as individuals but as a vital first step in enabling the British economy to continue to operate effectively. We shall have to have more women in the work force so that we can make full use of their skills. However, there is a case for going much further than the Chancellor has done. For example, vouchers for workplace nurseries might be a way forward. That would ensure that all women would benefit, either by enabling employers to group together to provide nurseries, for example on an industrial estate, or by enabling small businesses to provide a voucher which will enable women to take advantage of it.

The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) made a lengthy point about the implications of the increased duty on spirits. However, whisky is different from all other spirits, since it is a statutory requirement that it should mature for three years before it can be marketed as Scotch. Since the abolition of stock relief, it has been the constant complaint of the industry that it has been at a disadvantage compared with its competitors. In those circumstances, the case for a statutory maturation allowance, for which the industry has been campaigning, has been strengthened by the Chancellor's determination to index the duty on spirits by more than the current rate of inflation. Whisky's contribution to the United Kingdom economy is of such importance and its importance in Scotland is so great, that it is time that serious consideration was given to that.

There is a major gap in the Budget—the omission of taxation measures designed to have a beneficial environmental impact. The absence of such measures shows that the Government are in considerable trouble in terms of reconciling the Prime Minister's rhetoric on environmental matters with their record on environmental matters. That reinforces something that I have noticed in the past year—that the Secretary of State for the Environment does not carry the Cabinet with him and is not getting his message across to his Cabinet colleagues so that they understand how pervasive environmentalism has to be if it is to be effective.

The Chancellor made no acknowledgment of his potential to influence things in a positive direction. He could, for instance, have introduced changes in vehicle excise duty to take account of the size of engines. That would encourage people to use more efficient engines, and would benefit people on low incomes in rural areas, who could switch to lower-taxed smaller cars from higher-taxed large cars. He should also have proceeded rapidly with the abolition of company car privileges, which are one of the main reasons why London's roads are choked. That would have resolved two problems in one.

The Chancellor should also have introduced tax incentives for catalytic converters, and he should have heralded grants for specific environmental projects—for example, grants to recover chlorofluorocarbons, both in industry and privately, and grants for energy efficiency. One thing that my party believes that he should have done was to introduce emission ceiling licences for toxic emissions. That must be implemented if we are to achieve real reductions in carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide emissions. We cannot wait for the White Paper, or for next year's Budget. Plainly, although the Secretary of State for the Environment makes good speeches, his Cabinet colleagues do not listen to them.

9.6 pm

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): It would be tempting to go over some of the empty rhetoric and lectures that we have heard from Opposition Members tonight about how to run an economy. The Leader of the Opposition seems to think that he can run a capitalist economy better than the party that believes in capitalism. Sincere though they may be in their views on the current position, the Opposition Members who have spoken tonight came into politics not because of their commitment to capitalism or free markets but to try to disrupt that mechanism and to drag the country in exactly the direction from which the Soviet Union, East Germany, Hungary, Romania and others are running away as quickly as they can. That will become extremely obvious to the electorate at the time of the next general election.

I want to concentrate on the monetary policy in the Budget. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran)—although he was talking about the fiscal aspects, and I believe that the monetary aspects are more important—in that I share his slight scepticism as to whether the Budget is tight enough.

On page 12 of the Red Book, under the section on monetary policy, there is a nice little graph that charts narrow money and broad money growth from 1974 to 1989. It is noticeable that the narrow money line is in dark ink, whereas broad money is represented by a much fainter dotted line. That tells the reader how much importance the Treasury attaches to the two measures. The graph is rather meaningless, because it does not contain the line that it should have to show what the retail prices index was doing over a similar period. Anyone looking at the graph cannot see the relationship between narrow and broad money and what is happening to inflation.

If we were to plot the retail prices index on an annual basis for that period, and draw it on the graph, it would be clear that there is a firm relationship not only between narrow money—M0—and inflation, but between broad money and inflation—allowing for the 18 to 24 months time lag that inevitably occurs between what is happening to broad money and what is happening to inflation.

Dividing the graph into five periods shows that the excessive broad money growth between 1972 and 1973 —the period of history just before the graph starts— caused the high inflation of 1974-75. A tighter broad money policy between 1974 and 1975 led to much lower inflation in 1976-78. Given the shambles that the Labour Government of the time had got the economy into, we then had one of the most hard-line monetarist Budgets of the past 15 to 20 years, which succeeded in bringing inflation down.

With the general election of the late 1970s approaching, broad money growth was relaxed again in late 1977. That led to much higher inflation from late 1979 through to early 1981. Then broad money was tightened again, and between 1979 and 1985 a fairly firm grip on broad money was kept in the United Kingdom. It produced quite a long period of low inflation, from 1981 to 1986.

Since 1985, an ever more relaxed attitude to broad money growth in the United Kingdom's economy has been adopted. As a result, since 1986 we have once again had higher inflation than we had in the early and middle 1980s.

Contrary to what the Treasury says, it is therefore clear that there is a relationship between narrow money and inflation and between broad money and inflation. That means that the Chancellor is absolutely right to set a target of between 1 and 5 per cent. annual growth for narrow money and to reduce that target range from 1 to 5 per cent. to zero to 4 per cent. in the years ahead. How can my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, however, be so confident that with an annual growth in broad money of about 18 per cent. we can reach the sort of inflation targets that our party wants to reach?

Furthermore, given that the broad money supply is important and related to inflation, why cannot we have some reduction in the standard rate of income tax? A cut in tax merely transfers money, and hence spending power, from the state to the individual. I hope that the Minister will address that point when he winds up the debate and that he will explain why that transfer is inflationary. After all, it is not only the notes and coins in circulation that are important for future inflationary trends; it is the total amount of money in the economy as measured by M4 or any other broad money measure.

This has been a good and responsible Budget, which will steer the economy through the present fairly choppy waters back into the calm sea of the growth of the past few years. I ask my right hon. Friend the Chancellor once again to examine the importance of broad money and determine that there is a relationship between it and inflation. If broad money continues to grow at an annual rate of 18 per cent., my right hon. Friend will not meet the important inflation targets that he gave the House two days ago.

9.15 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) began by talking about Socialists and Socialism, and it sounded as though he had lifted his remarks straight from a Conservative Central Office publication. I will explain to him why I became a Socialist many years ago. I saw people clearing snow because they had no alternative—they were obliged to do it or they would not receive any unemployment or other benefit. I saw people going without food, children without shoes and youngsters without trousers. I discovered that Tories, Tory politics and Tory policies had caused that situation, and I determined to do something about it when I could.

I looked for the best party to help me to ameliorate those conditions. I examined the Communist party, but resolved that it was too rigid. The Labour party, I thought, had the right policies, attitudes and sensitivity. It was clearly the right party for me and for the people whom I later represented.

I fear that those days would return. I am not referring to the precise circumstances that I saw all those years ago, but to a return to the type of Tory philosophy which caused that state of affairs to arise. I accept that people are not in those dire straits, although in some areas they are getting close to it.

The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) talked about Yorkshire and Humberside, when he should have talked about his constituency in that whole area. He should not have included my constituency by lumping the region under the title of Yorkshire and Humberside. I say that because my constituency has 14·1 per cent. male unemployment and 5·9 per cent. female unemployment. The unemployment rate among females is rising, against the national trend. If the hon. Gentleman studies the statistics for the whole area, he will see that the situation in south Yorkshire is totally different from the rest of Yorkshire. That is why he should not lump Yorkshire and Humberside together.

The Government have got the poll tax issue all wrong. To begin with, the standard spending assessment is calculated on figures that were used for the rate support grant, and those figures were wrong in many respects. Two years ago, I told my constituents what the rate of poll tax would be and I was only £7 out, although I was £122 out, according to the Government.

If we have to abide by the standard spending assessment that has been laid down, we shall have to close every nursery school, dismiss every home help, serve no meals on wheels and get rid of every non-statutory obligation that we are undertaking.

Mr. Janman indicated dissent.

Mr. McKay: It is no use the hon. Gentleman shaking his head. What I say is true. If he doubts it, I will provide him with the facts and figures. I fear that, by dissenting in that way, he wishes to return to the days and events which led me to become a Socialist. He does not know what he is talking about, and by dissenting in that way he is showing his insensitivity. That is typical of the Tories, and the people are fed up with them.

The hon. Gentleman will recall that, when we first started to discuss the poll tax, my hon. Friends and I offered—because we knew that the Government were wrong—to have discussions about alternatives to the rating system, but our suggestion was turned down.

The Chancellor has raised the savings limit up to which benefit can be received to £16,000, and I am grateful for that. But he omitted to tell people that, because of the way in which the taper will work between £3,000 and £16,000, a person with the maximum sum allowable in the bank with additional income of £52 on top of the pension will not receive benefit.

Mr. Janman rose——

Mr. McKay: I have only two minutes in which to speak. The hon. Gentleman had his chance.

Mr. Janman: The hon. Gentleman should give way because he attacked me.

Mr. McKay: No. I am anxious to raise a few matters which need urgent attention from the Government.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The hon. Gentleman should get his facts right.

Mr. McKay: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that I have not got my facts right, he can check them for himself, as I have checked them.

Mr. Janman rose——

Mr. McKay: No—sit down.

I want the Government to take note of what is happening with Yorkshire Water. Water charges in the area have increased on average by 11 per cent., the standing charge has increased by 100 per cent., the connection charge for a new single dwelling has increased by 900 per cent. and there are proposals to add that amount of increase to each dwelling in a multiple-dwelling development, thus creating an impossible situation.

Then there is the situation with regard to the sale of council houses. People come to me who are homeless and ask for help because they can no longer afford the council houses that they bought in good faith and which at the time seemed a good buy. We want local authorities to be able to buy those houses back, so that people will not be turned out but will be able to remain in their homes as tenants.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) should not worry too much about the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), who is clearly quite in error if he thinks that one has to go to Russia to see privation and people who do not have enough money for a decent standard of living. One has only to go to the arches under Charing Cross station or anywhere along the Embankment to see young people begging. That was never seen under a Labour Government, but it is seen under this Conservative Government.

The Budget and the Chancellor's Budget statement on Tuesday are set against the bleakest economic prospects that I can remember. Despite the once-for-all benefit of North sea oil revenues of £83 billion over the last 11 years, we are on the brink of a recession. Last year saw the biggest ever balance of payments deficit, £20·4 billion, and in the final quarter of 1989, for the first time ever, our invisible earnings were in the red to the tune of £713 million. The Government have brought this situation about.

That is not something which Government Members can spirit away; they cannot say that it is nothing to do with them, that it is the fickle British public borrowing more than they should and bringing in imports, and that the situation will eventually right itself. That cannot be the excuse. Inflation and a run on the pound will be the consequences of such a hands-off policy and in the long run no Government could hope to win any battle without addressing themselves to the crucial question of the balance of payments or of economic and monetary union.

Since the possibility of economic and monetary union is not on the agenda, I looked for something in the Budget that would help our exports, or at least generate import substitution. But I looked in vain.

I must thank all my hon. Friends for their contributions, including my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey). I am concerned about the health of the whisky industry. It is important to this country, and I hope that the increases will not place unacceptable limits on its operation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) made good points about football and the pools betting duty. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) made the valid point that the number of nurseries—[Interruption.] I wish that the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) would not keep interrupting. It does not do either him or this debate and good. For the benefit of his Back Benchers, the winding up started 20 minutes late, so if he would allow me to get through what I have to say I should be very grateful.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South made a number of points about nurseries and said that the Government's concession would not benefit as many people as had been hoped. He has apologised to the House because he has had to leave on an urgent matter, but I have to say to him—I am sure that he will read the record of the debate—that I hope that, as a result of the Government's concession on workplace nurseries, many more employers will set up nurseries.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) and Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made very good points about low pay, as indeed did my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) made pertinent points about training and, finally, my hon. Friend for Barnsley, West and Penistone made the real point that there is poverty and privation in this country and that the Government have done nothing about it.

I looked in vain in the Budget for measures that would change the depressing economic situation we face. Since then, there have been changes. The Government have been forced to rewrite bits of the Budget and they are still rewriting them. I expect that there are many civil servants working out how they can do something about Scotland over the weekend before the Secretary of State has to make an announcement to the House next Monday or Tuesday.

There are measures in the Budget that are not only acceptable to us, but to which we give a general welcome. An example is the proposed removal of workplace nurseries from the tax net. We opposed the introduction of such taxation while the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) was Chancellor of the Exchequer. We said then that, although we recognised and agreed with the Government's aim of removing unwarranted and unjustified tax breaks for privileged groups, workplace nurseries were not in that category. We said that they were essential to working women with children and not a luxury.

I well remember well our debates in Committee on this subject—which were of no avail until now—so I welcome the Government's change of mind. The Government have gone about it in the right way by taking workplace nurseries out of the tax net. The reintroduction of a tax allowance would have created tax breaks which, for many, would have been unjustified and unnecessary. The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) made some points that deserve further consideration and which may have some validity.

We also welcome the announcement of a scheme whereby VAT-registered traders will not have to pay VAT on bad debts. It has always been highly iniquitous that traders have had to pay VAT on outputs even though inputs could not eventually be recovered and a bad debt had virtually to be written off. However, I must give a word of caution. I hope that the scheme, when it is detailed in the Finance Bill, will be administratively good and that it will not lead to an increase in VAT evasion. I hope that the Economic Secretary will say a few words on that in his reply.

We also welcome the help for charities. Reliefs for water ambulances and certain medical equipment are rightly being provided, but there are other possibilities on items such as advertising and building that could be explored. There was near-consensus on these matters last year in Committee, and I hope that the same will happen again this year. The Opposition will be tabling amendments on charities when the Finance Bill is in Committee.

We are worried about the effects of the petrol price rise on the disabled who participate in the mobility scheme and who opt to give up the whole of the Department of Social Security disability allowance for the three-year lease or hire period. We wonder whether any compensatory effect could be introduced for that scheme. If the Economic Secretary cannot answer that point immediately, I hope that he will at least consider it. Again, it is a matter to which we can return when the Finance Bill is published.

The help for football is especially welcome. I am worried that the first and second divisions of the Football League will gain most of the money and that the third and fourth divisions, as a result of their lower attendances and lesser needs for safety, may have nothing. The Economic Secretary is shaking his head. I am pleased at that, because every football club in the league needs at least a reasonable proportion of this money to make its ground safer. The question about money for other sports has not been addressed, and it needs to be addressed at some point.

We are not so pleased about the way of increasing the company car scales. For many people, a company car is an extremely good perk and the present taxation is not sufficient. In the London area, far too many business executives drive their company cars with one passenger per car. That makes life a misery for commuters and the rest of the travelling public and the wife is often left stranded at home for the working day.

There is also the problem of evasion. Some executives who should know better regularly allow their accountants to file tax returns that they know to be false. That cannot be good, and greater action——

Sir William Clark: No.

Dr. Marek: It is true. Greater action needs to be taken by the Inland Revenue. The other side of the coin is that, for many occupations, a car is a tool of the trade and a necessity. We therefore believe that the taxation system should do more to differentiate between that category of user and others.

Yesterday, I went to a Budget briefing by Price Waterhouse. After what I am about to say, I do not know whether it will invite me to another. Many learned experts appeared on the television screen. They said that three things would appear on the next boardroom agenda. They were summarised as cars, creches and training. In some ways, it is a sad commentary on companies in this country that the first item to appear on boardroom agendas will be cars. That is a pity. I also hope that the unions will ensure that employers do not escape their responsibilities about creches as a result of any concessions.

In that briefing, Price Waterhouse believed that company cars remain an excellent perk. I should like to know what Price Waterhouse told the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. Was he told that company cars were an excellent perk, or was he told something different on behalf of Price Waterhouse clients? Price Waterhouse also said that directors will consider themselves lucky to have got away with £5 or so a week for running the biggest executive cars such as large Volvos, BMWs and Rolls-Royces. Price Waterhouse said that the 20 per cent. increase was 10 per cent. less than expected, and that people with company cars have done very well.

The Government clearly have some way to go. We ask them to bear in mind the tool-of-the-trade car user for whom the use of a car is essential. However, company cars are an excellent perk and they must be taxed. We expect the Government to do something about that.

The Budget, as I have said, will not solve the economy's major problems. The Government must play a vital part in providing conditions for proper training. However, they are set on reducing spending on employment training by £350 million over the next three years. The Budget's proposal that contributions to training and enterprise councils should be made tax-deductible will not compensate for those cuts in training. There can be no substitute for a proper training scheme to harness the latent skills of our people.

An efficient and effective transport system is also vital. Industry needs to transport is goods, and people need to get to work. The roads are overcrowded and inadequate. British Rail, in its already underfunded state, will have its direct grants cut by one third to £345 million over the next three years. People who work in London will continue to have to put up with unacceptable conditions when they travel to and from work and they will be made to pay more for the privilege. Rail fare increases of between 9 and 15 per cent. have been announced. That is surely a good example of a Government inflationary own goal.

A proper transport structure is essential; spending money on one need not be inflationary, and may even be counter-inflationary. As the Government are bearing down on inflation, why have they insisted that BR should raise its prices by between 9 and 15 per cent.? Was that an unintentional inflationary own goal? Not on your life. There have been other Government inflationary own goals. Energy prices are set to continue to increase well above inflation. The London electricity board has just announced plans to increase domestic tariffs by 9·5 per cent. and that will mean an extra £52 on the average bill of a domestic customer. Of course, the industry is being fattened up for privatisation, but those tariff increases will increase inflation.

Council house rents are also rising. Tenants in Canterbury will pay an extra £12·29 a week. Redbridge tenants will pay an extra £15 a week——

Mr. Gale: One third of the area of Canterbury city council area is in my constituency. Council tenants in Canterbury were offered the opportunity of housing association guaranteed rent rises of inflation plus 2 per cent. over five years. It was bad advice from the local Labour party that led them to the pass in which they now find themselves.

Dr. Marek: They are in their present predicament because of the Government's policies, not for any other reason. They wanted to remain council tenants and that was their right. They did not want the ownership of their council houses transferred to an arbitrary body. They have kept that right, but at the expense of crippling increases in their council rents.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Gentleman is trying to talk his way out of it.

Dr. Marek: I have no need to do that.

Water charges are increasing by well over the rate of inflation and will continue to do so if the Government remain in office. The average increase will be 13·5 per cent. All those increases are inflationary own goals by the Government, when inflation in other countries is much lower than it is here. The Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Conservative Back Benchers continue to tell us that they are firm in their intent to bear down on inflation. They had better start by tidying up their own back yard. All the measures that the Government have introduced relating to public utilities contribute to inflation, yet we are told that the Government are bearing down on inflation. They are bearing down in inflation by insisting on crippling interest rates which crucify anyone who has a mortgage.

As the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in his place, may I quote from a speech that he made on 19 March 1982 when he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury? He said:

> "They argued that if the Government were to spend more money, we would get more business activity, more jobs, and with no adverse side effects."

Presumably he was talking about Labour Members. He added:

> "We always argued that the adverse side effects of doing so would be higher interest rates; that the less the Government spent, the less it had to borrow, the lower interest rates would be."

That was in 1982. Many years have gone by since then. Where are interest rates now? We have interest rates of 15 per cent.

Mr. Ridley: Is not it truer than ever now that, if we were spending at the levels that the Labour party wants—the hon. Gentleman has put in his plea for extra spending in the past 10 minutes—we would have to have even higher interest rates than now?

Dr. Marek: I have not put in any quantified plea for extra spending, but the speech of the Secretary of State stands on the record. After eight years, instead of lower interest rates, we have the highest interest rates, which crucify everyone in the United Kingdom who has a mortgage.

In another speech, this time on 11 July 1980—going back a little further—the Secretary of State said:

"Viewed from abroad, where I spend much time,"—

the only pity is that he does not spend more time there—

"the admiration of our friends for the Government's policies is unbounded. . . . Why is there such interest and such admiration overseas? I think the answer is that many people think that Britain has an economic sickness. . . . What is the sickness, and what is the cure? The sickness is inflation."

What inflation rate do we have now? It is 7·7 per cent. and predicted to rise to over 9 per cent. It could touch 10 per cent. by the end of the year.

In his opening speech, the Secretary of State said that what had been the sick man of Europe was now doing well. I do not follow the logic of that. If we were sick in 1980, we are sick now. After 10 years of Tory rule, we have not improved. The most that the Conservative Government have done is bandage up the victim and leave him unattended in the hospital. Until we get rid of this Government, we shall not be able to employ any curative policies.

Mr. Ridley: What is sick about an increase of one third in the net standard of living in real terms for the man on the average wage? Can the hon. Gentleman tell us of another country that has done so well in 10 years? When did the Labour party ever achieve anything like that? What is sick about that?

Dr. Marek: The standard of living has been increasing in the developed world. There is no doubt about that. It has increased in other countries a great deal more than it has in Britain. My criticism is that, although some people in employment in Britain have done well, people who have not been in employment, such as old-age pensioners and the unemployed, have not done well by comparison with those in employment.

Mr. Ridley: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that there are more people in employment than ever before—almost 27 million? Does he realise that the figures I quoted were for the average wage? Does he realise that we have gained ground against the Germans, the French and all other countries in Europe, and even the United States in terms of net standard of living? Where does the hon. Gentleman get all his gloom from? One would have thought that he had never left Czechoslovakia.

Dr. Marek: The Secretary of State should listen to what the Prime Minister has said. We still have to catch up with the French. The right hon. Gentleman will have to make his excuses to his hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, because I shall take one minute of his time. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not mind, but tonight's performance has been the greatest bout of activity from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that I have witnessed for a long time.

The country has been split. It is true that some people have done well, but not if they have been unemployed, not if they are old-age pensioners and certainly not if they have a mortgage. The monthly mortgage increase for existing home buyers is £134·29—[Interruption.] No, that is a clear figure. No amount of tax cuts could make up for that increase.

We can fight our way out of this terrible situation only if the Government recognise our position as a trading nation and as a creator of wealth. Manufacturing industry's growth rate has fallen from 8 per cent. to 1 per cent. Although manufacturing output rose by 4·75 per cent. in 1989, it is expected to stand still in 1990, and the Chancellor now predicts a fall in fixed investment of 1·25 per cent.

We need measures to dampen the explosion in credit without using the one-club policy of interest rates. Negotiations about entering the ERM are necessary, as are incentives for manufacturing industry, but we looked in vain for them in the Budget. Any fiscal tightening that is necessary could have been achieved by reversing some of the huge tax cuts that were given to the super-rich in the infamous Budget of 1988. Opposition Members looked in vain for any measures that would benefit the country and all its people. We saw nothing in the Budget except some tinkering with which I have no argument. There was nothing in the Budget about the necessity for a sound economy.

As the electors of Mid-Staffordshire are now demonstrating, the public agree with us and yearn for the day of the general election so that we can turf out this Government.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Richard Ryder): May I begin by saying how sorry I was to hear earlier today about the death of the hon. Member for Bootle, Mr. Alan Roberts? He played an active role in the House and was an expert on many aspects of environmental policy. The condolences of the entire House go out to his family and friends.

My hon. Friends the Members for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) and for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), who have spoken, have expressed their apologies for not being present for the wind-up speeches.

It is easy to forget—it has certainly been easy to forget this today while listening to some Opposition Members—that, over the past 10 years, the British people have achieved far, far more than the gloom merchants, such as the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), thought possible in 1980. Output, manufacturing productivity, investment, jobs and prosperity increased at rates unwitnessed for decades. We only have to look around us in our constituencies to see new offices, new factories, new shopping centres, new homes and millions of new shareholders—all signs of Britain's new prosperity.

We want to build on those successes in the 1990s—and we can do so as long as we control inflation. It penalises thrift and destroys savings. At present, inflation is too high. Interest rates may appear to some people to make it worse in the short term. To start with, of course, they do, but they also cure it. Once inflation is on a sustained downward path, interest and mortgage rates will follow. That will relieve the pressure on mortgage payers, especially young married couples, who find life difficult at present.

This Budget is a tough Budget. It raises taxes for the first time since 1981, by nearly £500 million this year and £1 billion next year. It also means that we shall enjoy a fourth successive year of substantial debt repayment. No other major industrial country, except Japan, has a budget surplus. Ours is £7 billion. So it clearly flies in the face of the facts to argue that fiscal policy is not tight.

This Budget is also a tough Budget because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it quite clear that interest rates will remain high for some time to come. There can be no relaxation in monetary policy—the battle against inflation is too important for that, as my hon. Friends the Members for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) and for Beverley (Mr. Cran) have argued so forcibly and effectively.

As my hon. Friends know, the Budget reinforces our strong stand against inflation and our determination to reduce it. Indeed, inflation is forecast to fall to less than 5 per cent. during next year. The Government's policies are tackling the root of the problem, as I am sure the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) knows in his heart of hearts. Retail sales are now only 2 per cent. up on the year, which is significantly below the rate of growth in 1988 and early 1989. The housing market has slowed markedly and new car sales are also down.

During the past few days there have been suggestions that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should have done more with fiscal policy, as if fiscal policy could somehow take precedence over monetary policy in the fight against inflation. Fiscal policy has a clear role to play in supporting monetary policy; they act together. Using fiscal policy to try to manage demand in the short term would be impractical and inflexible. What is more, it would run counter to all that we have achieved over the past 10 years in getting down tax rates and creating a stable, consistent environment for businesses, earners and savers. At the same time, those lower tax rates have actually produced more revenue than did the high rates that we inherited from Labour in 1979.

The Government are not in the habit of raising direct taxation, unlike Opposition Members—who, although they do not care to admit it, would like to return to the bad old days of penal tax rates and low incentives. They do not appear to have noticed the moves throughout the world to follow our lead in cutting taxes and broadening the tax base. Even the Socialist Governments of France, Sweden, Spain, Australia and New Zealand have all reduced their direct tax rates—yet the Opposition still want to raise taxes. They are far removed from reality.

I wish to deal briefly with excise duties, which were raised not only by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) in the latter stages of the debate, but by the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey), who must have left to catch the sleeper. However, I want to answer his points.

When setting excise duties, we need to take account of a number of factors, including inflation, health and revenue considerations. All those matters are borne in mind in reaching a judgment on the right level. We must also remember that the Budget will keep the real costs of some products on which Excise duties are paid at the same level as they were last year. For example, although the duties on petrol and DERV have gone up by more than the statutory indexation figure, the difference covers an unchanged vehicle excise duty—or road tax—for cars, buses, coaches, taxis and many lorries. The real cost of motoring will be the same as last year.

The same is true of wine and beer. On cigarettes and spirits—the hon. Member for Gordon was especially interested in spirits—we are increasing duties above the rate of inflation, but only slightly so. It is just a little over 2p a packet more for cigarettes than would have been the case if we had simply indexed the duty, and 12p to 13p more for a bottle of spirits. The real level of duty on both those items has fallen during the past few years. Indeed, excise duties on spirits have not increased since 1985. Those points were made effectively by my hon. Friends the Members for Delyn and for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine).

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Does not the Minister accept that whisky is in a special category? Its three-year maturation period means that it costs more than other spirits with which it has to compete.

Mr. Ryder: No one underestimates the immense success and efficiency of the Scotch whisky industry. Spirit duties on whisky have not been raised since 1985. During that time, there has been about a 25 per cent. increase in the retail prices index. On that basis, no one can say that the Government have been unfair to the Scotch whisky industry.

The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudon is a member of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, and it was the Trades Union Congress that made Budget representations to the Government recommending that excise duties should be double-indexed. I advise the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudon that, next year, he should have a word with his friends on the AUEW and the TUC to see whether they can review the Budget representations that they make to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

As the House knows, and as the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) acknowledged, there are some important changes to business taxation in the Budget, some of which have been referred to in the debate and all of which have been widely welcomed. The extension of bad debt relief, referred to by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), should be of particular benefit to growing businesses. The simplification of VAT registration requirements removes a long-standing irritant from smaller firms. Instead of having to undergo four different turnover tests, they will be subject to just one simple test, based on turnover in the preceding 12 months.

The increase in the small companies' corporation tax thresholds will mean that those limits have been doubled in two years, and will benefit 20,000 small and medium-sized companies. Our tax regime for small and medium-sized businesses is the best and most generous among major industrial countries. What a contrast that is to the structure that we inherited from Labour. Then, the small companies rate of corporation tax was 42 per cent., and now it is just 25 per cent. The main rate has fallen from 52 to 35 per cent. The small companies' threshold is now two thirds higher than it was under Labour in real terms. The upper limit, after which the main rate of CT is payable, has increased nearly fivefold.

Arguments on investment were raised during today's and yesterday's debates. The rapid growth of investment is a clear sign that British firms have confidence in the future, and are prepared to make the commitment necessary to take advantage of the opportunities opening up in western and eastern Europe, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer highlighted at the start if his Budget speech.

Business investment grew by almost 9 per cent. last year, bringing the increase over the past three years to more than 40 per cent. and total investment in 1987-88 showed the largest two-year increase since the war. The increase in investment is not just a short-term phenomenon. Even going all the way back to 1979, total investment has grown faster than total consumption. Total investment in the United Kingdom during the 1980s grew faster than in any other western European country and among the major non-EC countries has been exceeded by only Japan.

We have heard some speeches from the Opposition about research and development expenditure. From what they have been saying, one could almost get the impression that the United Kingdom undertook no significant research and development. That is not correct. Britain is the fourth largest spender on research and development in the western world. British firms are not complacent. Expenditure on research and development by industry, as a percentage of its contribution to GDP, is about the same in the United Kingdom as that in both Japan and the United States, and is ahead of that in France and Italy. Of the major nations, only Germany does more, but not that much more.

A number of hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) and for Gordon, emphasised the importance of environmental factors. As the hon. Member for Gordon knows, the Government are fully conscious of the importance of the environment and have already taken action on a number of fronts to benefit the environment and prevent pollution. Indeed, that is why the United Kingdom was a party to the EC agreement in Brussels a year ago that catalytic converters should be compulsory for most new cars by the end of 1992. That agreement makes it unnecessary for there to be any additional fiscal incentive at the moment. It is very encouraging that many manufacturers are already responding by including converters in new models, as we all know from the new advertising campaigns on television.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich, referred to my right hon. Friend's measures concerning football. I am glad that my right hon. Friend's proposal has attracted a good response, not least from the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend is an avid supporter of football; he and I both support Ipswich Town.

It was not just the hon. Members for Bradford constituencies, two of whom are in the Chamber at the moment, or my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), who were appalled by the incidents at the Sheffield and Bradford stadiums. Football is our national sport, and we must improve the quality and safety of football grounds. We want to see stands filled with people who formerly supported football and with families, and we hope and expect that our prompt and positive response to Lord Justice Taylor's recommendations will help to achieve that aim.

I can assure the hon. Member for Vauxhall that we are acting straight away——

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ryder: I cannot give way.

We are acting straight away. Officials will be meeting the pools promoters and the Football Trust next Tuesday. Let us all hope that agreement will be reached quickly, so that football clubs can start to reap the benefits of the change that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made.

Some people have suggested that what we have done for football is not enough, but we are offering £100 million over five years, which, together with the £75 million that the Football Trust has already promised, is a considerable amount of money. Our discussions with the Football Trust will aim to ensure that the money saved from the cut in pool betting duty is distributed among clubs according to need. At the same time, I think that the House will agree that at least some of the money needed should be provided by the clubs themselves. The first reaction from the clubs has been positive, and I hope that they will respond favourably in the next few weeks.

As hon. Members know, this measure is designed to help football. It is a sign of our strong concern that the football safety recommendations in the Taylor report should be carried out as quickly as possible. The money saved from pool betting duty arises almost wholly from betting on football, and it is right that those proceeds should go to the game to improve the lot of the fans. I think that that answers the point raised by the hon. Member for Vauxhall.

It would be inappropriate not to end the debate today with a brief reference to the lack of alternatives from the Labour party. The Opposition have failed consistently to answer the key questions on the economy. What would the standard rate of income tax be under Labour? Which taxes would Labour raise? How much would people lose as a result of Labour's national insurance plans? Would Labour reintroduce exchange controls or import controls? Would Labour introduce mortgage controls?

Those are the questions that the Labour party has repeatedly failed to answer during the debate. They are key questions, and we shall return to them time and again, until we get real answers from the Labour Front Bench. By its evasions this week, the Labour party has discarded any openness. The party, including the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, shrank from principle and dodged its duty to the electorate to explain its alternatives. Labour's daily veneration of verbosity at the expense of substance will be seen as exactly what it is—dishonest and discreditable.

Contrary to the futile claims of the Labour party, Britain enjoyed a decade of unmatched prosperity in the 1980s. I am confident that my right hon. Friend's Budget will set a launch pad for another decade of success for Britain. This savers' Budget took no risks with inflation, helped the less well-off, gave women a fairer deal, assisted small businesses and provided a large boost to charities and sport.

Debate adjourned—[Mr. Patnick.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

India

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

10 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I am pleased to introduce a short debate on relations between Her Majesty's Government and India, the first such debate in the House for some considerable time. I have recently returned from a brief visit to India, and I thank the authorities, especially the governor of the Punjab, for their assistance and co-operation, and a range of human rights organisations and their brave and dedicated members for their help and support during my visit.

My main purpose was to investigate human rights in the Punjab. With the intractable problem of Northern Ireland much in my mind, I realise that no Britisher in India can feel superior when discussing human rights in the Punjab, where the forces of law and order are pitched against terrorists. I talked to police officers in the Punjab who, like security officers in Northern Ireland, told me that many of the terrorists were gangsters who preyed on Sikhs and Hindus for money and power. Few, they argued, were motivated by dreams of an independent Khalistan.

I talked to human rights groups in the Punjab who, like their counterparts in Northern Ireland, told me that state violence and repression had alienated many in the Punjab, Sikh and Hindu, and had provoked widespread violence and terror. Both sides claimed, rightly I am sure, that all ordinary people in the Punjab, Sikh and non-Sikh, are sickened by violence and want an end to it. I talked to scores of those ordinary people, and their stories were deeply disturbing.

I shall never forget the Sikh father whose 14-year-old daughter was raped and drowned by a police officer. The father was brutally beaten by police three times over two days. He was seeking the return of his daughter's body for cremation. He was warned that, if he did not stop complaining, what had happened to his 14-year-old daughter would happen to his seven-year-old daughter. The father is refusing to wear shoes until he gets justice.

I shall not forget the young Sikh who was shot as a terrorist after he stood with his arms above his head in a field for five minutes. The police later admitted that they had made a mistake. Senior police officers saluted at the young man's cremation. His family is still waiting for the compensation that it was promised.

I shall not forget the relatives of the young man who was shot while marching in a Sikh religious festival. Again, the police admitted a mistake. His brother has been warned off pressing for police officers to be punished.

I shall not forget the 500 prisoners in the Amritsar security prison who lined up in the sun to meet me and my team. Each one was holding his record papers. There were more than 300 held on petty offences without bail. The youngest was a boy of 14½ who had been held in that prison for eight months without trial.

There were mothers and daughters who talked about their husbands and brothers who had been abducted by the police months and even years ago. There were men and women who showed us bruises, scars, broken arms and broken legs that were the result of police interrogation. I shall never forget the men and women who complained of systematic police harassment, with regular house searches, property smashed, goods and money stolen, and threats of extortion of money to avoid imprisonment.

There is no doubt that Operation Bluestar, the Army code name for the attack on the Golden temple in 1984, will never be forgotten or forgiven by most Sikhs. It defiled their holiest place and strengthened the view of many of them that the last Indian Government had embarked upon a deliberate policy of eradicating Sikhs, who form just 2 per cent. of India's population. Such feelings were intensified by the massacre of 5,000 Sikhs in Delhi hours after the assassination of Mrs. Indira Ghandi and of many Sikhs in other parts of India.

In Delhi, I visited some of the 1,200 widows struggling to bring up their families alone. One woman cried bitterly as she showed me the photographs of her dead husband and sons. She lost 18 relatives to the murderous mobs. From the window of a two-roomed tenament, home to a family of six, I looked down across a mud hut village which is home to 1,000 families who fled east Delhi to find relative safety with other Sikhs in west Delhi. With the monsoons, this mud village becomes a sea of mud, with the summer heat a stinking cesspit. There are no drains, water supply or electricity; there are typhoid and cholera. The new governor of Delhi has promised these people a plot of land nearby where they can build decent homes. They hope that this promise will be kept and that the bulldozers will not return to demolish their huts.

None of these people, the victims of murderous communalism, believe that what happened was spontaneous. The mobs were organised. They were led. The plan was to kill as many male Sikhs as possible, including boys and even babies.

While the horror of the massacres will never dim, many Sikhs cheered last year's election of Mr. V. P. Singh as India's Prime Minister. The BJP, the Hindu fundamentalist party, appears opposed to Mr. Singh's pressing on with his plans, announced after his election victory, to secure reconciliation with the Sikhs in the Punjab. Elections to the Punjab state assembly are seen by Mr. Singh as a top priority. However, unless they are called by 11 May, President's rule will continue—and that will surely spark off more and escalating violence.

There are those inside and outside the Punjab who believe that a new settlement for the Punjab is possible. A federal solution, with the central Government retaining powers over foreign relations, defence and communications, is widely supported. The Prime Minister and the new governor of the Punjab rightly stress that building confidence and trust is vital if reconciliation is to succeed. Early elections to the Punjab state assembly are seen by many as vital to that confidence-building process.

There should also, in the view of many, be independent machinery for monitoring human rights in the Punjab, together with independent machinery for investigating complaints against the police. Amnesty International, which has hitherto, unfortunately, been refused permission to visit the Punjab, could offer the governor and the Government of India valuable advice about how to establish that machinery.

During my visit, Sikhs complained to me about a number of problems. They complained about there being no Sikh in the Cabinet or in any of the senior executive positions in the Punjab Government. They complained about the apparent bar on Sikhs reaching the most senior ranks of the army. Many Sikhs believe that they are mistrusted. They resent the propaganda that has depicted the Sikh turban worldwide as a symbol of terrorism.

People living overseas, including British citizens of Sikh origin, find it difficult to visit their families and friends. I hope that the British Government will make representations to the Indian Government to make that easier. I also hope that they will make representations to the Indian Government urging them to allow young Sikhs fom the Punjab to study in Britain and other overseas countries. At the moment, they experience great difficulty in obtaining student visas to study here or elsewhere.

If there is uncertainty about the future of the Punjab, there is great anxiety about the future of Kashmir. During my visit to Kashmir, there were many reports of mass protests involving anything up to 1 million people, with deaths, injuries and many more soldiers being deployed. It is now believed that between 200,000 and 300,000 security forces are deployed in Kashmir, and more are on the way. A permanent curfew has been in place for the past nine weeks.

Many argue that the people of Kashmir should be given a referendum in which they could vote freely and fairly for their future. There appear to be three options—for them to remain part of India, for them to join Pakistan or, the option that has been gaining support, for Kashmir valley to join Azad Kashmir and parts of Jammu, to become a new independent state.

During my visit, a prominent Kashmiri business man who favoured the third option said:

"We could become the Switzerland of Asia, with tourism and the careful development of our natural resources. The borders could be guaranteed internationally, safeguarded by the United Nations. A state of 10 million people, we could become a tranquil, prosperous buffer between India and Pakistan."

The Indian Government are making a serious mistake by alleging that there are those outside Kashmir and outside India who are instigating violence and disorder in Kashmir. In making those charges, the Indian Government's credibility is seriously undermined so long as they refuse permission to foreigners to visit Kashmir, and so long as they stop the world's media reporting what is happening in Kashmir.

I hope that India's new Prime Minister will quickly see the difficulties that his Government will face if they continue that policy. I hope that he will allow visitors and the free reporting of what is happening in Kashmir. I hope that the Indian Government will agree to a request that I made informally today to the Indian high commission for a parliamentary delegation from the House to be allowed to visit Kashmir shortly. I welcome the visit that is to be made to Kashmir next month by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

Some 56 British Members of Parliament, representing all political parties and from all parts of the United Kingdom, have now signed and supported motions on the Order Paper calling for the people of Kashir to be allowed to determine their own destiny.

At this time in Kashmir, there are severe shortages of food and water. There are drastic evacuations of non-Muslims from Kashmir. The authorities are transferring large numbers of prisoners from Kashmir to the much hotter climate of Rajastan, and there are worrying reports that death squads are being formed and trained. As I said earlier, there are reports of substantial extra troop deployments to Kashmir.

There can be no doubt that what has happened in the Punjab since 1984 scars the reputation of India, the world's largest democracy, and that the popular uprising in Kashmir threatens peace in the region. All true friends of India—we are all well aware of the deep affection and regard that you, Mr. Speaker, have for that country, which is shared by many hon. Members—wish every good fortune to Mr. Singh and his Government in resolving the vexed and dangerous issues that threaten the future of his Government and, more important, the future and well-being of all the people of all religions of India.

I hope that the Minister can say tonight that the Government are anxious to make representations to the Indian Government—especially on my requests for more efforts to facilitate visits by British citizens of Sikh origin to the Punjab, to help young Sikhs to study overseas, to allow foreign nationals to visit Kashmir and to allow the foreign media to report what is happening in Kashmir.

I do not believe that the true friends of India would be unwilling to make such representations, because—as with any family—there are times when it is necessary for us to express our views robustly in private and, when the need arises, in public. The human rights position in the Punjab and the dangerous position in Kashmir, which seems to be deteriorating fast, call for the British Government to make such representations. Britain has a great historic responsibility for India's past, and it has a great responsibility now to speak up on behalf of people who have many relatives and friends there.

The Kashmiri community are desperately worried about their families and their friends, and are concerned about the future of their country. Sikhs, too, have great worries. I hope that the Minister will echo their concerns, and will make it clear that the British Government, in the spirit of true friendship, are prepared to make representations to the Indian Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on raising the important subject of Britain's relations with India. Those relations are reinforced by strong links of many kinds and on many levels—historical, political, cultural, commercial and, indeed, personal. The planned state visit to Britain next month by the President of India will be an occasion to which to celebrate the closeness and the warmth of those relations—a closeness and warmth which I know that you experienced, Mr. Speaker, during your visit to India last August.

I shall not take up the time of the House by speaking at too much length of Britain's involvement in India's history before independence, except to note that it has left us with many things in common beyond a language and an obsession with cricket. Our democratic, administrative and legal systems are similar, but many countries have parliaments, bureaucrats and courts. What matters in this case is that Britain and India both rely on those institutions to protect the same values, the same democratic rights and the same civil liberties. When an Englishman and an Indian talk of freedom of speech and of the rule of law, they are talking about the same thing. I am certain that the Indian Government, no less than the British Government, are committed to the maintenance and promotion of those values, rights and liberties.

[Mr. Tim Sainsbury]

If I talk of a long historical connection, it is emphatically not out of a sense of nostalgia, but because our shared past gives both India and Britain common guideposts to the future in our shared determination to sustain democratic institutions and individual freedom under the law.

One of the most important elements in relations between our two countries is represented by the many people of Indian origin who have settled in Britain. They have made a significant contribution to all aspects of national life here. Their continued involvement in, and concern for, their country of origin can be of great value in making our relations still closer, more substantial and more productive.

The hon. Member raised certain human rights issues. I do not suggest that anybody in India would claim that India has a completely unblemished human rights record. Indeed, it is hard to point to a country that has. The Indian Government are the first to concede that abuses have taken place. As is scarcely surprising in so vast a developing country, the administration of law and order sometimes falls short of the best intentions of the Government. But India cannot reasonably be compared with countries that systematically abuse human rights as a matter of Government policy.

India is a democratic country with an independent legal system to which those who believe they have been treated unfairly have recourse, and there is a vibrantly free press in which injustices can be and are exposed. I have no doubt of the genuine commitment of the Indian Government to the maintenance of political freedoms and civil liberties. Before we start to criticise, we need to consider the magnitude of the problems that India faces, in maintaining the unity and integrity of a secular state in so vast and complex a country, with its great diversity of race, religion, and language.

The hon. Member also mentioned problems in Kashmir. Both the Indian and Pakistani Governments have been concerned by events there, and I believe, wish to avoid further increase in tension in the area. We have made clear our concern at the political unrest in the Kashmir valley, and at the loss of life that has resulted, whether through acts of terrorism, which, I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree, can solve nothing, or through the shooting of reportedly unarmed civilian demonstrators by the security forces.

Our own long-standing position on the dispute over the status of Kashmir has been one of neutrality. We believe it can be settled only by agreement between the two Governments concerned. We have recently discussed the situation there with representatives of both the Pakistan and Indian Governments. We have made it clear that we believe that the dispute is one to be settled between them, and we hope that they will be able to reach a peaceful settlement of the issues involved. We have encouraged both sides to avoid a confrontation which we are convinced neither side wants. We have also made it clear that we have absolutely no sympathy with those who espouse violence for political ends. At the same time, we hope that the problems of law and order to which the hon. Gentleman referred can be handled with maximum restraint.

There were a number of United Nations resolutions on Kashmir in 1948 and 1949. The issue at the time was whether Kashmir should accede to Pakistan or India. Britian voted in favour of these resolutions, the texts of which represented agreement between India and Pakistan at the time, but much has happened since, not least the 1972 Simla agreement on bilateral relations between India and Pakistan. Under that agreement, both countries agreed "to settle their differences by peaceful means through bilateral negotiations or by any other peaceful means mutually agreed on between them".

Both sides also committed themselves to "a final settlement of Jammu and Kashmir".

Our long-standing position is entirely consistent with the terms of the agreement. We are confident that real progress in settling this dispute can be made only by agreements reached between India and Pakistan.

The hon. Member may have read that the Indian Prime Minister convened an all-party meeting on 7 March to discuss the situation in Kashmir. The next day, a senior delegation of Indian Members of Parliament visited Kashmir to assess the situation. Mr. V.P. Singh has since appointed a Cabinet Minister for Kashmir, and a multi-party committee to assist him. We welcome these moves and hope that they may contribute to the search for a peaceful solution to the current problems.

The hon. Member was able to be among the first foreign parliamentarians to visit the Punjab recently to investigate reports of alleged human rights violations. The House will have been concerned at learning of the various incidents to which he referred; but I am sure that he will not expect me to comment on them. The fact of his visit is, I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree, an encouraging sign of the determination of the Indian Government to find a solution to the current problems, and of their refusal to brush those problems under the carpet.

I well understand the concern felt by many in the community here about their friends and families in India as a result of reports received about the situation in Punjab. However, we should look at the situation in the Punjab as a whole. In our view, many of the reports reaching people in this country do less than justice to the truth of this tragic and complex problem.

The history of the current troubles in the Punjab is long and complex. The Sikh community in India have played a distinguished part in Indian life and customs, and continue to do so. Many of them seek to pursue their grievances and aspirations, as they are entitled to do, by legitimate constitutional means, but a minority are engaged in a bitter terrorist struggle against the authorities to achieve what they cannot achieve by democratic means—the dismemberment of the secular state of India. It is against this background that we need to view events in Punjab.

Last year, tragically, over 2,000 people were reported killed in the Punjab in terrorist-related violence. There have been many reports during the last year of indiscriminate attacks on innocent people, including some by Sikhs on Sikhs trying to defend other members of the community. Earlier this month, we saw reports of terrorists firing on a bus in the Punjab. In the incident, 10 people were reported to have been shot dead. In the same week, we saw reports of an attack by terrorists who opened fire in a crowded bazaar in Abohar in the south of the Punjab, in which at least 31 people were left dead. Attempts to pin all responsibility for such outrages on the Indian Government fly in the face of the facts.

Under the previous Government, in March last year a package of measures was introduced including the easing of restrictions and the release of detainees when no evidence could be brought against them. After being elected to office last November, the new Indian Government announced that they would give priority to resolving the current problems in the Punjab. Prime Minister V. P. Singh's visit to Amritsar in December was a brave and widely welcomed gesture.

Last December and in January this year, he held two all-party meetings to discuss the Punjab. At the January meeting, the Indian Government introduced a package of measures which included a review of all detainee cases, and reminders to local police authorities of the need to maintain stricter police discipline, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomed that. The new Indian Government have also promised to bring to trial those accused of involvement in anti-Sikh riots which followed Mrs. Gandhi's assassination in late 1984.

As the hon. Member went to the Punjab, he may be aware that the Indian Prime Minister visited the Punjab on 14 March and announced the formation of an advisory committee to help the administration of the state. That committee will consist of representatives of different political parties and social groups. I see that this development has been welcomed in the Indian press.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the importance of building confidence. I agree with him, and I hope that he will agree that the measures to which I have referred are a step in that important direction.

The Indian Government are determined—as any Government must be—to root out terrorism. We have made it clear on a number of occasions that we support them in their attempts to maintain the unity and integrity of India and in taking the necessary measures to deal with those who use violence as a means of achieving their aims.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a number of points on which he asked me to comment. He referred to encouraging young Sikhs to study in the United Kingdom. We welcome any overseas students from India who have been accepted for a full-time course of study and who can show that they have funds to support themselves here without working.

In 1988-89, a total of 1,839 Indian students in the United Kingdom received British Government support. The special Foreign Office scholarships scheme for India has been increased since 1988, so that in this financial year we intend to spend just under £1 million, which will fund about 130 students here. We have no knowledge of students from the Punjab, or indeed from Kashmir, being prevented from attending courses.

The hon. Gentleman referred to Amnesty International. We have commended Amnesty to the Indian Government at ministerial level as a serious and responsible organisation, but we accept that the issuing of visas is a matter for the Indian Government. We welcome the Indian Foreign Minister's answer to a parliamentary question on 15 March, when he said that the Indian Government were considering allowing an Amnesty International team to visit the Punjab.

I return to the general subject of the debate—Britain's relations with India. I listened with interest to what the hon. Gentleman said and I urge him to work with us to continue to improve those relations and to encourage those in this country who have ties of blood and of kinship with India to support those who seek to resolve the country's problems by peaceful and constitutional means. That is what we owe to India, and to the principles by which we in Britain and the people of India live.

The Question having been proposed at Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Mid-Staffordshire By-election

9.34 am

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in order for you, on this historic morning, to send a congratulatory telegram to the winner of the Mid-Staffordshire by-election, who will shortly be gracing the Labour Benches?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that we have had that precedent in the House——

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall have the opportunity of welcoming the hon. Lady some time next week.

Mr. Anderson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will it be within the terms of the first motion to be discussed today for us to refer specifically to transport journey times to Mid-Staffordshire and other areas, or would you rule that inappropriate and perhaps intruding on the grief of the Government?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know about the grief of the Government, but I should have thought that the motion is wide enough to deal with journey times to Mid-Staffordshire or anywhere else.

Public Transport

9.36 am

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the Government's statement in their objectives set to British Rail, that projects not meeting the required rate of financial return but having social, environmental or other external benefits, should be assessed by cost-benefit analysis; further welcomes the Government's commitment to maintain the existing railway network, and to continue to pay the Public Service Obligation grant, whilst noting the report of the Central Transport Consultative Committee on British Rail; notes both the investment regime and subsidy policy pursued by the French and West German governments; calls on Her Majesty's Government to assess road and rail projects on an equal basis in the light of the congestion, pollution and aggravation caused by the proliferation of the internal combustion engine; welcomes the Government's important decision to refuse closure of the Settle and Carlisle railway line as a significant change to policies pursued by previous governments; and requests British Rail to end the policy of selling off railway trackbed from which services have been discontinued.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) last week, I have waited almost 20 years to win the ballot to debate a motion of my choice. I hope that after the House has heard me it will not wish to wait another 20 years before having an opportunity to hear me again.

I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, because I know that he has had severely to reorganise his timetable, which I believe included a meeting with a Community transport Minister. I understand that he was able to hold that meeting yesterday, and I am grateful to him for being present today.

I anticipated that Labour Members would comment on the by-election result. It would be churlish not to congratulate the victor, but the fact that it has been described as the Labour party's best result for 60 years says rather more about the Labour party than the state of politics. I enjoyed the results from places such as Ashfield, Birmingham, Stechford and Workington under a Labour Government and endured the results from Ryedale, Crosby and Croydon, North-West. I recall visiting the constituency of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), who is in his place, during his by-election victory. I think that on that occasion the Conservative party, which had held the seat, came third.

Mr. Anderson: The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) is still here.

Mr. Adley: He is still here, and his party is still in Opposition. The point has been well made, so I shall move on to debate transport matters.

I ask the House to try to debate public transport policy without too much party-political dogma. Public transport policy and party-political dogma make uneasy bedfellows. I should be delighted if we could use this opportunity to take a long, cool look at how successive Governments have organised transport policy.

We must consider the true position facing this congested and crowded island and try to debate the motion in the way that we have just prayed. We prayed to forgo our private interests, prejudices and partial affections and it would be good if we could stick to that.

Perhaps on that basis I should declare an interest as a member of the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

[Mr. Adley]

For many years, I have received assistance and hospitality from British Rail. I am an author of railway books, and my next book, entitled "Out of Steam", which is to be published by Patrick Stephens Ltd. in August, is priced at £17·50 and will be available from all good bookshops.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I know that we are on television, but are we on commercial television?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): That seems to be the case.

Mr. Adley: The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) makes an interesting point.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): I was interested in my hon. Friend's assessment that being given tea by British Rail was considered to be a commercial advantage.

Mr. Adley: Lobbying crossed my mind as one subject for debate. The hon. Member for Swansea, East made the point that, if one is not careful, a declaration of interest can be turned into an advertisement.

The motion emerged after fevered discussion with a number of my colleagues. As one of those who voted consistently against the community charge, I thought that we might have a debate on local government finance, but that idea was not entirely popular with some of my colleagues. I then invited my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the possibility of a debate on public transport policy. He was very courteous and said that the first draft of the motion that I showed him probably would have required the Government to impose a three-line Whip. We managed to reach an agreeable compromise, resulting in the motion on the Order Paper.

My proposition is simple. In the past 10 years, there has been considerable economic success, resulting in the enormous proliferation of motor cars and other vehicles on our roads. Simultaneously, we have seen the growth of environmental concern and recognition across the party divide that the internal combustion engine, which is a major source of pollution, congestion and aggravation, cannot be the only solution not only to the individual's problems but to the country's transport policy needs. The internal combustion engine, which once appeared likely to sound the death knell of the railway system is, by its proliferation, the source of railway renaissance. The policy and the procedures by which those policies are framed and which have been pursued by this and previous Governments do not take account of the relative merits of road and rail investment. The criteria used by the Department of Transport have become bogged down in ancient prejudices, presumptions and propaganda. I shall address most of my remarks to those procedures.

The wording in relation to road versus rail criteria was one matter that my hon. Friend the Minister and I discussed. I am sure that my hon. Friend will say that, in his view, the criteria used by the Department of Transport are fair to road and rail, but I do not believe that they are. I invite the House to take a fundamental look at the purpose of taxation. A dictionary provides a definition, but if the House thinks about taxation for a moment, it will see that we provide, for example, taxation for the Ministry of Defence, the Departments of Health, Education and Science and Transport and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. What is the relationship between the provision of public funding through taxation and the expectation of obtaining a commercial return through the provision of funds to the areas of Government activity receiving those funds? Do we expect the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health to show a profit? Of course we do not. Do we expect the Department of Transport to show a profit? No. Do we expect the roads to show a profit? No. The Government and their predecessors expect British Rail, almost alone among Government activities, to operate as if it were a commercial organisation. That proposition is fundamentally flawed.

The criteria employed by the Department of Transport in assessing road versus rail investment proposals should surely deal with the real costs to the nation of everything that can directly be attributable to rail or road usage. I could spend two hours discussing that simple point, but I shall not. I shall take the police as an example. A few days ago, I asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary about the police time spent on all activities relating to traffic management. On Monday, he replied:

"In 1987, 1988 and 1989, approximately 8 per cent. of the total police strength in England and Wales was deployed on specialist traffic duties."

My right hon. and learned Friend went on to say, significantly:

"The proportion of non-specialist officers' time spent on traffic matters is not recorded. The total costs could not be reliably estimated."

It is clear to anyone who thinks for a moment about the time of the police and other related activities, such as attendance in court—involving the Crown prosecution service, lawyers and clerks—that an untold and unknown sum of money is devoted to dealing with problems directly related to road transport. How can the Department of Transport genuinely be expected to undertake a proper assessment of the costs of road versus rail if my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary openly admits that no such information is available?

Each year we kill 2,500 people and maim 250,000 on our roads, and untold others are injured less seriously. The cost must be astronomic. This week, I asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health

"if he will estimate the cost to the National Health Service, for the latest year for which figures are available, of all road accidents."

I received this simple answer:

"Data on the actual cost to the National Health Service in England of Road accidents are not collected by the Department."—[Official Report, 19 March 1990; Vol. 169, c.454-73.]

How can the Department of Transport be entirely confident that the information on which it bases its investment criteria is based on facts, when those facts are unknown?

Many of the people who are involved in accidents spend weeks or months in hospital before they die, as do those who are maimed. Goodness only knows the extent of the hospital costs and Department of Health costs that are incurred. Many thousands of people will be on social security benefit when they leave hospital, and those costs are unknown. We expect the Department of Transport to carry out an analysis in the absence of the facts that would make it meaningful.

In response to my probing questions about the activities of staff in the Department of Transport, my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic told me that, rounded to the nearest 500, 16,500 people in his Department were directly engaged in transport and planning matters. I do not know whether any of my hon. Friends or other hon. Members would care to guess how many out of those 16,500 civil servants were involved with the railways. Any guesses forthcoming? It may interest the House to know that of those 16,500 civil servants in the Department of Transport, a grand total of 200 were involved with railways and that figure includes the entire railways inspectorate.

Mr. Anderson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Perhaps I should call him my hon. Friend in this case as he has a distinguished record of supporting the railways. Given those comparisons of the personnel in roads and railways in the Department of Transport, is not it the more puzzling that the Government have a propensity to take people from senior positions in the Department of Transport for senior positions in British Rail?

Mr. Adley: That is a fair and reasonable point. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take part in the debate so that he can expand on that point. He has raised a serious problem. I hope that he will allow me to continue to provide the House with a little more information so that we can see what all the people in the Department of Transport do.

There are 200 civil servants dealing with railways including those in the railway inspectorate. For highways, including bus and taxi policy, there are 550. There are 100 in road safety. There are 1,000 traffic area staff excluding those currently elsewhere such as driving examiners. Six hundred are employed at the transport and road research laboratory. The driving standards agency employs 2,000 and the vehicle inspection agency employs 1,600. The driver and vehicle licensing agency employs 5,500. Aviation employs 350, which is almost twice the number in railways, and there are 950 in shipping, almost five times as many as those in railway activity in the Department of Transport. I do not know whether the salaries of all those people in the Department who are allocated to what one might generally call roads activities are included by the Department in "load" costs. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will elucidate on that later.

We need to debate whether there is a fair assessment between road and rail. My hon. Friend the Minister claims that there is, but the Confederation of British Industry clearly agrees with me. In a parliamentary briefing sent out a couple of days ago, the CBI said that it "would welcome the assessment of rail investment on an equal basis with road projects."

I should welcome that, too. I telephoned the CBI yesterday and confirmed that its understanding of the position was the same as mine—that there is at present an unequal assessment of rail as opposed to road investment within the Department of Transport.

One could show endlessly that that is the case. To take one example, we are at present contemplating the construction of a rail link from the Great Western main line to Heathrow. For years, I have advocated that if that link is built, in addition to there being an eastbound rail link into Paddington, there should be a little link of 200 or 300 yd westbound so that all potential travellers to Heathrow from south Wales, the west country, the south-west and the south of England could catch trains going directly into Heathrow—but no. That 200 or 300 yd track will not be built. Can anyone imagine that if a road was being built, the same strict financial criteria would apply? One has only to ask the question to know the answer.

Investment criteria must, of course, be related to commercial reality, but they must also be more closely related to environmental and social needs. We need only look at the commuter problem to understand what we are talking about. British Rail did not invent the rush hour. Without a railway system in our major cities, life would be intolerable. Every day, British Rail carries 500,000 passengers into London during the morning peak. The House should contemplate that the more people British Rail succeeds in attracting on to its commuter peak-hour services, the more it is required to generate its own capital investment in capital equipment which is used for only four out of 24 hours every day. No normal business could operate by acquiring expensive equipment and leaving it idle for 20 out of 24 hours. That is as good an example as one needs to illustrate that it is fundamentally wrong to equate investment in our railways with normal commercial investment in business and industry. The railways are a vital part of the nation's infrastructure, and should be seen and dealt with as such.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will excuse me if I talk briefly about the public service obligation grant. To some of my hon. Friends, the word "subsidy" is a dirty word. I suppose that they would like to see the armed forces privatised, so that we could then test our weapons in private enterprise battles between the armies of Wessex and the armies of Mercia. That proposition does not especially attract me.

To suggest, as my hon. Friend does, that there is merely a coincidence of timing between the reduction of the PSO grant and the increasing incidence of late arrivals, shorter trains, service reductions, staff shortages, and unmanned stations is to stretch credulity to breaking point. Most hon. Members and most members of the travelling public would regard that as an unreal proposition. Given the commuter problem, simplistic commercial considerations are not in the interests of the nation when assessing the value of the rail network to the people of this country.

I am sorry to say to my hon. Friend the Minister that I shall quote briefly from the Central Transport Consultative Committee report which came out a few days ago. I do not think that my hon. Friend liked what it said. The CTCC is not exactly an organisation manned by members of the Militant Tendency. It is funded by the Department of Trade and Industry. Its members are appointed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The present chairman, Major-General Lennox Napier was first appointed in 1985 when my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and his position was confirmed and his appointment renewed last year by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley). Times change, and both my right hon. Friends may be changing their political stance, but if they are, it is news to me. Someone appointed by them is likely to be considered reasonably independent minded on matters such as railway investment. Among the other members of the CTCC are our former colleague, John Corrie in Scotland, Angela Hooper in southern England, who is known to many of us, and Sir Robert Wall in the west of England, a long-time leading Conservative member of Bristol city council. we are not dealing here with a rabble-rousing, Left-wing organisation.

[Mr. Adley]

I want to read a few quotations from the CTCC report which came out a few days ago. It says:

"The new objectives"— the objectives laid by the Government on British Rail—

"demand that B.R. reduce its requirement for grant to support socially unnecessary but unprofitable passenger services"—

the PSO grant—

"by roughly 30 per cent. between 1989-90 and 1992-93. This comes on top of a cut of over 50 per cent. which B.R. has already achieved since 1983. At the same time, capital investment for B.R. is set to rise, totalling £4·9 billion during the five years of the Plan. But whereas the grant which B.R. is losing comes from Central Government, the new investment is coming almost entirely from higher fares and traffic growth, together with property sales and loans from Government which have to be repaid with interest . . . the Committee believes Government should be providing more of it through grants rather than loans in recognition of the railways' role in relieving traffic congestion and improving the quality of life. Also, the C.T.C.C. has long been critical of the severe reductions in the level of P.S.O. Grant over the years. There have been many instances where services have been pruned or much-needed service improvements have not been made because of a lack of cash."

Those are the comments of a Government-appointed body.

Finally, on Network SouthEast, the CTCC says:

"Because of N.S.E.'s cash crisis, things are now going to get even worse."

That is not something which my hon. Friend the Minister or his constituents in London will regard with equanimity. The CTCC continues:

"In an attempt to meet its financial targets, N.S.E. is preparing to breach its quality objectives by introducing cuts in peak train services from May. This will mean fewer or shorter trains."

At the risk of offending BR, I have to say that I find its response to the CTCC somewhat economical with the truth. For example, it says:

"Electrification in South Hampshire and between Kings Lynn and Cambridge is not affected by the need for short term economies."

The reality is that, as from May, through trains from King's Lynn to London are to be discontinued and all passengers will have to change at Cambridge. That will not be regarded with equanimity by those travelling from Norfolk. British Rail also refers to "changes in demand patterns that we address twice a year with timetable changes."

I shall resist the temptation to weary the House with endless quotations. But I wonder how travellers from Eastbourne to London will feel when they find that the 7.42 am train to London Bridge is to be discontinued. That is the last through train of the morning from Eastbourne to London Bridge. The next through train from Eastbourne is the 8.37 am to Victoria. I imagine that plenty of people who will be affected by the results of changes in the PSO grant will find it hard to accept British Rail's proposition that everything has to do with changing service demand.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there are also extraordinary anomalies in the much-vaunted capital investment about which the Government are always telling us? The hon. Gentleman mentioned the electrification of the line from Cambridge to King's Lynn, which few would oppose. But is not it strange that there is to be one train an hour from Ely northwards, in remarkably sparsely populated country, while the Government refuse to consider the electrification of the line from Manchester to Blackpool —a relatively short route in a densely populated urban area with a great deal of traffic? Are not there anomalies in investment as well as in running?

Mr. Adley: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. The Manchester to Blackpool line is a classic example of shortsightedness in planning. I think that I am entitled to say on behalf of the Government that, as a result of their successful economic policy and the revenue that BR is attracting, a major investment programme is taking place on the railways. In Manchester, the construction of the Windsor link is the realisation of a dream that many people in that part of the world have nurtured for over a century. But to go ahead with the Windsor link, with all the new opportunities that that will create for rail travel in and through the city of Manchester and then not to sanction the electrification of the line from Manchester to Blackpool shows an inconsistency that is also evident in the Heathrow example that I gave a moment ago. Both are illustrations of shortsighted planning and the superimposition of unreal financial criteria on a transport problem. I believe that to be unjustifiable and unsatisfactory.

In a debate the other day, I referred to the fact that the Government and Conservative central office are happily proclaiming the amount of investment that is going to BR. Many of my hon. Friends who do not perhaps study these matters as closely as I do, because they have different primary political interests, will say, "Ah yes, surely we are right in saying that the Government are investing huge sums in BR." But that is not so. In 1982, 1983, 1985, 1986 and 1987, British Rail had no recourse whatever to borrowing from the national loans fund, and in 1984 and 1988 it had only limited recourse to the fund. Almost all the new investment is coming straight out of the pockets of Britsh Rail's customers. A brief from the Conservative research department the other day made some rather bland comments about the levels of railway investment. It would have been more straightforward had the brief simply said, "Her Majesty's Government are allowing British Rail to spend its own earnings." That is what is happening. The Government spend taxpayers' money on the road; British Rail spends its own earnings on its own investment programme.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I am loth to interrupt my hon. Friend's extremely skilful and persuasive speech, which is most welcome. In a debate on 14 February he dealt with similar matters. Has he been able to solve a puzzle that came to light then concerning the German system? Apparently, the premier capitalist economy in Europe—far more successful than we are, unfortunately —offers far more financial support through the investment programme and for other aspects of its railway system, which is already ahead of ours. Yet we are given to understand by the Secretary of State for Transport that German transport Ministers regard the subsidy and the granting of further amounts as an outrage. Has my hon. Friend been able to clarify that misunderstanding?

Mr. Adley: The answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow, East (Mr. Dykes) is yes. Yesterday afternoon I spent some time with Herr Rudolf Richter, the director in the United Kingdom and Ireland of the Deutsche Bundesbahn. In view of my hon. Friend's intervention, I shall deal with the question now. The current BR five-year investment programme entails an investment of £4·9 billion.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I must apologise to my hon. Friend for having missed the first part of his speech. I was half an hour late because BR took two hours, rather than the usual one and a half, to get me from Birmingham to London. I shall let that pass, however.

A few moments ago, my hon. Friend said that taxpayers paid for roads and that railways financed their own investment. That is not correct. Road users pay for road development. They contribute about £16 billion to the Exchequer each year and of that, only about £3·5 billion—rising to £5·7 billion in the next year or so—is paid back into roads. It is road users, not taxpayers, who pay for investment in roads.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend, who is a skilful and determined exponent of the road lobby, makes a foolish point which does not bear examination. It has never been the policy of any Government to indulge in taxation hypothecation. If we pursued his proposal to its logical conclusion, the Governmnt would spend all the money that they took in gambling taxes on building new casinos. He does not bother to ask himself——

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): That is silly.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend says that it is silly; perhaps he would like to intervene.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): He is a specialist.

Mr. Dickens: I am not a specialist but there is a lot of truth in what my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) says about road users. Commercial and domestic road users pay a devil of a lot of money into the Treasury, through vehicle and excise licences and taxes on petrol. It is foolish to argue that road users do not pay for the roads, but that users of the railway have to pay for investment in railways.

Mr. Adley: Without being too rude to my hon. Friend, I must say that I would rather he called me foolish than sensible. I do not know where he supposes the Minister of Defence, the Department of Health or the Department of Education and Science would get their funds. Perhaps he believes in the hypothecation of taxation. That would be the ultimate extremity of Right-wing politics and not something that I should find remotely attractive. One has only to contemplate that proposition to see how foolish it is.

Let me return to the pertinent question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East. British Rail's investment programme for the current five years is £4·9 billion. The Deutsche Bundesbahn's current five-year investment programme is 40 billion deutschmarks which at the current exchange rate is about £14 billion. That is the position on investment. What about operating deficit? In 1990 the Deutsche Bundesbahn's operating deficit, set by the West German Government is 4 billion deutschmarks, which is about £1·5 billion. That is the planned operating deficit, over and above the investment level. I am afraid that my hon. Friend the Minister will have to take this like a man. My hon. Friend planted a question for answer on Tuesday night—the night of the Budget statement—concerning British Rail's grant for 1989-1990. It was an extremely skilful and largely successful operation that managed to hide from the public almost completely what the Government's proposals were.

If my hon. Friend the Minister was proud of the cut in the PSO grant which is the much-vaunted policy of the Department of Transport he would not have sought to have a written question on the Order Paper on Budget day. He would have ensured that the Government's great achievement in cutting the PSO grant was trumpeted from the heights. However he, I and the House know that the constant attempt to cut the PSO grant and BR's operating subsidy—which was once the totem of Government monetarist policy—is increasingly a matter of shame. People know that a cut in the PSO grant is directly related to a cut in the quality of service.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Michael Portillo): I actually announced an increase in the PSO cash ceiling. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is saying that I was so ashamed about increasing the PSO cash ceiling that I tried to slip it out or whether possibly he misunderstood my parliamentary reply. If the latter is the case, I would be happy to explain the answer in a moment.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend the Minister announced in his written answer that BR's grant for 1989-90 was £488 million. I understand that that is £30 million or £35 million less than the PSO grant for the current year. If I am wrong, my hon. Friend the Minister will have to correct me. However, his written answer states:

"£8 million will be available only to accommodate the grant-aided sectors' share of additional safety-related expenditure, particularly that arising from Sir Anthony Hidden's report on the Clapham Junction rail accident."—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 534.]

I thoroughly enjoyed and wholly approved of the Budget presented by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, one item in the Budget that caused me considerable concern was the money that the Government are making available to finance safety at football grounds. Lord Justice Taylor's report on the Hillsborough accident was not too far removed in time from Sir Anthony Hidden's report on the Clapham rail disaster.

The Government's priority in the Budget on safety funding is to provide taxpayers' money for the pursuit of leisure—watching a bunch of thugs kick a football around on a Saturday afternoon. However, the Government will provide only £8 million of the estimated £500 million that BR will have to find to carry out the safety requirements in the Hidden report. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us today that the Government will announce that they will fund entirely the safety costs proposed by Sir Anthony Hidden in the same way that they have announced funding in relation to Lord Justice Taylor's proposals for football grounds.

I hope that my next comments will not be indecent. I want to share with the House a thought that has occurred to me. There is a certain irony about the Hillsborough tragedy which was caused by the late arrival of a large number of coaches at the football ground as a result of congestion on the M62 from Liverpool. The motorways on which those coaches travelled were provided by the taxpayer. Twenty or 30 years ago most of those football supporters would have travelled by rail. However, the coach is one of the most heavily subsidised forms of public transport in the country and British Rail has lost passengers to coach competition running on motorways that are funded 100 per cent. from taxpayers' money. Many British Rail regional managers have given up trying to attract the football thug traffic because most of their trains were vandalised. We could almost say that we are busily subsidising vandalism while we do nothing to subsidise safety on BR.

I want to consider track costs in relation to road versus rail. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East asked me about West Germany. Yesterday I asked Herr Richter, the director of Deutsche Bundesbahn, how he viewed the attitude of the West German Government towards the West German railways in relation to the British Government's attitude towards British Rail.

Mr. Dykes: They are both Conservative Governments.

Mr. Adley: Yes, indeed they are. Naturally, being a foreigner in Britain, Herr Richter did not want to make aggravating comments about Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Dickens: They are both successful Governments.

Mr. Adley: Yes, they are. However, if I were to ask, "Hands up. Who would swap the current economic circumstances in West Germany for those in Britain?", I suspect that some people would consider the West German example to be attractive. However, I do not want to be diverted on to that.

Herr Richter told me:

"Our Government has started to understand that a railway infrastructure and a railway system is more than just a business, it is part of the health of the people."

I believe that that proposition has not yet permeated through the inner portals of the Department of Transport or into the Government's thought processes.

My hon. Friend the Minister will understand me when I say that there is no shortage of lobbyists for the road transport industry in this country. The Department of Transport admits to having regular meetings with the Bus and Coach Council, the Freight Transport Association, the Road Haulage Association, the motor manufacturers, motor retailers, the Automobile Association, the RAC and the road building contractors—I was also going to say from Marples to McAlpine, but perhaps I should not say that.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Department of Transport makes it clear that about 80 per cent. of its priorities lie with roads and very few staff of the Department are involved in railways?

Mr. Adley: The hon. Lady may have missed the beginning of my speech in which I quoted the precise number of people involved. She is right, but I think that she overestimated the number of people in the Department involved in railways.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) should be aware that I am a member of the AA and the RAC. However, I am a member of those organisations to get help in the event of a breakdown. I did not join those organisations to have them lobby for me on political matters. The proposition that all their funds from membership fees should be available to them to promote roads, is something which I regard as abuse of my membership fee.

What is the position on lobbying in West Germany? I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East is in the Chamber because he will doubtless know all about the Verkehrsforum Bahn. That professional lobby was not established by one of those nefarious lobbying organisations, the inexorable growth of which we have witnessed in this country over the past few years. That organisation has sprung up and now includes 160 companies, banks, commerce and industry whose sole ambition is to lobby the German Government and West German public opinion on behalf of more investment in West German railways. We do not have such a body in this country.

British Rail management is part of the rail lobby in this country. However, the relationship between a nationalised industry and the Government of the day is so close and obvious that BR management cannot be considered as part of the rail lobby. If the management speaks out of turn, it is slapped down. Similarly, the trade unions could be construed to be a particular interest and cannot be considered an independent and powerful lobby. Then there is me, and I am just a lone voice. The rail lobby in this country is non-existent and it is a great shame that we cannot find a body like the Verkehrsforum Bahn which could lobby public opinion and the Government for more funding for the railway system.

The supervisory board of the Deutsche Bundesbahn has a particularly interesting line of activity between the Government and the railways, although the supervisory board is not really a lobbying organisation. It is an independent regulator. We in this country need an independent regulator between the Government and British Rail to check on British Rail's performance, fares and so on. Again, that would help to concentrate the minds of the warring parties.

Nothing better illustrates hon. Members' attitudes to safety matters than the way in which we deal in the House with transport accidents. There has only to be the slightest railway accident—even if one person is killed—for an hon. Member with a constituency interest to ask for a private notice question, and very often the request will be granted. Day in and day out our constituents are killed and maimed in road accidents—if one is dead, one is dead, and if one's family is bereaved, one's family is bereaved. It is every bit as tragic, whether it is a road or a rail accident. However, hon. Members do not make demands for private notice questions after road accidents, and we certainly do not see the headlines that we are accustomed to seeing whenever there is a rail problem.

I can illustrate another difference between road and rail. On the railways there is signalling to separate fast moving vehicles travelling in the same direction. Of course, we have no such signalling on our roads. There is a conflict between life and death on the one hand and personal convenience on the other. We put warnings on our cigarette packets, but we do not put warnings on our motor cars. The value of human life is high and, on the railways, is regulated by Parliament. The value of human life and limb on the roads is something which we are prepared to cast aside in the interests of personal convenience. If we were to put railway signalling systems on our roads we would save lives and, at one stroke, make British Rail the most attractive investment in the world, but nobody would dare do that.

What else do I have to say to the Department of Transport about its recent legislation?

Mr. Dickens: Nothing.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) says, "Nothing." I am sorry, but I have waited 20 years for this opportunity, and he will have a chance to have his say. I am prepared to sit down for a minute and take a vote on whether I should continue.

Coach deregulation has been a major contributor to congestion in this country. The Deputy Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan police wrote to me:

"You will be aware that in the Central Area problems with coaches are quite horrendous."

That is a direct result of the Government's legislation. The police are almost unable to cope with the problems of congestion and pollution caused by coaches. Hon. Members have only to go out of this building and walk across Westminster bridge, around Parliament square or anywhere around Victoria coach station to see what is happening. Coaches are parked and often left for hours on end with their engines running, pouring filthy diesel fumes up the noses of people who have the misfortune to live nearby. Coach engines are left running to provide air conditioning for the commuter passengers in the summer and to keep the heating going in the winter.

Some of my hon. Friends will recall the late Marcus Lipton who, at every state opening of Parliament, would make a speech about access to Parliament. I wonder what he would say now about the way in which coaches are clogging up the streets around Parliament square.

Commuter coaches in particular use motorways in peak hours, they park free in the streets and cause great congestion and pollution. That is a result of the coach deregulation problem. A few months ago, Sir Robert Reid said to me, "I wonder what people would say if I decided to park my trains at Piccadilly circus." One has only to state the position to understand the problem. For the city of Westminster, coach deregulation has been a near disaster, and they are still trying to come to terms with the problems which it has caused. While the coaches park in the streets paying nothing for so doing, British Rail of course pays a substantial sum in rates.

I do not know whether anyone has thought about that problem, but, as a result of questioning my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, I understand that the uniform business rate estimate for British Rail for 1990-91 is £56·5 million. Is that figure included in the Department of Transport's assessment of road versus rail costs? British Rail provides its own policies and maintains hundreds of listed buildings.

Everybody—even my hon. Friend the Minister—would agree that traffic wardens undertake an activity which is directly related to roads. There can be no question about that. One could say that, of course, 100 per cent. of traffic wardens costs should be allocated to road transport. Are they? No. Not 75 per cent., 50 per cent., 25 per cent., but only 7 per cent. of traffic wardens costs are allocated by the Department to road costs, and the other 93 per cent. is obtained from general taxation. That is only one of numerous examples.

We need a system that the West Germans are considering, whereby track costs of rail and road are assessed equally and funded equally by the State. Unless we get such a system we will not have a fair assessment.

I welcome the decision by my hon. Friend the Minister, which was announced recently by the Secretarty of State, to introduce cost-benefit analysis into some rail investment assessments. Our European competitors do that as a matter of course. A special plea concerns the Waterloo-Salisbury-Exeter line, which is a victim of historic railway rivalry. There is now but a single line westward of Salisbury to Exeter. That is the sort of insanity that only we in Britain could contemplate. The line runs through an area of considerable growth and prosperity, yet we have virtually an extended branch line. Any true cost-benefit analysis taking in the points that I have mentioned would ensure the reintroduction of a double track railway.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) is anxious to make some remarks about the Channel tunnel if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is essential to have a proper cost-benefit analysis of the need for a Channel tunnel rail link. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will make the great announcement for which we all await. My Channel Tunnel Act 1987 (Amendment) Bill comes up for Second Reading today. My hon. Friend the Minister may say, "We have changed our mind. We will not reject it this year as we did last year." Unless the Government are willing to fund a substantial part of a fast rail link between the Channel tunnel and London, we will continue to have a horse and cart railway line, which is ludicrous.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if the Government were to amend the 1987 Act and provide public money for the Channel tunnel, concomitant with that should be a complete study of the chosen route? The one that is currently on offer is not the best.

Mr. Adley: The hon. Gentleman has a particular point to make in regard to his constituency interest: the idea of ending the railway at Stratford. It might as well end at King's Lynn.

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend will have noticed that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) spoke from the Opposition Dispatch Box. Will my hon. Friend clarify whether the hon. Gentleman's intervention was an official statement of Labour policy?

Mr. Adley: No doubt the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) will elaborate.

Mr. Banks: Let me do that, because I am the Whip this morning. I make it quite clear that I never mentioned Stratford. I said that if public money is to be found, a proper public study of the route should be undertaken. It might not then be Stratford.

Mr. Adley: I have two points to make. First, that railway must finish in central London—there is no question about that. Secondly, the associated environmental costs must be borne by the Government.

Last week I was able to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the decision on the Winchester bypass, which included a substantial cost of returning the existing road—the A33 around Winchester—to greenery. Of course it is essential and right that that should be done, and of course the cost will be borne by the taxpayer. Yet again, the taxpayer will pay for all the environmental costs of that road, as with all roads, but British Rail is expected somehow to cope with the competing and conflicting interests of those who want the railway and want the fast travel and those who believe that a railway might cause environmental damage. Of course the Government must apply the same criteria to financial assistance for essential but environmentally sensitive transport links.

As part of its investment regime, SNCF, which is building the line to the Channel tunnel, receives 30 per cent. grant from the Government and low interest loans. To pick up on the point that has just been made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), when I recently spent a day with SNCF and the French Department of Transport in Paris—I am talking not about the trip that the hon. Member for Swansea, East and I enjoyed the other day, but about a trip that I made about a year ago—it was interesting to learn that the French Department of Transport insists that with every application for investment grant, SNCF must produce a 20-year do-nothing scenario. One can answer for oneself the question about what projections would flow from a 20-year do-nothing scenario on the route of the Channel tunnel rail link.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East and I enjoyed our visit to France. I am sure that he will agree that a great deal of the aggravation that is being promoted by certain people, some of whom have a clear financial and commercial interest in preventing the fast rail link from being built, about the so-called "environmmental damage" of the high-speed train is total and utter nonsense. He and I stood literally at track level by the TGV, which was travelling at 300 km an hour, and it was much less noisy than existing trains travelling on existing tracks.

Mr. Anderson indicated assent——

Mr. Adley: The hon. Gentleman is nodding. I am sure that he is confirming what I have said.

I want to make a point about environmental improvements and railways in relation to what the hon. Gentleman and I saw last week. My hon. Friend the Minister knows that I have a bee in my bonnet about the policy that has been pursued by successive Governments who have ripped up and sold off railway track when services have been discontinued. France has no such policy. The track bed belongs to the Government, not to SNCF. The TGV Atlantique runs right into the centre of Paris. About 10 km of that railway line has been built on a disused railway line that was closed in 1938 but which, because of the French Government's policy, had never been sold off or destroyed. Using modern technology and a route that has existed for years, the French have cut and covered and have built a brand new railway underground. In effect, on top of the line is 10 km of urban parkway, on either side of which beautiful houses have been built. Far from that railway line being an environmental problem, the French Government's policy has turned it into a huge environmental and social asset. That is what we should be doing in this country. Therefore, I hope that section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 will be repealed.

In due course, my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) will move his motion about public transport in London. The Government put forward three schemes under the central London rail study, aimed at relieving congestion in central London. The Paddington-Liverpool Street line was considered by most people who study these problems to be of the highest priority in relieving the congestion in central London. The Chelsea-Hackney line—another cross-London line—was the second priority for giving the greatest relief to the problems of congestion on the Underground. Third by quite a long way in environmental terms was the extension of the Jubilee line. It will be very nice for me, as a Member of Parliament, to be able to go directly by Underground from Westminster to Waterloo, but I cannot honestly say that my transport needs in London deserve the highest priority when I am trying to catch a train back to Dorset. Although I am sure that that proposal is welcome, especially to the property developers who will do very nicely, thank you very much, as a result of it, it is the least necessary of the schemes and the least likely to have any effect on dealing with congestion in central London.

I have made my point about selling off the track bed. Beeching's legacy on that has been a disaster and a scandal. British Rail may well own surplus land, such as marshalling yards, but to destroy the transport arteries that were the fruit of the labours and the investment of our forebears is beyond contemplation.

An attendant in the House has asked me to ensure that I mention the Somerset and Dorset Joint Railway. It is a classic example. There has been huge urban growth at both ends of the line, but the line itself has been destroyed. Perhaps I can do no better than to quote from page 82 of my forthcoming book, "Out of Steam", where, in a caption to a photograph, I wrote—[Interruption.] As I have said, it is to be published in August——

Mr. Tony Banks: What is the price?

Mr. Adley: We have had all that.

I wrote:

"Where that railway used to run:"—

the word "that" refers to the Somerset and Dorset line—

"and how we wish that it did still. Wimborne and Blandford have changed, as rural life is encapsulated by urban-orientated activity and mobility. This is the S&D bridge over the River Stour at Sturminster Newton. The erstwhile small towns at the heart of the countryside pierced originally by the Dorset Central and Somerset Central railways, feel the pincer of pressure at both ends, as Bath and Bristol, Poole and Bournemouth, seek to extend their influence, road pressure and congestion grow and we are left only to mourn the shortsighted selling-off of land that once provided a transport link."

I could weary the House by talking indefinitely about other railway lines that were closed in the wake of Beeching. I could refer, for example,to the Great Central Railway, which was the only railway line in this country to be built to the Berne gauge—how we mourn it. I could also refer to the Waverley route between Carlisle and Edinburgh. Barbara Castle's legacy hangs heavy on those of us who mourn the loss of so many railway lines.

My hon. Friend the Minister has allowed me to refer in my motion to the importance of his decision, and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), in refusing to grant BR's closure proposals for the Settle-Carlisle railway line. That most important decision was not taken simply to please enthusiasts. It was significant because, in attempting to meet the criteria that had been laid down by successive Governments for closing railway lines, British Rail has fiddled the figures over the years by increasing the costs of operating railway lines, overestimating the costs of repairs to structures and generally doing everything that it could to reduce the revenue of lines by destroying connections and making the train times the least convenient.

The Settle-Carlisle line was a classic example. The Glasgow-Nottingham trains were moved away and all the freight traffic was taken from the line. The connections to Leeds and Carlisle were broken. Even so, British Rail was still not satisfied. It said that it would cost more than £6 million to repair the Ribblehead viaduct. Of course, the viaduct has been repaired for a tiny fraction of that sum. As a result of the Government's brave decision, there is now a chance that other threatened railway lines may be reprieved. I certainly hope so.

I do not know the purpose of railway privatisation. Perhaps some of my colleagues who have advocated it will be able to enlighten me. I do not know what its purpose would be other than pure party political dogma, which is not good enough for me. The competition argument about privatisation is total nonsense. Beeching saw to that. There used to be competition between London and Birmingham. There used to be a service from Euston to New Street and from Paddington to Snow Hill. There were also links between London and Nottingham—between Marylebone and Nottingham, Victoria, and between St. Pancras and Nottingham, Midland——

Mr. Roger King: My hon. Friend has mentioned competition between London and Birmingham. I wish that there had been some competition this morning. The monopoly of the service on the old London-Midland region line, which is now electrified, would have been more than enhanced for me if I could have travelled to Snow Hill station on a high-speed train via Reading, Leamington and High Wycombe to Paddington. We used to be able to do that in the old days. There is no reason why that could not be reinstated.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend tempts me. I do not know whether he is aware that that line has been deliberately destroyed and reduced to single track. The fascinating thing about my hon. Friend's point is that that part of the line that he has just mentioned, via Coventry, covered part of the former Great Western Railway and part of the former London, Midland and Scottish Railway. A classic example of one of the advantages of a nationalised railway is that the best possible service can be provided by using whatever track is available. As far as I understand it, there is nothing to stop my hon. Friend approaching his friends in the City, Birmingham or anywhere else, and saying, "Let us build a new railway line." All they need is a little bit of money. I do not believe that there is any legislative barrier——

Mr. Dykes: Run by Lord Hanson.

Mr. Adley: Indeed. There is no legislative barrier to prevent their doing so. We have only to look at the Channel tunnel rail link to see the real barriers to the building of new private railways in this country. Beeching and the policy pursued by successive Governments have removed the reality of railway competition in Britain. The use of the word competition in relation to privatisation is an unreal proposition.

The railways carry people and freight safely and reliably. They alleviate traffic congestion in towns and cities all over Britain. Without the railway, travel would become intolerable, if not impossible. If the freight that they carry were translated on to lorries on the roads, the cost in terms of pollution and wear and tear on the roads would be ghastly.

The hours worked by railwaymen are among the most unsocial imaginable, for which they receive little credit. The Government seem to make British Rail feel guilty for being in receipt of public funds when no other European Government would contemplate squeezing and reducing the amount of public funding at a time of increasing road traffic and growing concern about the environment. A sensible Government would look at ways of increasing the share of the traffic that the railways can carry. They would copy the West German example of cajoling traffic on to the railways with a pricing policy which clearly has that aim.

Criticising British Rail is a national obsession, as my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield has shown this morning. Whereas most of our European partners are proud of their railways and have every reason so to be, in our hearts many of us still prefer to knock the system, rather than concentrate ways of improving and adapting it to serve the needs of the nation. I hope that as a result of this debate, we can persuade the Department of Transport, through my hon. Friend the Minister, to look again at the investment criteria of road versus rail.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), particularly when he speaks sense, as he did in great abundance this morning from his unparallelled experience in the House and his knowledge of our railway system. Brief as it was, I felt that his speech was perhaps a trailer for his book. The only thing that he did not mention about his book was the publisher——

Mrs. Dunwoody: And the price.

Mr. Anderson: —and the price, as my hon. Friend says. Perhaps he will enlighten us about that later.

I was intrigued when the hon. Gentleman said that he hoped that the Minister would say something positive about the Channel tunnel rail link. The Minister looked down a little gloomily at that point. Perhaps we could put it in the context of the Mid-Staffordshire by-election. It is the only reference that I shall make to it because I do not believe in loading grief on grief. Prior to the by-election, one saw the Government's panic reaction to the poll tax in Scotland. As the Government become more panicked, they throw goodies overboard. As they have done on the Scottish poll tax, perhaps the Government will have a quick rethink about the Channel rail link. We might have some pleasurable reaction this morning, but that remains to be seen.

I shall make only three propositions. First, there appears to be a consensus among our people that the condition of British Rail is a national scandal. Secondly, the stagnation in British Rail, as the hon. Member for Christchurch said, is in sharp contrast to what we see among our competitors and partners on the Continent, particularly in the SNCF and Bundesbahn. Thirdly, the stagnation seems to stem from the Government's ideological obsession and apparent pathological distaste for rail, whatever the reason for it. The reason may be the solidarity of the rail unions or the fact that the railways are still one of the pieces of family silver that has not yet been sold off. One sees it symbolically in the way that the Prime Minister adamantly refuses to travel by rail. I am told that the only journey that she has made was from London to Gatwick. Symbolically and otherwise, leading members of the Government have no attachment to our rail industry. It remains one of the under-utilised assets in our country today.

I shall be brief about the condition of British Rail because much of what I would have said was said more eloquently by the hon. Member for Christchurch. He drew on the central transport consultative committee report published this month. The report is worth reading in detail by all hon. Members and by the Government. As the hon. Gentleman said, the committee was not a rail lobby as such, but people appointed by the Government, many of whom are close to the Government, and of Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) will be aware that the same point applies to the transport users consultative committee in Wales. Increasingly, true believers in Government policy have been put on that committee. But even they have gone native, as the Prime Minister might say. They have voiced strong criticisms of the rail system in Wales.

No one can seriously deny that there has been a decline in British Rail. Overcrowding and poor timekeeping were reflected in the CTCC report. The points that it made about British Rail's 1989 corporate plan covering the years from 1989-90 to 1993-94 are well made. The new objectives demand a reduction in the public service obligation grant of about 30 per cent. on top of the 50 per cent. cut since 1983. Who can forget the eagerness with which Sir Robert Reid told the Government that he could go even further than the Government wanted? That showed that his was a disastrous appointment. He made only a few plaintive criticisms of Government policy at the very end of his tenure.

The lost Government grant has been countered by new investment from higher fares. Higher fares are likely only to drive people from the railways. Traffic growth is based on an assumed growth of the economy which is not now accepted by the Treasury. In its corporate plan, British Rail is forced by the Government to assume an annual growth of 2·7 per cent. per annum, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer this week, in his Budget, said that we should assume only a 1 per cent. increase in the growth rate. Thus the very basis on which the Government assume that new revenue will be generated for the railways has been undermined by the Government's own forecast.

We know that since then demand for rail travel has fallen substantially. Hence the British Rail cuts which are in prospect in May of this year and cuts in various sectors, whether Network SouthEast, where the CTCC said that the reduction in manpower at stations made stations a "playground for vandals", or InterCity, for which the subsidy was ended in 1988, leading to overcrowding and cancellations.

It is hardly surprising that the CTCC ended its report by stating:

"British Rail is in trouble. The financial targets set out in the Corporate Plan are seen as a 'virility' symbol which must be achieved even though the financial climate has changed and whatever the costs to the passenger in service cutbacks, delayed investment or higher fares. Meanwhile, many thousands of commuters are forced to endure the daily degradation of travelling in grotesquely overcrowded trains and because of BR's decisions, this will get worse."

That was the indictment of the CTCC.

One sees problems in terms of service quality on the line I regularly use and which I shall use this afternoon—the south Wales lines from Swansea to London. In the early 1970s when high-speed trains on InterCity were introduced, we were at the forefront of development in Europe. It is fair to say that since that marvellous investment in HST, which cut transport times, there has been a substantial period of stagnation, if not a fall, in the quality of services on that line. In south Wales, because we cannot meet the Government's criteria for electrification, we are likely to have to endure the current 125 diesel services which are now obsolescent in today's world. We are likely to endure them for 15 years until the life expiry time of those services.

Those of us who travel on London Underground can see a similar problem in terms of service compared with other countries. I travel regularly on the underground system from Holland Park, which is where I live in London. When I reach Holland Park station, I expect at least one of the two underground lifts to be out of operation. At Notting Hill, I expect at least one of the two escalators to be out of operation. At least we have loudspeakers now, but they tell us only of cancellations and problems. Eventually, I arrive at Westminster, which is one of the more squalid of the underground stations in London. I am sure that there are even worse examples, but Westminster is one of the major tourist areas. I was recently there with a Norwegian friend, who is pro-British. He was ashamed at the squalor which he saw in the station. That sums up much of our public transport system.

The squalor and stagnation on the south Wales line and with the HSTs is in stark contrast with what is to be seen in France. The hon. Member for Christchurch mentioned the visit to France on 6 February. There we saw the TGV Atlantique. That is the new system, following the success of the Paris-Lyon route. There is a new system snaking out in a Y from Paris to Le Mans and from Paris to Tours. By June, the TGV system will be in operation to Bordeaux in the south-west. Many of the trains travel at 300 km an hour, which is roughly 186 mph.

I shall compare current journey times within the French railway system and the cost per mile with those factors within the British system. My examples are Paris-Angers in the Loire valley and London-Swansea, south Wales. Angers is as far away from Paris as Swansea is from London, yet in terms of travel time it is as far away from London as Bristol, Temple Meads. The two routes—Paris-Angers and London-Swansea—are exactly 191 miles. The TGV time from Paris to Angers is 1 hour 29 minutes and the HST time from London to Swansea is 2 hours 37 minutes. The average speed on the TGV route is 129 mph and the average on the HST line is 73 mph. A single fare from Paris to Angers is £22·80 and from London to Swansea it is £30. The fares per mile in France are about a third lower than the equivalent fares within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Roger King: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will take into account the cost of super-saver tickets. British Rail offers a wide range of fares and it is not fair, if I may use that word, to pick only one example from it. British Rail's pricing policy, rightly or wrongly, is to offer a wide range of fares. It could be that it is cheaper to travel from Paddington to Swansea using a super-saver ticket than from Paris to Angers.

Mr. Anderson: If I were to take all the fares that come within the bewildering range that is offered by British Rail and compare them like for like with the fares within the French system, I should be on my feet for a long time. I have tried, so far as it is possible, to make a fair comparison between one and the other. I think that it would be accepted generally that the equivalent cost of fares in France is about 30 per cent. less than those in the United Kingdom. If the hon. Gentleman can find a means of travelling more cheaply at odd hours in the United Kingdom compared with the cost of travelling in France, let him advance that argument. I have tried to make an honest comparison.

Morale within the French railway system is much higher than in the British system. The French railwaymen have pride in their jobs because they are in a growth industry. There is a buoyant feel in the French railway system, and the environmental benefits that have been gained as a result of investing in it are there to be seen. The financial regimes in France and the United Kingdom are entirely different. In France, there is a greater concern for planning transport throughout the network and with environmental matters than there is in the United Kingdom. In France, there is a willingness to consider regional factors in a way that is not done within our system. One example is the projections for the Paris-Strasbourg line, which cannot be warranted on normal commercial criteria. When it comes to electrification in south Wales and on the south-west line, the Government merely parrot, "The line does not meet the financial criteria which we, the Government, have set."

The result of the non-electrification of the south Wales line will be the exclusion of south Wales from the major benefits of the Channel tunnel. We shall be unable to lock into the electrified system to the tunnel. We know that the Channel tunnel could have adverse regional effects, and those effects will be magnified as a result of the rail regime which the Government impose upon British Rail by their financial policy.

I shall not bore the House by referring to all the available statistics on rail investment as a percentage of gross domestic product, but the latest available figures show that the United Kingdom is at the bottom of the list with the Republic of Ireland.

It is my submission that the crisis in British Rail—the squalor and the stagnation which are so manifest—is due primarily to Government policy. The difficulties with the Channel link can be compared, symbolically, with what is being done in France to effect links with the Channel. The TGV will come from Paris to the Channel port and to Brussels.

Non-electrification means that south Wales has had a poor deal. The journey time from Cardiff to London is about two hours and the projected journey time in 1993, with the opening of the Channel tunnel, from London to Paris will be three hours. That should mean that the journey time from Cardiff to Paris will be five hours. The result of non-electrification is that only one train a day arrives at Waterloo from south Wales, and a change of trains is involved. That is due to lack of imagination in Government policy.

The Secretary of State for Transport laid bare his views on British Rail on the television programme "On the Record" on 25 February. I was so appalled by what I heard that I thought that I would watch the programme again to see whether I had had too good a Sunday lunch on that day. I shall quote some of the Secretary of State's remarks during his interview with David Dimbleby. When talking about rail investment, he said:

"I set out options for people to choose."

He spoke of

"what 56 million people may choose to do with their money".

He seemed to suggest that that was of no concern to him. He said:

"If you offer a range of items, the public is capable of choosing the ones which suit it."

He added:

"It is not my job to say to people that they should travel by rail."

It is the Secretary of State's job to inspire policies that can influence the mode which people choose, whether they be planning policies in cities and outwith them, or subsidies for environmental reasons for the perceived public good. A transport policy cannot be based on the aim of cutting subsidies without regard to environmental gains, such as reducing congestion and vehicle emissions. If this most ideological of Governments opt out of investing in British Rail, they are failing the nation.

10.59 am

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Over the past few years I have often disagreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on a range of issues, particularly transport matters. However, I am glad that he reminded me that we tramped through the Division Lobby frequently a couple of years ago in our opposition to the community charge. I am also delighted that, he has taken up the cause of the Network SouthEast commuters, many of whom are from my constituency. I entirely echo the words that he used about their plight.

I suppose that over the past century almost every hon. Member has used in the House or at public meetings Disraeli's great dictum:

"There are three kinds of lies: lies, damned lies and statistics."

We could paraphrase that by saying that there are three sorts of damned statistics: statistics, misleading statistics and the performance statistics put out by Network SouthEast.

My constituents were, to put it mildly, astonished to learn that 92 per cent. of Network SouthEast's trains arrive on time and that 98·6 per cent. of them run at all. Those figures have been greeted in my constituency with disbelief, indeed hilarity. One of the great advantages of being a Member of Parliament is that generally one does not have to travel during the rush hour. However, my secretary comes up from my constituency virtually every day on the train. When I told her, earlier this week, that 98·6 per cent. of the trains that she tried to catch were running and 92 per cent. of them arrived on time she first laughed, then she began to cry and then it seemed that hysteria was about to set in. We gave her a mild sedative and sent her home in a minicab. Many of my constituents know that travelling on Network SouthEast is a nightmare.

I appreciate the Government's argument that it is wrong that taxpayers in the less prosperous parts of the country should be taxed in order to subsidise fares in one of the most prosperous parts of the nation. However, the practical facts that my constituents have to face are that the reduction and rapid phasing out of the subsidy will mean fewer trains at peak times and at off-peak times, and more unmanned stations.

Therefore, I suggest to the able Minister who is to respond to this debate a form of compromise. In 1992, we shall see the introduction of the new Networker trains which hold out considerable hope for my constituents. I urge the Minister to stop the phasing out of the subsidy at least until after 1992, when the new Networker trains have become standard throughout Network SouthEast.

We all know that in a matter of days my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be faced with demands for a substantial subsidy to pay for the high-speed rail link between the Channel tunnel and the centre of London. Recently, the Economist Intelligence Unit, commenting on the present planning position on the high-speed rail link, said:

"It seems astonishing that a rail based project costing up to £7 billion can have got so far without British Rail having come up with a viable solution for joining it to the rest of the rail network. Such inertia, not to say incompetence, may well affect investors's views when they are asked to provide more money to finance cost overruns."

I admit that I am torn because I realise the dilemma facing my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. My constituents are strong supporters of the Ove Arup scheme, which would mean that lines would be built far away from Bromley, ending up at Stratford. I appreciate my constituents' wish that the lines should run far away from Bromley, but I have the gravest doubts about whether Stratford is the right place for a high-speed rail link to end up. My constituents are also fearful that no viable proposition of any sort will be put forward and the new traffic generated by the Channel tunnel will run on existing tracks, many of which pass through Bromley. That would not only be an environmental calamity for some of the people who live near the existing railway tracks, but would add substantially to the congestion on some of the most crowded and intensively used railway lines anywhere in the country.

The British Rail consortium on the European rail link has made it perfectly plain that it opposes the Stratford route. I do not suppose that the Treasury will be much encouraged by the fact that that route is backed by the Bechtel Construction Company, the largest and one of the most profitable construction companies in the entire world, which knows a gravy train when it sees one. But I have considerable doubts about the wisdom of pouring billions of pounds of taxpayers' money into a venture that may make as little economic sense as Concorde.

The argument in favour of the high-speed rail link is largely based on the success of the Paris-Lyon TGV line which came into operation in the early 1980s. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) referred to their trip to France on 6 February this year to see the TGV trains in operation. That very week The Economist contained an article on future train investment in Europe saying:

"The change in passenger behaviour on routes between Paris and south-east France after the introduction of TGVs in 1981 was indeed striking. In 1980, about 1 million people flew and 2 million took the train from Paris to Lyon; now about 500,000 fly and 5 million take the two hour train journey."

It went on:

"But Paris-London is not Paris-Lyon."

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend is right. Does he agree that among the inevitable repercussions that a genuine high-speed link between London and Paris would bring, one of the great side benefits would be a substantial disincentive for people to fly from London to Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam, thus releasing valuable air services at Heathrow and Gatwick? That saving in cash and environmental terms should be a perfectly genuine factor for the Government to take into account in assessing the advantages of investing in a high speed rail link.

Sir Philip Goodhart: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing me on to my next point. I believe that in the next few years there will be a vast expansion in the air traffic between Britain and the Continent. Quite clearly, between now and the middle of the next decade there will be increased deregulation between the air traffic companies which will inevitably lead to lower fares. The distance between Heathrow and Charles de Gaulle is almost exactly the same as the distance between New York La Guardia airport and Washington DC Capitol airport. The one-way fare between London and Paris is £95; the fare on the admirable shuttle service between New York and Washington is $95. Given the increased deregulation that is bound to occur, air travel between London and Paris and London and Brussels is certain to become cheaper.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that air space will not expand and that our air traffic control system is still underresourced, undermanned and in need of considerable investment which it will get late and which will certainly take some time to come into operation?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for leading me on exactly to my next point. In the next decade, there will be substantial improvements in air traffic control, access to airports and handling of aircraft on the ground. Under the present scheme for improving air traffic control there will be 30 per cent. higher capacity at Heathrow by 1995 and £30 million is being spent on extra terminal facilities for dealing with shuttle services. I am sure that I join my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch in hoping that the rail link between Heathrow and Paddington will be completed as quickly as is humanly possible.

I believe that there will also be more air space in the next few years as part of the peace dividend. At the moment, one of the constrictions on air travel in Europe is the amount of air space that is taken by military flying. Given the peace divided and the reduction in flights by the Royal Air Force and the French, German and American air forces which is bound to occur in the next few years, there will be more air space for civilian air traffic. That suggests to me that the competition between the airlines and the high-speed rail link is considerably greater than many of the experts would admit.

However, British Rail has substantially underestimated the amount of freight that is likely to move on rail to the Channel tunnel and beyond. I am exceedingly unhappy about British Rail's current proposals for handling that freight. It seems to envisage that most of it will run on lines through west London and south London that are already congested and there will be a Beckenham bottleneck.

Mr. Adley: As it seems we are now allowed to advertise, has my hon. Friend seen the book that I wrote called, "Tunnel Vision" which includes a proposal fully to utilise the railway line built in the 1870s with the Channel tunnel in mind, which runs from Ashford to Redhill round through Guildford to Reading? That line exists and is in use. It needs to be improved and some of it needs to be electrified, but if British Rail cannot meet the Government's investment criteria, does my hon. Friend support that proposal which would help to solve his constituents' problems?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I am willing to pass him a pen in the hope that he will autograph his pamphlet which, in view of my own cash flow problems, I hope he will give me free.

We need to look anew at the way in which British Rail should handle that freight problem, and I believe that my hon. Friend's proposals are entirely sensible.

We shall face a crunch in a few weeks' time. We know that the main players in the Channel tunnel rail link game are to meet the Minister, when they will tell him, "If you don't put up the money, there will be no chance of a high-speed or freight rail link being built." I have an ambivalent attitude towards the Channel tunnel. I do not dispute that it would be a pity if, having progressed so far, that extraordinary engineering project was not completed. However, I suspect that many of my constituents hope in their hearts that the tunnel will fail financially—and I believe that it will, unless my hon. Friend the Minister makes public money available soon.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I congratulate the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on bringing his motion before the House. If the hon. Gentleman were moved to the Government Front Bench, there is even a chance that the Government might be saved —but I do not expect that to happen.

The rail system in my constituency was butchered by Beeching when his axe fell. Some 110 rail men lost their jobs when the lines from Brecon to Swansea, to Newport, to Merthyr, to Hereford and to Newtown were all closed in 1962. There is a strong case for reopening at least one of those lines and connecting it to the national rail network. The population in my area has increased considerably. In the town of Brecon, it has grown by one third. There is clearly a need for that part of my constituency to be linked again with the national rail system. In a more enlightened age, that may happen.

The debate concerns rail investment on an equal basis with road investment. It is ludicrous for the rail system to be judged by a criterion of an 8 per cent. return on capital investment. Road congestion costs this country £20 billion per annum, and half that is accounted for in the London area alone. We are paying that massive on-cost every year as a consequence of neglecting the rail system.

The British Rail network is one of the few in Europe whose investment is not judged by cost benefit analysis. In recent months, the Government have changed their attitude very slightly and the Department of Transport is beginning to think again. A comparison between the French and British railways reveals the extent of the problem. Over the next 10 years, the French will invest £2 billion per annum in rail capital projects, whereas in the 1990-91 financial year, British Rail will invest just £618,000—a sum wholly inadequate to sustain the system.

What are the consequences of that differential in investment? I, together with other members of the Welsh Select Committee studying Channel tunnel rail links with the Continent, found—as was said by the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart)—that SNCF's TGV virtually knocked out air traffic between Lyons and Paris, and over the past 10 years it has carried 100 million passengers. That success has enabled further investment in the TGV Atlantique route between Paris and Rennes. There continues to be a vast growth in rail passenger traffic in France.

Construction will begin shortly on a rail route of 114km that will bypass Paris, at a cost of £1·7 billion. It will also link Charles de Gaulle airport to the rail system, making that route the hub of the European transport system. It will cut two hours from the rail journey between Lyons and Lille in northern France, as trains will not have to travel through Paris. That is what I call a transport system with vision. The scope exists not only for increasing passenger traffic but freight. There is also massive scope for construction in this country of a Berne gauge spine to take all freight traffic, as we have massive problems in transferring freight between the continental rail system and our own.

Mr. Roger King: I listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman's comments on the construction of a rail route bypassing Paris. Does he imagine that London residents would accept the construction of such a link if British Rail proposed building one around the capital? Experience suggests that however green rail travel might appear to be, no one wants it.

Mr. Livsey: I shall come to that point shortly. I believe that the British public would accept such a project.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Can the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) say how many miles of motorway could be built for the £1·7 billion that it is costing to construct 114km of French rail bypass?

Mr. Livsey: I cannot instantly recall the cost of constructing one mile of motorway, but perhaps another hon. Member can do so. However, I am sure that the figure is very high.

Mr. Adley: That question can be answered by pointing out that it cost £2 billion to reopen the Thameslink line that already existed. The answer to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) is that most of the lines for a rail bypass around London also already exist and only small additional links would need to be constructed between them. Many of the existing lines are currently unused, and most are underused.

Mr. Livsey: I thank the hon. Member for Christchurch for that expert information.

The criterion of an 8 per cent. return on capital militates against specific projects. As the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr Anderson) said, it militates against investment in the south Wales, Bristol, Great Western line, which will not be electrified under that criterion. However, electrification would proceed under cost benefit analysis. One consequence of the criterion is that there will be no daytime links to the Channel tunnel and to the Continent because of the absence of electrification. That means that south Wales, Bristol and the south-west, Hereford and Gloucester, Oxford, Swindon and Reading will have no direct link with the Channel tunnel. That is absolute madness.

Why cannot specific projects be judged by cost benefit analysis? Why not have a London rail bypass? The costs of the M25 and of its widening have already been great in terms of environmental damage, so why not construct a high-speed rail link running alongside the M25? Who from the regions and countries of Britain actually wants to stop in London? We want to travel to Madrid, Moscow, or to eastern Europe, as it is opened up. We do not want to stop in London and to experience its massive problems of traffic congestion.

There is no reason why the bypass could not be linked with mainline stations in London, with speed limits for trains of 60 or 70 mph. It would avoid dragging up half of London and the suburbs and would link with the national rail system. It would mirror the Paris bypass, which has been costed at £1·7 billion, and would speed up travelling times between the regions and the Continent for passengers and freight. It would benefit the environment and would reduce the number of people and the amount of traffic in London. Its environmental cost would be far less than putting masses of concrete over southern Britain for more roads. In the context of 1992 and beyond, it would have many benefits for British industry and tourism.

It may be asked how we would find the money to pay for that bypass. In the Budget, the Chancellor paid off £7 billion of the national debt, and some of that money would have been better invested in our rail infrastructure.

The cost to the environment of the road system is immense. The Department of Transport forecasts a 142 per cent. increase in road transport by 2025. People in the south-east should not shrink from seeking basic improvements in rail infrastructure, because more roads will be far worse for the environment.

Figures for 1987 show that 98 million tonnes of carbon dioxide is emitted from road traffic per annum in Britain. The figures for nitrous oxide and carbon monoxide are enormous. When one considers that it takes 25 acres of land to construct one mile of motorway, one appreciates the environmental cost of road systems.

The statistics on road accidents are horrific. Figures for between 1980 and 1986 show that 40,000 people were killed on the roads, whereas over the same period there were only 32 deaths on the railways. What a safety comparison.

Rail subsidies vary tremendously between one country and another. The subsidy per kilometre of track in Italy is £10·52p, in France £5·83p but in Britain £1·95p. The public service obligation is essential to some routes, particularly to the central Wales line in my constituency. It is assisted by that subsidy and has remained open sometimes because it runs through five marginal constituencies.

The fares situation is also scandalous. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs discovered that fares in Britain are 60 per cent. higher than in France, where rail transport is much more competitive. British Rail's fares policy paints a very unattractive picture. In 1978, a return ticket from London to Brighton cost £5·65p, but in 1989 it cost £16·20—an increase of 200 per cent., while the increase in the retail prices index over the same period was 115 per cent. That is a quite astonishing state of affairs.

When the Channel tunnel is open, the British public will be horrified by the comparison between the modern continental system and our ancient and inefficient system. They will travel on faster, cleaner and cheaper services and will demand the same for this country. We need to have the foresight now to do something about it.

For six months, the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs studied links between Wales and the Channel tunnel. It recommended, first, electrifiction of the south Wales and west of England routes to enable direct links to the Channel tunnel. That is the only way that we shall get them. Secondly, it advocated electrification of the Crewe and Holyhead route and talks with the Irish Government on how best to achieve it. Thirdly, it advocated a Berne gauge freight link to penetrate all major manufacturing areas of Britain to enable industry to compete with that on the Continent. Fourthly, it advocated cost benefit analysis of rail investment. It regarded that as extremely important. Fifthly, it advocated repeal of section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. That Act must cover not only private sector fundng but mixed funding. We are burying our heads in the sand if we allow section 42 to cover only private sector funding. I gather that Trafalgar House, one of the main groups involved in the Dover to London link, is screaming for public money because it cannot make that route pay. Sixthly, the Select Committee advocated that British Rail should treat European funds as a net increase in resources. Such a programme is required.

There is little vision in the Department of Transport. The Secretary of State and the Minister for Public Transport should radically change their policy and thinking on rail investment. Our forefathers would have looked with astonishment on our attitudes to rail investment and on the Government's blinkered view on the means of evaluating rail investment.

It is time for us to roll up our sleeves and to bring Britain into the 21st century with a modern rail system serving all our citizens and industry, bringing tourists into this country and creating greater international understanding and offering us the quality of life that we desperately need.

11.37 am

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on his choice of subject and on the distinctive style with which he presented his case.

The surveys that have been carried out of the priorities of those considering locations for industrial investment reveal very clearly that good transport links are high on their list and that they vie with the availability of skilled labour. Invariably, they are even regarded as more important than such factors as the availability of regional grants. As far as rail links are concerned, the Bradford area has been competing under the burden of a real handicap. For reasons of historic and geographic accident, the city has never enjoyed the access to the national rail network possessed by its larger neighbour, Leeds, and other cities of comparable size. The position might have been better if, in the last century, two competing rail companies had not left Bradford with two stations permanently separated and half a mile apart. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch could give its history in considerable detail.

A fleeting opportunity now exists to redress the balance and to provide the city and its immediate hinterland with an advantage that would act as a crucial lever in attracting further private investment to an area that certainly needs it. Recently, under the wise leadership of local Conservative control, Bradford has attracted more than £1 billion of investmemt in the west end, Forster square and other imaginative redevelopment schemes. However, a city whose traditional industries are textiles and engineering can never rest on its laurels because it will always be vulnerable to fleeting changes in the economic climate, in fashion and demand.

The major rail proposals which are about to come before my hon. Friend the Minister of State for consideration involve the electrification of the route between Leeds and Bradford, Forster square via Shipley, and the local network immediately to the north; the Airedale line from Leeds and Bradford through Shipley and Keighley to Skipton; and the Wharfedale line from the two cities to Burley in Wharfedale and Ilkley. These proposals follow hard on the heels of the encouraging results of the intermediate Transmark study for the passenger transport executive which was completed in January.

Inadequate rail services are a major headache for thousands of commuters and essential travellers. Overcrowded and often unreliable trains largely reflect burgeoning demand combined with inadequate investment in the past. Electrification will create a fast, reliable service on each of the three routes that I have mentioned and will enable British Rail InterCity services on the new electrified east coast main line—we are delighted to have it—to run on to Bradford from London and all points in between.

The capital costs of these schemes require an investment of some £20 million for wiring the routes and providing the power supply and for engineering works to bridges, tunnels and the lineside to provide adequate clearance and safety. We are talking also about an initial 17 train units, at a cost of up to £2 million each. The amounts are not inconsiderable, but they must be set in the context of the fact that the local authority has a revenue budget equivalent to that total figure every few months.

The time scale is crucial. The design and implementation of the scheme could take more than two years. There is now a limited window of opportunity which could enable the scheme to be operational by May 1993 at a cost that would be considerably lower than if a decision were delayed. To take full advantage of this opportunity, authorisation by the Secretary of State must be granted by May, and I realise how little time this gives for a decision.

The need for a speedy decision relates largely to the completion of electrification works on the southern section of the east coast main line. It would enable the West Yorkshire PTE to take advantage of the Doncaster electrification depot, providing an immediate saving of £650,000, and to carry out the works at the most favourable price, for it is likely to rise by at least 10 per cent. once the main line works are complete and the team is dispersed. There is also a chance to order the trains at optimum prices by linking them to an existing order from British Rail. The passenger transport authority, Bradford city council and British Rail are together saying to my hon. Friend the Minister of State that they believe that the scheme can be justified not only in terms of the investment criteria of the Department of Transport by bringing about additional revenue and cost savings, showing more than an 8 per cent. rate of return over its lifetime, but in terms of the broad economic and environmental benefits to millions of people in Bradford and west Yorkshire which would be highly visible, even if they were hard to quantify.

As for operating costs, electric trains require less maintenance than diesels and, because they are more reliable and efficient, not as many are needed. The supplanted diesel rolling stock could relieve other overcrowded services in the county. It is calculated that the savings to local services could be £900,000 per annum, in addition to operational savings for InterCity. The present plans for British Rail's Bradford services involve a change of traction at Leeds, because the Leeds-Bradford line can take only diesels at present.

Obviously the improvements in reliability and performance will result in more passengers on local rail services, generating considerable additional revenue. Reliability and comfort are critical factors, as they are in many other places. At present, many trains are late and too many passengers are unable to find a seat at peak periods. Potential customers are prepared to pay more for their journey if they can be sure of travelling in comfort and on time. I am prepared to say for myself that some increase in fares would strengthen the case for electrification arising out of the Transmark study. It is likely also that an improved service would attract more revenue to British Rail by drawing local people to link with InterCity.

The environmental return will come about largely by a transfer from car to train. There are projected road improvements in the Aire and Wharfe valleys, but their time scale is uncertain and they will remain relatively congested for years to come. Electrification provides dividends in terms of less air pollution—a factor which will also count for more in the future.

I now come to the wider economic case for Bradford electrification. The city council has said that the provision of good public transport is crucial to the city's future. Only half of Bradford's households have access to a car, a figure well below the national average. Electrification is, in effect, the only way that Bradford could truly be retained on the British Rail InterCity network—which I hope everyone would agree is vital. It would surely be unthinkable for the fifth largest metropolitan district and the eighth largest city in Britain to be relegated to a branch line, as would, in effect, be the case.

Connections to the InterCity network and to the Continent via the Channel tunnel are particularly vital for a city that is so dependent on trade. The textile industry in particular has not had an easy time in recent years. Many hon. Members know that in a decade jobs in textiles and clothing have fallen from 850,000 to well under 500,000. This morning, I heard of the loss of more than 60 jobs at a highly efficient textile company, Laxton Crawford, of Silsden in my constituency. The industry has survived because of its export successes. Wool textile exports in particular have been an outstanding triumph, with the United States, Europe and Japan among those clamouring for our products.

The Chamber of Commerce has pointed to the continual need for two-way traffic between supplier and customer and the fact that overseas customers in particular look to a direct link with their Bradford supplier. What would they think of a city so off the beaten track as to merit no electrified link with the main line only a few miles away? If action is not taken before the Channel tunnel comes into operation, London and the south-east will be more accessible by train from northern France than from northern England, leaving our traditional home market wide open to attack. Can one imagine the French contemplating that for their country?

Business people in Bradford have shown that they will use trains if a good service exists. Some 83 per cent. of firms participating in a recent chamber of commerce survey said that they would transfer travel from other forms of transport if local electrification came. Of course, demand has increased enormously in recent years, and in May the new all-electric BR timetable between London and west Yorkshire will have more trains and they will travel faster. As yet, few of those journeys are, or can be, made directly between Bradford and the capital.

I am sure that many people will agree that good train services are important to tourism. Bradford has become the model to which other cities around the world look if they wish to see how one can sell an industrial centre as a tourist magnet. Tourism now accounts for more than £56 million per annum in revenue to the local economy and an increasing proportion of the work force depends on it. The National Museum of Film, Photography and Television and the Brontë museum at Haworth attract more than 1 million visitors each year. The former, despite its success in drawing over twice the number of expected visitors, describes the absence of a direct link with the south as a severe constraint on its ability to gain business.

The same factor will clearly apply when the Victoria and Albert museum relocates its Indian collection in the city soon. In my constituency, Haworth and the Keighley and Worth Valley railway, to which I am glad to pay tribute, are very much part of the tourism trail. They had a problem in attracting the overseas visitor who is more likely to be dependent on public transport. For Bradford as a whole, the emphasis should be on weekend breaks and short holidays throughout the year, but those especially depend on good direct rail links.

For long-suffering commuters and shoppers in places such as Keighley and Ilkley, electrification of the Airedale and Wharfedale lines cannot come soon enough. Railway staff are tired of having to placate passengers who have complained for too long of delays, overcrowding and unreliability. They demand—and deserve—an improvement. More reliable trains with an increased capacity of 50 per cent., from 200 to 300 passengers, will fit that bill.

Two years ago, my hon. Friend the Minister, after considerable negotiation, approved a scheme for the reintroduction of trolley buses in Bradford. The trolley buses were to be of a novel and advanced design. As I know my hon. Friend will recall, there were detailed negotiations on the project because issues relating to the investment criteria that did not apply to other more conventional proposals were raised. As my hon. Friend may be aware, the trolley bus project has run into problems because the manufacturers are now projecting far higher costs for the vehicles. I am sure that it would be regretted if it were not possible to proceed with that highly innovative scheme. Nevertheless, I believe that I speak for most people in the area when I say that, of the two projects, electrification, whose immediate benefits would be spread far more widely, must be the priority. It would be tragic if both opportunities were missed

The PTE is putting forward a case for section 56 grants. However, the major demand for capital expenditure will not arise for a year or so, so the vital need is for the Department of Transport to give the project general authorisation so that the PTE can start to invest out of its own resources. Some modest expenditure, for example, would be advisable to protect the depot at Doncaster from vandalism until electrification work recommenced.

The people of west Yorkshire are using the train in increasing numbers. New stations are opening such as the one at Steeton and Silsden in my constituency. The green prospectus must rely to a considerable extent on rail as a vital part of the transport infrastructure. We should not and cannot force people to use trains, but we can make their use sufficiently attractive to make the choice of trains easier. We should not readily be forgiven if we did not grasp a major opportunity to show our faith in the future.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I apologise to the House for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). He is privileged to have been a member of the campaign team for Sylvia Heal and he is, therefore, properly celebrating our party's considerable victory in Mid-Staffordshire.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on the motion. It notes:

"the Government's commitment to maintain the existing railway network".

Millions of railway passengers have good reason to doubt the strength of that commitment. Only last week, as other hon. Members have pointed out, the Government-appointed chairman of the Central Transport Consultative Committee, Major-General Lennox Napier warned that British Rail is in a mess. The committee met British Rail representatives on 27 February to discuss the 1989 corporate plan which was published last December. The committee was so concerned by what it learned that it took the unusual step of publishing a special report. The report makes damning reading. It says that the new tougher financial targets set by the Secretary of State last December are seen as "a virility symbol, which must be achieved even though the financial climate has changed and whatever the cost to the passenger in service cutbacks, delayed investment or higher fares."

The report concludes that with the public service obligation grant already cut by 51 per cent. since 1983, demand for further cuts in grant have caused a financial crisis in British Rail.

The report lists services that are to be cut and trains that are to be shortened as a result of that financial crisis. The cuts will cause horrendous overcrowding and a deterioration in services. One would have thought that the Secretary of State would be worried that the new tougher financial targets were having a damaging effect on rail services, but not a bit of it. He said that it was far too early to judge the corporate plan and, as he told the House on 12 March, the problem was that the major-general had been listening to too many speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott).

I do not wish to cast any doubt on the persuasiveness of my hon. Friend, but we can safely say that Major-General Lennox Napier, who was educated at Radley and Sandhurst, was a former commanding officer of the Royal Regiment of Wales and was appointed to his current role by the Department of Trade and Industry, is unlikely to be unduly influenced by Labour politicians. His message to the Secretary of State last week was clear. He said:

"It is up to BR to come clean and tell the Government that it must go back to the drawing board. Large cuts in investment schemes are to be announced. British Rail is in trouble and that means that the passenger is in trouble. A change of direction and a fundamental rethink is needed by British Rail and the Government."

I should have thought that the Secretary of State would want to discuss the matter before rejecting these arguments out of hand, but that was not the case. Last Friday, he told the annual meeting of Northampton Conservative women that he fully endorsed the cuts in rail services. He said that it made sense to cut loss-making services.

As the CTCC report clearly shows, how can it make sense to reduce timetables and shorten trains on services that are already grotesquely overcrowded? How can it make sense to delay the reopening of the Luton to Dunstable line and the electrification of the lines between Ashford and Hastings, Hurst Green and Uckfield, and Reading and Gatwick until at least 1995?

When we need to create an image of a clean, modern railway, why have improvement schemes at 14 stations throughout Network SouthEast also been delayed? At a time when we desperately need to promote park-and-ride schemes as a means of relieving traffic congestion on the roads, what sense does it make to scrap £6 million of investment in new car parking facilities at another 14 stations in the south-east?

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): My hon. Friend is making an important point. Is she aware—I am sure that she is—of the cuts that have led to a lack of alternative engines when they are needed? I shall give an example. The Minister for Roads and Traffic and I were travelling from Chesterfield across the tops of the mountains, because we had to be diverted, to Manchester. The train broke down. It took one and a half hours to get a new engine. It was the middle of summer and everybody was fed up and worn out. The Minister did not make a protest. I was the only person who suggested that something should be done. We waited for an hour and a half. People who travel from Liverpool to London as regularly as I do know that almost every week the train breaks down, although there has been a slight improvement recently. The breakdowns are a result of a lack of investment and of cuts under this Government.

Ms. Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution. What he has described is typical of the regular experience of far too many passengers on British Rail today.

The most worrying aspect of the CTCC report is that it lists more than 200 stations in Network SouthEast that are left unstaffed for all or part of the day. Women passengers are being put at risk simply so that Network SouthEast can meet the financial targets set by the Government. Surely the Government cannot be oblivious of the fact that women are fearful of using our British Rail services at these unstaffed stations.

Mr. Roger King: Men are fearful as well.

Ms. Ruddock: Yes, men as well. However, the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that it is especially difficult for women. The survey conducted by British Rail said that 50 per cent. of women tried to avoid using public transport after dark. That is unacceptable in a civilised country. Are we to assume that, to the Government, the staff who provide help and information to passengers and provide women passengers in particular with a greater feeling of personal security are just another loss-making service?

In his Northampton speech, the Secretary of State failed to address the fundamental problem revealed in the corporate plan, which was identified by the Opposition more than a month ago and by the CTCC again last week. All the planned forecasts are based on economic assumptions that are hopelessly overoptimistic. The three-year £3·5 billion investment programme assumes economic growth of 2·7 per cent. with consumer spending forecast to increase by 2·9 per cent. Yet on Tuesday the Chancellor admitted that growth this year would be as low as 1 per cent., making the predictions of 2·7 and 2·9 per cent. seem decidedly unrealistic. An additional problem for British Rail is that the current state of the property market makes it highly unlikely that its property sales can generate the £800 million over the next three years that the corporate plan also assumes.

The downturn in the economy has already badly affected passenger revenue, and the Opposition calculate that the investment programme of which the Government say they are so proud may have to be cut by up to £500 million because of those difficulties. As the Secretary of State has refused to answer that specific charge, I hope that the Minister will be prepared to do so today.

The economic downturn highlights the essential problem facing British Rail. No one can challenge the assertion that there has been an increase in investment, but, because it has been paid for almost exclusively by passengers in higher fares—I remind the House of increases in real terms of up to 24 per cent. since 1979—and by a worse quality of service, it amounts to no more than the minimum that needs to be done to stop things getting any worse. Basically, it involves simply replacing the worn-out old rolling stock that should have been replaced years ago.

In 1992, on the north Kent line, on which overcrowding is at its worst, the old 10-carriage trains will begin to be replaced by new eight-carriage trains. It is to be hoped that the new trains will be more reliable and that the maintenance costs will be reduced, but the problems of overcrowding are likely to be as bad as ever. Because the new trains are to have sliding doors rather than slam doors, the load factor will increase from 110 per cent. to 135 per cent. In other words, passengers can look forward to standing on an overcrowded new train rather than overcrowded old train. Moreover, although they already pay the highest rail fares in Europe, they can look forward to paying real fare increases of 4 per cent. per year for the privilege.

That is why the Opposition fully support the motion, which calls for road and rail projects to be judged by a common criterion that takes full account of social, environmental and other external benefits. That is the only way to ensure that Britain not only joins the railway revolution that is sweeping through western Europe but that we get a truly balanced approach to transport policy.

That approach has proved very successful in other countries. In France, for example, the TGV project would never have got beyond the drawing board if the French Government had not been prepared to take into account the wider social benefits that it would bring. Now it has proved a major economic success. Most recently, the TGV Atlantique has received a 30 per cent. public subsidy to provide environmental protection in the Paris approaches and help regional development in Brittany and the south-west. The contrast could not be greater. In France, trains will approach the Channel tunnel at speeds of up to 180 mph with passengers enjoying high standards of comfort—including a creche.

On the British side it will be a very different story. Why?

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Where is it?

Ms. Ruddock: My hon. Friend asks, "Where is it?"

Mr. Portillo: Where is the creche?

Ms. Ruddock: As we have no tunnel, no rail link and no train, it is difficult to know where the creche will be.

I was about to explain why it will be a different story on our side of the Channel. As the Select Committee on Transport, pointed out, the Government have refused to adopt a strategic approach. They were warned 15 months ago that the private sector would not come up with the cash to build a new high-speed rail link to London without Government support. They ignored that warning. Now it looks as though the Government will have to do an embarrassing U-turn and find the £700 million if the Eurorail project is to avoid collapse.

It is not good enough for the Government to provide public money to a private project simply as a way to avoid major political embarrassment. I remind the Minister that with public money goes public accountability. It is time for the Government to repeal section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 so that we can take a strategic view and ensure that we get the best possible value, in economic, social and environmental terms, for the public money that is provided.

We must also remember that it is not just the link from the tunnel to London that should concern us. We need to develop a national network that provides fast and efficient links for passengers and freight throughout Britain. But while policy continues to be determined by the narrowminded attitude that led Sir Robert Reid to say, we can never hope to achieve that aim. That is why we seek the repeal of section 42, accompanied by a decision to give British Rail greater freedom to raise finance for major schemes. I am pleased to learn that the CBI supports our ideas about relaxing external financing limits and allowing British Rail to use its assets to raise loans in the market.

"It's not our job to run a service that's desirable; it's to run one that's profitable".

It is not just to ensure that Britain is not left on the periphery of Europe, isolated from the golden triangle, that we need to judge investment in broader terms. That is also the only way that we shall get the new high-quality public transport which is vital to prevent our towns and cities from grinding to a halt as a result of road congestion. In major cities throughout Europe, public transport is judged on its wider social benefits and subsidy is provided, not just to keep fares down but to support investment in new rolling stock, to provide new links and add to capacity —in short, to provide a modern efficient public transport system to meet the needs of the 21st century.

Again, in Britain, it is a very different story. By 1992, London will be the only major capital city in the world which expects its railways to operate without any Government financial support. As the hon. Member for Christchurch has reminded us, in the central London rail study the Government conducted their own cost benefit analysis of investment in new cross-London links. Unfortunately, they then ignored the analysis and went ahead with the extension of the Jubilee line—the line which the study has concluded would do least to relieve congestion in central London. At the time, we were told that the private sector contribution, which clearly influenced the Minister's judgment, would be £400 million. We now learn that Olympia and York's contribution will be worth 12 and 15 per cent. of the estimated cost of £1 billion at 1988 prices. If the costs go higher, as they often do, the proportionate share of the burden will fall even further. Will the Minister tell the House clearly today exactly how much the private sector contribution will be and when it will be paid?

The adoption of a common social benefit cost analysis for road and rail as proposed by the hon. Member for Christchurch would transform transport provision in London and meet the demands that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) has set out in his later motion dealing with public transport in London. I hope that the Minister will respond in some depth on the question of a common criterion. I have no doubt that if it were properly applied, the consequence for London would be a clear reduction of all the hated road building proposals—not just in Tory marginals—and the speedy acceptance of a major package of public transport proposals.

Ministers are fond of telling us how BR and London Regional Transport have all the investment that they can use for new lines. Why then did he not support the new Bill to extend the docklands light railway to Lewisham and Greenwich which they sought to lay before the House last autumn? The plans were complete, public consultation had been thorough and Lewisham borough council had pledged £5 million. The environmental impact was small and the economic benefits and social convenience were considerable. However, the scheme was turned down for want of a relatively small contribution from the Government. Perhaps the Minister will tell us today whether his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to support a Bill to extend the docklands light railway this autumn and whether the funding will be conditional on a particular level of private-sector development contribution.

I want to consider investment in railway safety. When the Hidden report was published, the Secretary of State said:

"I can assure the House that finance will not stand in the way of the implementation of this report."—[Official Report, 7 November 1989; Vol. 159, c. 837]

British Rail's corporate plan makes provision for £200 million of additional expenditure on safety improvements between now and 1993-94 with a further £50 million to be spent by 1994-95. I note, as did the hon. Member for Christchurch, that the cash ceiling on the final PSO grant settlement this year has been increased by £8 million to accommodate safety expenditure arising from the report on the Clapham Junction rail disaster. All the signs are that the full costs of implementing the Hidden report will be at least £500 million and could be significantly more.

The CTCC report to which I have referred shares our concern that passengers might pick up the entire bill for safety improvements through even higher fares or because investment funds are diverted away from other schemes designed to improve the quality of service.

I join the hon. Member for Christchurch in hoping that the Minister will today give a clear commitment that a substantial amount of the additional investment will be funded by the Government. I also hope that the Minister will accept that it is now time to reconsider the level of staffing on our railways, Underground stations and trains.

I have already referred to personal security being undermined by staff reductions. However, we must also consider operating safety. Anticipating slightly the debate on the next motion, I want to refer to the recent alarming series of accidents, incidents and near misses on the Underground. The new safety culture of London Underground Ltd. seems sadly deficient when a driver can drive his train the wrong way down the track and when a pushchair with a child in it is trapped in the doors of a train and dragged along the platform.

I hope that the Minister can tell us that he has ordered an inquiry into the latter incident which I drew to his attention in a parliamentary question. It is our contention that those accidents would most likely not have occurred if the trains had not been coverted to one-person operation.

For all those reasons—to improve passenger safety and comfort, to build high-speed links with Europe and to ensure that public transport can fulfil its potential to relieve congestion and improve the quality of the environment—we support the motion. Furthermore, I am delighted to assure the hon. Member for Christchurch that he need wait only until the next general election to see a Government in office who will implement proper criteria for investment and provide a new environment in which rail service development can flourish.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Michael Portillo): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on his success in moving today's motion. I had no idea that he had to wait so long to do it, and I congratulate him all the more. For the avoidance of doubt, I should say that although he and I spoke about the terms of his motion, and he was kind enough to consult me, I was in no way the co-author of his speech. I deny any credit for that.

I hope that the House will be able to move on and discuss the next motion on the Order Paper which relates to transport in London. I intend to keep my remarks on London Underground for my response to the second motion.

Mr. Prescott: We may not reach the next motion.

Mr. Portillo: I hope that we do.

I was extremely surprised to hear the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) say that we were experiencing stagnation. I can do no better than to quote the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the chief Opposition transport spokesman, who said, in our last debate on these matters:

> "I cannot argue with the fact that there is an investment programme. I fully accept it. It is hard to deny that a £3·5 billion investment programme is going on. Of course there is investment."—[Official Report, 14 February 1990; Vol. 1511, c. 329]

Of course, there is investment and not stagnation as the hon. Member for Swansea, East described it.

Mr. Anderson: Will the Minister re-examine that proposition in relation to my points about the south Wales line and the fact that the HSTS, which were pioneering in the 1970s, will remain on that line for the next 15 years? There has been a regression in terms of quality of service. In south Wales, we will have only the hand-me-downs and the trains that will no longer be needed on the east coast main line after its electrification. That is not even stagnation; it is regression.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman's line has a very high standard of service with high speed trains running at speeds which compare favourably with most of Europe with the exception of the TGV. In much of Europe when people refer to high speed trains, they are referring to 125 mph or 140 mph. Those speeds are quite common in this country now. We have the second highest number of trains that can travel at more than 100 mph of any country in the European Community. Of course, France has the highest number.

Mr. Prescott: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I seek your advice and plead with the Minister to reconsider his earlier comment? His point was understandable but, as the first and second motions will be dealt with separately, we may not reach the second motion. We cannot know at this stage. The Minister said that he would wait for the debate on the second motion to reply to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). That would be unusual, particularly as we may not reach the second debate. I intend no criticism of the Minister, but I hope that he will reply to my hon. Friend's question because it is very important.

Mr. Dickens: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I can deal with this so that there will be no more points of order on the matter. The Chair cannot compel a Minister or any other hon. Member to answer, but I am sure that it would be a common courtesy, as the point has been raised, if it might possibly be answered. May I also take this opportunity to say that there is much interest in the debate and I would appreciate it if hon. Members could make brief speeches. Many hon. Members still wish to speak.

Mr. Dickens: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Because the debate on the first motion is about British Rail and transport policy, it was rather unfair and sad that the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) posed a question about London Underground which is not part of British Rail.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can deal with that point of order. The motion is about railway investment criteria and public transport policy and that is somewhat all-embracing. Perhaps we can make progress.

Mr. Portillo: I will try to respond to the courtesy of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and the guidance that you have given me from the Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I have an anecdote for the House. The other day I was travelling on the Cambridge line to Liverpool Street. I travelled in the cab of a brand-new class 321 vehicle on a line that had been electrified within the past three years. Both lines to Cambridge, as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch will be aware, have been electrified within the past three years. As we went along the line, we passed the point at which the new link into Stansted airport is being built—a major example of new rail investment. We passed through Stansted Mountfitchet, as it will shortly be known, a station that has undergone a tremendous amount of restoration.

At almost every station we saw improvements under way. New lighting was being installed. Most of the platforms along the line were being lengthened to accommodate 12-car trains. That is now a common feature of Network SouthEast investment. When we got to Liverpool Street station, we found the station undergoing a £100 million refit. It is unpopular with the passengers while it is going on, but it is tremendous that British Rail is bringing that station up to 21st century standards.

I asked the traction inspector and the train driver whether they considered that a lot of investment was going into the railway—a question that I regularly ask people when I travel on the railways. They know that investment is going on—they see it every day. They said that they had noticed a tremendous increase in investment. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch knows that along much of the line a wide track bed has been preserved for many years, with the possibility of increasing the two lines to four.

When I was in Scotland last week there was a similar story, with class 158s about to come on to the network. They are very fast express provincial units. They are air-conditioned, have sliding doors, and are of a very high quality. New rolling stock abounds in Scotland, as it does in the provincial sector as a whole. The east coast line up to Edinburgh is being electrified. At Yoker I saw a signalling system which I was led to believe is one of the most advanced in Europe, and the people using it were very proud of it.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the Minister for giving way and for giving us an anecdote about his meetings with BR staff on the trains. Had those staff made detrimental comments about the running of the railway of the management and administration of British Rail they would have faced instant dismissal under BR's code of practice. Any railway worker speaking publicly against the railway, even in the interests of public safety, faces dismissal.

Mr. Portillo: Those people were not speaking publicly, they were speaking within the confines of the cab. When I travelled in the cab on the Settle to Carlisle railway line, the people to whom I spoke had no compunction about telling me that the line should be kept open.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Minister get his Department to ask Australian National Industries, Aurora plc or William Cook plc where it is proposed that specialist rails fabricated at the Atlas steel foundry at Armadale are to be made if the transfer to Bathgate does not last for a number of years? The alternative is to buy specialist rails from France. Will the Department of Transport interest itself in this issue, which comes before the Office of Fair Trading this very afternoon, and on which some hon. Members have been in court this week to get a referral from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Portillo: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall reflect upon what he said when I read Hansard, and try to respond to him in due course.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch was concerned about investment criteria, as was the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock). We must remember the similarities in the investment criteria for road and rail. We appraise road and rail on the basis of an 8 per cent. discount rate, and we treat costs in a similar way. The problem is that the costs of rail investment can be met directly through fares, so financial appraisal is possible. There is no direct charge for roads, so investment proposals are appraised in terms of the benefits of investment as valued by users and the likely reduction of accidents—that is, on a cost-benefit basis.

My hon. Friend said, "Let us take into account the cost of the National Health Service." We certainly take into account the cost of accidents on the roads. Very often, one of the main reasons for justifying a road project is that it saves lives. My hon. Friend will know that the value of a human life is assessed at £500,000. I thought that my hon. Friend's argument was a little dangerous. If we argue that we should invest in rail to save lives on the roads, we must demonstrate that people are changing from road to rail. For investment in roads, we have only to prove that we are improving a particular section of road where lives will be saved. That is precisely one reason why road investment often has a high benefit-to-cost ratio.

My hon. Friend misunderstood some information given to him by my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), the former Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend said that 7 per cent. of all police costs are attributable to traffic activity; the £282 million, the figure that he was given by my right hon. Friend, is the total figure for traffic policing and traffic warden costs. The costs are taken into account in the cost-benefit analysis and in working out track costs.

People who use the roads pay about three times as much in taxation as the amount required to cover the total track costs of the roads, and that includes policing costs. We have recently said that we are prepared to use cost-benefit analysis for rail services where significant benefits are not captured in fares. That is probably pretty unlikely for long-distance services, but we have made it clear in the latest objectives to British Rail that, where investment to meet growth in demand on local rail services cannot be justified financially, a capital grant might be paid if the cost-benefit analysis demonstrated worthwhile benefits such as the relief of road congestion. My hon. Friend knows that the lines proposed in the central London rail study were appraised in that way. I came up with a cost-to-benefit ratio of about one. None the less, we took a great deal of notice because we said that we hoped to be in a position, further to the extra work that was needed, to approve a Bill this November for either the east-west cross rail or the Chelsea-Hackney line.

The Jubilee line extension was the recommendation from the east London rail study. It is directed towards a different set of objectives, not principally the relief of congestion in London. It is directed to opening up docklands, giving benefits to constituencies such as that of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), and providing public transport services to parts of south London that do not have them at the moment.

To avoid further controversy, I inform the hon. Member for Deptford that £100 million will be contributed by developers during the public expenditure survey period—that is, during the first three years—and the balance of £300 million will be paid in the years after that. Those moneys are paid over—they are not loans, they are cash sums. There is no change from the position that I gave in my original answer and in subsequent answers to the hon. Lady.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch was concerned about the continuance of the public service obligation grant. He was kind enough to wecome the Government's commitment on that matter. The case for subsidy to maintain rail services that would not otherwise be provided is that people may have come to rely on them for essential local journeys, for example to schools, hospitals and shops, or that local communities may have become economically dependent on such services.

It is absolutely right that the bulk of the PSO grant made by the Government should go to the provincial sector. However, I see no reason for apologising for wanting that subsidy to be used carefully and reduced over time. That is especially the case when we are investing as much as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has recognised, because it leads to reductions in the costs of the railway. Investment often produces lower costs in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch underestimated the importance, in a railway requiring ongoing subsidy, of trying to achieve a businesslike approach so that we can spend our money sensibly. In his famous speech, Sir Robert Reid, the outgoing chairman of British Rail said:

"The Public Service Obligation system of subsidy . . . required the Board: 'to operate its railway passenger business so as to provide a public service which is comparable generally wth that provided by the Board at present'. While this seemed all right at the time, because it gave us a sense of security, it was very negative, 'Stay as you are' it seemed to say. There was no sense of purpose behind it, no focus, no forward looking strategic aim."

He then referred to the change in culture that occurred when he received the letter of instruction from the former Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley). He said that the letter

"gave me well stated objectives and a clear financial remit. In summary these were: To run an efficient railway providing good value for money. To reduce the . . . PSO by 25 per cent. over three years. There should be no major route closures. To operate freight and parcels on a commercial basis. To procure rolling stock by competitive tender. To increase private sector participation . . . For the first time we knew what was expected of us."

Sir Robert Reid clearly welcomed that important change.

Mr. Adley: I should not like my hon. Friend to think that I am simply having one long whinge about this, but will he reconfirm his belief that there is no connection whatsoever between the continual reduction in the PSO grant and the increasing number of complaints about dirty, late and cancelled trains? Is my hon. Friend seriously trying to persist with the proposition that those two things are unconnected?

Mr. Portillo: Not only that, but I wish that I had brought with me an audio-visual aid such as my hon. Friend produced. I should then be able to show him the contrast in the two. When the public sector obligation is reduced, the amount of investment increases. The two simply cross over. It is only to be expected that when the railway is operating efficiently and can reduce its costs, the amount of money needed to subsidise it from day to day reduces and the amount of money that can be put into long-term investment increases.

Mr. Adley: I am sorry—we seem to have had this argument before—but there is no relationship between the two. Investment is simply investment in new railway, and the PSO is the subsidy that is given to those parts of the railway system that are not profitable. I have heard my hon. Friend's argument about the grants crossing over time and time again, but unless I and other people who are transport experts are missing something, we cannot see the correct direct relationship between subsiding the unprofitable parts and investing in a new railway? Will my hon. Friend tell us?

Mr. Portillo: I am pleased that my hon. Friend understands so clearly the difference between subsidy and investment. That has not always been clear to the Opposition. It must be obvious that when the railway can reduce its costs and increase its revenue, it needs less subsidy than before. Furthermore, I believe that morale on the railway increases considerably when it operates more efficiently, attracts more passengers and provides a more attractive service.

Ms. Ruddock: Will the Minister make it clear whether that series of remarks means that he is rejecting everything in the special report of the Central Transport Consultative Committee and whether he intends to replace the chairman?

Mr. Portillo: As I do not appoint the chairman, it is not a matter for me. If I can make some progress with my speech, I shall come to the CTCC report in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch is concerned about the PSO. My announcement the other day was that at the beginning of the year we set a cash ceiling for the PSO grant of £496 million. That was based on British Rail's claim for slightly less than that—for £492 million. Therefore, we gave British Rail more than it had claimed. At the moment, we believe that we can settle the grant at £488 million, but I have increased the cash ceiling by £8 million. The final amount paid in grant to the railway will not be settled for some time, but it must fall within the cash ceiling that I have just increased by £8 million. I stress that that was not an announcement slipped out on Budget day.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch made comparisons with other countries. One point that is not dwelt upon is the extent to which those countries have enormous accumulated debts on their railways which have to be serviced from year to year. My information is that the railway in France has a £6 billion debt and the railway in West Germany a £20 billion debt, despite the recently announced write-offs. Since the early 1960s we have written off enormous amounts of debts for British Rail —the total amount, at today's prices is £11 billion. It is a bit thick—meaning a bit much—of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch to say that the Government expect British Rail to do all its own funding when the Government have written off £11 billion of its debt.

[Mr. Portillo]

I remind my hon. Friend that the grant to the railways comes from the taxpayers, the property that generates the receipts is owned by the taxpayers through the railway, the loans made to the railway are made by the taxpayers at subsidised rates which could not be achieved on the market and the revenue of the railways is earned on the basis of assets owned by the taxpayer.

When we previously debated the matter, I told my hon. Friend that investment figures for different countries show that in the past year we invested £67,000 per kilometre of route mile in Britain while the French invested £49,000 per kilometre. For coming years, the French plan a large investment programme, but their programme for the Parisian network is £1·5 billion over five years, whereas the Network SouthEast programme is £1·2 billion over three years. More is being invested in the London area than in the Paris area.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend cannot get away with that. Network SouthEast covers huge areas, not only of central London but taking in Essex, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, Surrey, Buckinghamshire, Hampshire and Wiltshire—one could go on for ever. With great respect, that is not fair.

Mr. Portillo: I am pleased that my hon. Friend did not question my previous figure. The investment per kilometre is higher in this country than in France.

I take issue with the CTCC report because it fails to take account of the many improvements of the service. Overall, Network SouthEast plans to run 2 per cent. more train miles in 1990. That includes an enhanced Thameslink service, peak and off-peak, between Luton and Guildford; increased frequency off-peak on that line and a new evening peak service to Sevenoaks; new electrical services from Southampton to Portsmouth, when the electrification scheme is complete; new direct services to London from Fareham and other services, including Southampton to Gatwick; higher capacity on the Northampton route; enhanced peak services between Euston, Hemel Hempstead and Milton Keynes; increased frequencies from Aylesbury to Marylebone; two new morning peak services on the Fenchurch Street line; a new Shepperton to Waterloo service, with an accelerated journey time; two new evening peak Reading to Gatwick services; enhanced peak services from Charing Cross and Cannon Street to Dartford; improved frequencies on the south London lines; and the reinstatement of services which previously had to be cancelled because of driver shortages.

Ms. Ruddock: We are all absolutely delighted with and applaud that catalogue of improvements. But the point of the CTCC report was that the investment programme has been jeopardised and cuts have occurred. I listed those cuts and asked the Minister whether he denied that there had been specific reductions in services.

Mr. Portillo: There has been a net 2 per cent. increase in train miles that will be run in 1990. That gives the best overall picture.

Mr. Corbyn: I am interested in the Minister's catalogue of improvements. What improvements are planned for the north London line, which is still inadequate, badly served and has inefficient trains on it, even though there have been improvements, which I readily concede? Also, what plans does he have for the Barking to Gospel Oak line? Will he ensure that it remains open, that it is electrified and that it provides a service which seriously connects with the north London line? Many people, including myself, suspect that the inefficiency of the service is a prelude to running it down altogether.

Mr. Portillo: I do not make plans for the railway lines. British Rail brings the plans to me. I know of no plans for the Gospel Oak line. The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to concede that recently there have been dramatic improvements on the line. Stations have been renewed, there is refurbished three-car rolling stock and a 20-minute interval of service. The improvement or rebuilding of Silvertown station is planned and there is the slightly longer-term improvement of Stratford station. The line has already undergone dramatic change. I am pleased about that.

Mr. Corbyn: What about the Gospel Oak to Barking line?

Mr. Portillo: I thought that I had replied to the hon. Gentleman's question about that. No plans have yet been brought to me, so I do not know what the position is. British Rail will make the plans and bring them to me. It will not happen the other way around.

It is correct that the improvement of the Manchester-Blackpool service has not been approved. Ministers have received no proposals for the service, so we cannot be expected to take decisions on submissions that have not yet been made to us. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) referred to the Bradford service. The scheme is being considered by British Rail and the passenger transport executive. When they have conducted their analysis, they will want to discuss it with my Department. If they apply for section 56 grant, we shall consider the application carefully.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley talked about the money for the trolley bus project and asked whether it could be transferred to the railway. We have told the PTE that it can make such a transfer away from the project towards buying electric vehicles. I do not think that that is the way it wishes to go, but the offer was made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) made an interesting and thoughtful speech. He began by saying that he did not want the subsidy phased out on Network SouthEast. It was my hon. Friend's borough that led the campaign against the subsidies made by the GLC for the Underground services on the basis that the people of Beckenham would not benefit from them. By extension, people throughout the country may wonder why they should subsidise services for commuters in the south-east of England rather than services that meet the wider social benefits of the isolated communities that are typical of the provincial sector.

The main thrust of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham was directed at the high-speed link. I remind him that £1 billion of investment has been put into the present rail service. That will enable a reliable three-hour service to operate between London and Paris. The journey time between London and Brussels will be two-and-three-quarter hours. The question is whether we should use taxpayers' money to knock another 30 minutes off the journey and to increase the capacity of the line for the longer term. My hon. Friend helped us to put in context what the Government are being asked to do. We are being asked to subsidise a service that will already exist to provide a shorter journey time in competition with other modes of transport which are not subsidised by the Government.

It will be of interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham to know that I have made an announcement today on noise insulation for new railway lines. We have set up a committee whose remit is to recommend to the Secretary of State for Transport a national noise insulation standard, or standards, for the operation of new railway lines that relate equitably to the standard set by regulations for new highways. The aim will be to arrive at a standard, or standards, at which the duty to offer noise insulation will be triggered, and to set the trigger at a level that will ensure parity of treatment between those who live near new railways and those who live near new roads. I think that that will be welcomed by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham and by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, who is always arguing in favour of parity between different modes of transport. The details of the committee are set out in Hansard today in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate).

I was rather surprised by some of the things that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) said about a London bypass by rail. If the hon. Gentleman has a moment, I invite him to talk to some of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Kent about the environmental problems of building new railway lines. We must not think that new lines are an easy environmental option. Instead they pose new problems that are as great, and possibly even greater, than those presented by roads.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor talked about connections between the west and Wales with the Channel tunnel services. It is proposed that there should be train services running into Waterloo rather than Paddington which will connect with cross-Channel services. That facility is important and will be envied by other people, because much of the debate on a new link is about how to establish a cross-platform link between one service and the Channel tunnel service. That possibility will exist in 1993 for the constituents of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it possible for us to go a little further north? Can the Minister say anything about the electrification of the Edinburgh-Glasgow line, in particular about any discussions with Mr. Bleasdale and his colleagues about the electrification of the southern line, which is much cheaper and overcomes the technical problem of the electrification of the Queen street tunnel? Some of us strongly favour a link-up between Mid Calder and Carstairs.

Mr. Portillo: When I was in Scotland I was impressed by the management's willingness to think creatively and consider all the options. There are three lines between Edinburgh and Glasgow. I shall probably get this wrong, but I think that they are Carstairs, Shotts and Falkirk. At various times, all three have been considered and I know that the management of ScotRail are continuing to think about that carefully. I am sure that they will want to bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman said.

I shall return to the speech by Sir Robert Reid. He summarised his own speech in the following words:

"Prior to 1982 we were organised as a bureaucracy, engineering based, union dominated, production led. The customer took a back seat to what was perceived as being of more importance: engineering and operating expediency led priorities—these spending barons produced demands for ever larger subsidy—undermining our credibility . . . In 1983—our goals were defined—challenging but achievable—we know we could meet them provided we got rid of the old culture. In 1989 we are not completely there and there is much to do. But we are ready for the decade ahead."

This Government have enabled a £3·7 billion investment programme in British Rail and a £2·2 billion investment programme in London Regional Transport to be established. In the years ahead we shall be spending as much on public transport as on roads. Under this Government, the docklands light railway has been built and extensions to it are under way. Under this Government, the Jubilee line extension through London has been approved. That is the biggest project of its sort for a quarter of a century. We are actively considering which new railway line we might be able to authorise under London, whether it will be an east-west cross rail or a Chelsea-Hackney one. We have made an enormous grant to the metro link project in Manchester to extend public transport there. We have given a £6 million grant to Sheffield so that the studies for the super tram can be continued.

That is the record of a Government who are even-handed between road and rail, but have shown a tremendous commitment to providing the investment necessary to improve the public transport of this country.

Ms. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): After one has heard the smooth and sophisticated presentation of the Minister for Public Transport, it is always a delight to welcome the efforts of hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for saying so, I hope that in the short, remaining period of this Conservative Government we shall see him as Secretary of State. We desperately need someone in the Department who understands the implications of the importance of railways. Such understanding was not demonstrated by the Minister today.

The hon. Member for Christchurch set out, in an exceedingly detailed and informative speech, the case for a proper examination of the different forms of investment. There are two ways to plan transport, both of which are political. One can plan a transport system that is properly intergrated and provides a proper relationship between one mode of transport and another, or one can do what the present Government have done and let the matter be decided, in effect, by default. The result can be seen every day not only in the streets of our capital city, which are becoming increasingly impassable for any mode of transport, but elsewhere, in the cost to British industry of attempting to move freight from one place to another.

I must not speak for long today, so I shall concentrate briefly and strongly on the Channel tunnel link. My constituency has now been chosen as one of the first freight depots. We are delighted about that, but we want the advantages to be passed on to other areas. It is vital that the Government should begin to understand that simply allowing British Rail to increase its external borrowing limit while demanding that the return comes almost exclusively from the passenger is to put a self-defeating and deadening hand on the future of transport in Britain.

Increasingly over the past few years the passengers have been made to pay for the improvements that the Minister has listed with such pleasure today. The passengers who use the InterCity services must fund the improvements that make the railway system appear as if it is constantly improving, but electrification must happen much faster and must go much further if we are to begin to compete after the Channel tunnel opens.

Political decisions about the transport network in the north-west will have to be taken. We could provide a land bridge to Ireland through north Wales or, if needs be, through central Wales. The electrification of the line between Crewe and the north Wales ports would provide rapid freight transport after 1992. We look forward to a political decision being taken to enable King's Cross to be considered as the most efficient place to provide a terminus and exchange point for the traffic that will undoubtedly be generated by the Channel tunnel.

One point which the Minister has not accepted today and which ought to be underlined is that the French, the German and the Scandinavian railway systems have planned the development of their railways in relation to the Channel tunnel not over a couple of years, but, in the case of the French, over more than 10 years. They have been able to reach agreement on the environmental costs and the straightforward industrial costs because they have been able to commit money to offering solutions where difficulties arose. The Conservative Government in Britain have not been prepared to step in and think about where the high-speed lines should go, they have not been prepared to offer any sweeteners to enable the people in the areas affected to accept the implications of the high-speed line and they have done nothing to address the political and environmental impact upon the London constituencies. Unless those problems are faced head on, there will be no solution to the line of the route or to the acceptable development of transhipment points.

The Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport have both paid at least lip service to the idea; they are prepared to get together to produce some consultation about the environmental costs of transport policy, but in reality very little is being done to make that a positive policy. In 10 years of Conservative Government, they have tended to regard British Rail as a milch-cow capable of putting money into privatisation schemes by selling off British Rail Engineering Ltd., with its vast amounts of acreage, but they are not prepared to invest money to improve the services.

We want a clear commitment from the Government that they view the rail network as part of a planned transport policy, rather than simply rolling out figures and saying, "Over a number of years, we have allowed British Rail to go to the external market and to increase its borrowing powers." We want planned expansion to improve facilities for passengers and freight, taking into account the fact that Britain will shortly be more firmly locked into an open market and that the French, Scandinavian and German railways will be capable of benefiting from that trade expansion, whereas ours will not. It would be a disgrace if the French were the only people prepared to invest in new rolling stock and facilities to provide a cross-Channel link. It would be even worse if that link was not treated as part of the integrated rail system.

The Minister spoke of the difficulties of constructing rail lines but failed to acknowledge that, unless those problems are faced, regions such as mine in the north-west in particular will be badly affected, as will all other passenger and freight services. Electrification without integrated planning is a short-sighted and stultifying policy for any Government to adopt, and one that will cost both the taxpayer and the passenger as well as British industry.

When Britain has a Government who really understand the implications of public transport, they will not take the view that railways operate in a vacuum—or, even worse, that parts of the rail network should do so—that London Transport, for example, should be considered apart from British Rail, and that British Rail should be dealt with separately from the management of British airspace. Anyone who travels between London and the north-west increasingly appreciates that the motorways resemble nothing so much as road trains, with one person per car instead of one person per carriage. Freight is increasingly carried nose-to-tail on minor motorways, and such traffic is reaching saturation point.

The alternative is not double-banking roads or road pricing, although both are a form of traffic management, but a system that reflects the understanding that a large volume of freight must go back on to the railways where it can be transported efficiently and in an environmentally friendly way, bringing positive benefits to the customers concerned.

Above all, Britain needs a Government who understand that railways are not a subject for debate on a Friday in this House, as though they are an abstract topic that can be slotted away for another six months in the hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch will not, with any luck, have another opportunity to make his arguments for some time.

This country is, by default, handing over the management of its transport system to other nations day by day, and the Minister's only response is to trot out a series of meaningless statistics that represent no kind of positive policy for the future. When transport becomes an important element in the next general election, not only will the Government regret their policy but the British public will realise that they have paid for it in terms both of immediate cash and a lack of forward planning. Government transport policy is an extravagance that this country can no longer afford, and the sooner that something is done about it, the better.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has shown the nation that she obviously gives a high priority to transport policy. She has given the Department one of her best Cabinet Ministers in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, whom I shall be meeting this evening, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, whom I recognised as a shining star when he served with me on the Energy Select Committee. We have in the Department a good Secretary of State and good junior Ministers.

In a debate on rail and transport policy, it is wrong to offer blinkered and narrow views on only rail travel. The Department of Transport is responsible for travel by sea, road, rail and air, and it must dovetail those means of transport because often one is dependent on the other. Let me give a typical example. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), whom I congratulate on securing the debate, said that rail commuters pay for rail investment through fares and that that does not apply to road users. Let us nail that lie straight away. When one buys a motor vehicle one pays tax and VAT on it. One buys a vehicle licence and pays tax on parts, and a high tax on petrol. Motorists use motorway service stations—the Little Chefs and Happy Eaters—which all pay tax, as do their staff. To say that road users do not pay for roads is ridiculous and undermines the argument.

People use the roads and railways. Unless my eyes deceive me, every time I pass a railway station I see thousands of cars parked. The drivers of those cars are also rail users. Roads and railways are dependent on the same users. When road users have paid billions of pounds in the taxes I described earlier, there is much small change left for rail investment.

Mr. Adley: Does my hon. Friend believe in the hypothecation of taxation? From where would the Foreign Office get its money?

Mr. Dickens: The Foreign Office receives money from road users. Their money has helped to subsidise railways in the past, and no doubt some of it has helped with defence. It certainly is not all given to roads.

Those who advance environmental arguments must understand that roads are required to bypass villages.

I serve the constituency of Littleborough and Saddleworth, which surrounds those grand towns of Rochdale and Oldham. The north-west depends on transport to deliver its goods to Europe. The wealth creation of this country depends greatly on industry in the north-west. The textile mills—wool mills in Yorkshire and cotton mills in Lancashire—created the industrial revolution. When it experienced problems and other nations caught up, its workers did not receive the same conditions as miners—guaranteed jobs and wonderful redundancy terms—but had to develop new high-technology skills. Given the spirit and invention of folk in the north-west, they were able to do that.

The north-west must produce goods that people want to buy at the right price, on time and with good after-sales service. To deliver goods at the right price is important. Our main industrial competitor in Europe is Japan, which is a good copier. Britain is the inventor of the world. Television, which was developed from radar, and the jet engine, were British designs. The Japanese are not only great copiers but are good at production methods and at reducing unit costs. If we are to compete, we must improve our unit costs, which we are doing, but it would be nice if we could take advantage of the thousands of miles that Japanese goods must travel to Europe by transporting our goods from the north-west quickly to Europe. We must be able to transport them cheaper than Japan. That would compensate for other advantages that the Japanese have.

The Confederation of British Industry in the north-west made the long journey to the House to meet north-west Members of Parliament. Its main concern was that rolling stock from the north-west to the Channel tunnel would be sufficient, that the service would be sufficiently regular and that there would be sufficient carriages to move passengers and goods quickly to Europe.

Mr. Corbyn: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the analogy with Japan, is he aware that one reason why Japanese industry and transport are doing well is that the entire historic debt of the Japanese railways has been written off to make them more efficient?

Mr. Dickens: Yes, and the Japanese cured their inflation problem with a tax-free savings exemption scheme, just like the Government introduced on Budget day. The Japanese have learnt from us and we can learn from them—we are not too proud to do that. The industrial base of this nation has taken off. I am disappointed that my hon. Friend the Minister will not have the pleasure of replying to my contribution, but he always reads my speeches in the Official Report. Of course, he is listening now, but he can remind himself of my contributions later.

Mr. Adley: Will not my hon. Friend the Minister fall asleep?

Mr. Dickens: No, my hon. Friend the Minister never falls asleep during my speeches.

We in the north-west are anxious to get our goods to Europe at the right price, so we want to cut transport costs. We have the technology, industry and the inventions, but we want to beat other services on the cost of transportation to Europe. Whether the goods go by sea, rail, air or road, we hope that the United Kingdom's transport policy will be sound. I have every reason to believe that it is.

Subsidies are a curse. I remember the period after the war when it was difficult to get rid of many subsidies. I think particularly of housing subsidies, which roll on and on. One should remember that if subsidies are given to help the south-east or the south-west, the people in the north-west, in my constituency, help to pay for them. The more industries stand on their own feet, the healthier and better it is. I was encouraged when my hon. Friend the Minister said that the Government had put just as much money into the railways as into road schemes. That is commendable and long may it remain. Let us rely on the Government to take this message on board and to realise that it is their duty to give us good communications and a good transportation policy for all forms of travel.

1.7 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I should like to take up the closing words of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) about a good transportation policy. He illustrated the interconnection between road and rail and the importance of trunk routes to the north-west. The problem is that the Government not only have not given us that policy but, alas, show no signs of doing so. That is why this excellent motion was tabled by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley).

The hon. Member for Christchurch is a well-known expert on these matters. He is also a representative of the progressive Toryism of the past which I knew and which has been replaced by the less knowledgeable and less appropriate Toryism of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth. The lack of that older tradition in the Conservative party caused the accident that befell it yesterday in Mid-Staffordshire. If there had been more of the common sense of the hon. Member for Christchurch, there would have been more votes for his candidate and conceivably fewer for mine.

I hope that I can now pass from less partisan matters and return to transport matters. The Minister gave the game away in some respects when he said in concluding, as if with pride, that there is new transport in London—the Jubilee line and the docklands light railway in the Newham constituency. There certainly are new lines, but they are not railways that are built because of strategic considerations or comprehensive transport planning. If they were, they would not be proposed by the Government who, in both cases, are more concerned with the needs of the developers and of the capitalists, some of whom are from different parts of the world, than with developing London properly. Such developments are being made for the wrong reasons and they illustrate the present position.

Most Members of Parliament and certainly most members of the public want a transport system, both rail and road, that caters for mass movement, which integrates the demands of both road and rail and which is planned on the basis of being a public service. The Minister's aim is for some sort of transport and railway system which is linked to theories from a think tank of 10 or 15 years ago and which looks on the transport of individuals purely as a market commodity. That is how the Government have been running the railways. It annoys many of us when we see clearly services that are not up to scratch being advertised in ridiculous television commercials. What might otherwise be an atttractive crooning voice appears ridiculous. The habit of announcers at stations talking about "customers" rather than passengers betrays the philosophy imposed on the British Rail management by the Government.

The Minister talked about the Silvertown and north London lines, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) referred, and about the anomalies of the Barking to Gospel Oak service. The Minister may have forgotten that in Question Time recently the Secretary of State admitted that that service was in a terrible state and that a special report had been called for. The service may be a bit better now, but it should not improve only because the subject has been raised on the floor of the House, or because the Secretary of State tried the line himself and found it wanting. That is not the way to make improvements. We want improvements to result from the buoyant demand for mass movement.

I shall confine the rest of my remarks to three aspects: routes, people and safety. It is clear that there is no comprehensive national planning for upgrading or putting in new railway routes. If there were, we should not have our present trouble over the Channel tunnel. The Government do not even understand or look to the vision of their 19th century forebears. The forget that almost 100 years ago Sir Edward Watkin planned the great central railway with a specific eye to serving the Channel tunnel. It would be good for the country, including the north-west, if the remnants of that railway were now safeguarded. I know that it might be difficult to put it through urban areas, but it would be good if it was safeguarded at once. That would plug a gap in the Government's strategic thinking.

The mess-up over the Channel tunnel is another illustration of the Government's lack of strategic thinking and of the fact that the project has been tied to private enterprise purse strings. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will, no doubt, refer to Stratford. The hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) said that his constituents wanted to end up not in Stratford but in central London. It may be forgotten that a journey from Stratford to central London would take only five, six or 10 minutes on the cross-rail—if it were built. People want a big international centre with plenty of space and with fast routes to the Channel tunnel, which is easy to reach from all parts of central London, from the north-west and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) said earlier, from Wales. Stratford would fit that description. It may sound a long way from central London——

Mr. Tony Banks: It is not.

Mr. Spearing: That is true. In terms of time, through the cross-rail route which we all want to see, it would be very close. It would take five to 10 minutes to reach from most parts of the City and the west end. The Government's lack of vision has caused the problems.

I have here a map produced by British Rail in 1980, under the far-sighted chairmanship of Sir Peter Parker. British Rail wanted a cross-rail route from Euston to Victoria and, if it had dared to propose it, a route from Paddington to Liverpool Street as well. The plan was presented complete with a cost-benefit analysis, but the Government turned it down. I believe that it was never meant to have any success. If British Rail had put the plan into action, cross-London trains would have been running now and we should not have our present problems in London. It is because of the Government's shortsightedness that we did not get them at that stage.

We can go back even further. The Government talk about Victorian virtue. The Metropolitan railway joined Liverpool Street and Paddington—now also the northern part of the inner circle—with links at both ends 100 years ago. It was not a capitalist invention. Conservative Members' ideas about economic theory are mostly wrong. The Metropolitan railway was built as a result of the vision of a man called Charles Pearson, solicitor to the City of London corporation, whose driving force was philanthropic. He thought, "Let us build a railway from the overcrowded insanitary city to the countryside so that people can live in decent suburban surroundings and come to the City to work." The driving force of the Metropolitan railway was not capital. The railway was the result of good strategic town planning of the sort that this Government do not even recognise. They are more than a century behind the times when it comes to transport in London.

The cross-rail option would be the better option because it would provide much more relief than some other routes—certainly more than the Jubilee line option, which the Government have chosen. They have no strategic understanding of national trunk routes or even of routes in London.

My second theme is people. The Government regard the public not as passengers but as customers, and their attitude to the most important people on the railways other than the passengers—those who run it—is deplorable. British Rail's industrial relations record has been very poor lately. BR brought in a gentleman whose name I forget who had been with the motor industry, and we all know the trouble that we had. I know from talking to people on the railway just how dismayed they are at the way things are going. They are squeezed all ways. A few moments ago, the Minister himself referred to the shortage of drivers. Drivers have been resigning from the southern region.

The psychology of the management—the way in which it goes about things—is all wrong. Running a railway is like running a family business: it requires loyalty and team work. Managers must show that they understand the difficulties and problems of those who operate the service, but they are not doing that. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) properly referred to women and safety on British Rail, yet even now it is extending the one-person operation of trains. I shall return to the safety aspect of that in a moment but it is certainly important from the point of view of people travelling at night, especially women. British Rail is steaming ahead —if that is the right word—with disregard for the needs of its passengers, both on platforms and on trains.

My third theme is safety—a theme of considerable importance. Hon. Members have repeatedly referred to King's Cross and Clapham and the Government have made expositions concerning their adherence to safety standards. The Minister has been engaged in conversation for some time, but I ask him to pay particular attention to my remarks on this subject. He and I have had some correspondence about the one-person operation of trains on the older lines of the London Underground. When London Regional Transport—or, more accurately, London Underground—introduced the one-person operation of trains on the Piccadilly line, I protested to Sir Keith Bright, the then chairman. I regarded the introduction of the system as increasing the hazards and asking for trouble.

I raised the matter again in the House on 13 March 1989. I asked the Minister to review that practice. In a public speech on 8 September 1989 in Upminster, bearing in mind Zeebrugge, King's Cross, Clapham and one or two other episodes of that kind, I said:

"We have now seen disaster on the sea, and in London on the river, on an escalator and on an open railway line. In each case we ask, 'Why did it happen?' If we get another London disaster, this time in tunnels in the bowels of the earth, it could be that that question need not be asked, since the answer might be in this speech. Mr. Parkinson must now act to make that impossible,".

In that speech, I was referring to the refusal of the former Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), to ask LRT to stop the extension of one-person operation on London's older tubes. I discount the Victoria line because it works on a different system.

I have had correspondence with the Minister for Public Transport and I am glad that he is present today. In Hansard there is an answer from the Minister to one of my written questions, and he has reproduced in full a letter that he sent to me. I asked him to check with the railway inspectorate whether one-person operation on deep tube trains was satisfactory to the inspectorate. I believe that it is inherently unsatisfactory. In his answer the Minister stated:

"The inspectorate arranged for an exercise to be carried out in the early morning of Sunday 28th January on the Bakerloo Line between Oxford Circus and Piccadilly Circus. It involved four trains, none of which was in passenger service. The simulated emergency was deemed to have been caused by the incapacitation of the driver of the leading train. The simulation was done in such a way as to create the conditions likely to be met if the incident had occurred during the peak hour service . . . the Chief Inspecting Officer tells me that he regards the arrangements as acceptably safe and that they constitute a suitable method to deal with the unlikely event of a train stopping within a single-bore tunnel due to the sudden disablement of its driver."—[Official Report, 22 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 655-56.]

There are other risks with one-person operated trains, as we are aware from the King's Cross inquiry. Hazards occur when unlikely and unforeseen events occur.

When the Minister received the report from the inspectors did he wonder whether the test was carried out with passengers on the trains? Did he wonder whether the test was carried out simply by the staff? As I have given the Minister notice of this point, will he tell us whether the simulated accident or hazard took place with simulated passengers or were the trains empty?

Mr. Portillo: The trains were empty of passengers, but there were observers including London Underground Ltd employees, an inspecting officer from the railway inspectorate and two trade unionists, one of whom was a safety representative.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Minister. Other than his political motivation and his economics, he is a reasonable Minister. He is courteous and fair. However, I believe that there is a lacuna. When we ask why hazards happen or why a single wire should dangle down, as it did at Clapham, or why a single cigarette should start a conflagration as it did at King's Cross, we may forget that someone in the chain of responsibility has forgotten to ask the obvious.

I am determined to question the safety of one-person operation on the older tubes. The chairman of LUL has pushed the issue aside and the Secretary of State has pushed it aside twice. However, to the Minister's credit, he said that he would consult the inspectorate and, perhaps because of my questions, the inspectorate performed a simulated exercise.

Two questions arise. First, why is it that, two years after the introduction of one-person operation, there was a simulated exercise? From the context of the Minister's letter, I guess that it is quite clear that it was not done before. If there is a disaster—I hope that there will not be —somebody will ask, "Did they have an exercise?" It will be proved that they did not—at least not until the one that the Minister mentioned. Secondly, when the Minister read the letter, as I did not, did he ask himself whether the passengers in the trains were make-believe passengers in the sort of density that everybody who uses London Underground experiences in rush hour conditions? I emphasise the Minister's answer, which states:

"to create the conditions likely to be met if the incident had occurred during the peak hour service."

If we are to test a school fire exit—some hon. Members have done that in their younger days, and I have been responsible for supervising such tests—would it be good enough to say, "Yes, we did a test with the staff and the caretaker"? That is what happened underground. If we conduct such a test in a cinema or a large opera house, as one must do under the law, and we said, "Yes, we did a test with the usherettes and the manager," would anybody accept it as a valid test? I suspect that, when the Minister got the report, he forgot to ask himself that question.

Can we accept as a valid test the evacuation of tube trains underground in a simulated condition that the inspectorate believed is likely to occur in the rush hour when there were no passengers present, not even people who might be expected to simulate passengers? We all know what happens in the event of an emergency at sea, on land or in the air. People do not expect it. The London Underground test was not the sort of exercise that should have taken place. Such a test should be done only when trains are full of passengers and when they do not expect such an exercise to take place. In all modesty, I advise the Minister that he has slipped up in accepting that as a valid test of the safety of our underground trains.

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) who shares with me an interest in the bicycle as an even cheaper means of public transport, and an interest in Acton—an interest which turned out to be mutually exclusive for us. I join the hon. Gentleman in his compliments to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) who has ignited a lively debate. As many hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate, I propose to keep my remarks relatively brief.

I inform my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) who, like me, has sat patiently throughout the debate, that I would be the same shape as he is were it not for the fact that I travel regularly on Network SouthEast from Ealing Broadway to Paddington or by Piccadilly line in the rush hour from Acton Town to Westminster. Congestion in the coaches keeps the elongated structure that is now addressing the House.

Anybody who travels on the tube or on Network SouthEast will say that congestion has got worse and that conditions have deteriorated. There are simply more people travelling. Also, there are more interruptions and cancellations than there used to be. Not all of them are the fault of the operators, but quite a lot are. As a result, more people are writing to their Members of Parliament—certainly those in London—complaining about conditions. They know that, over the past 10 years, the economic fortunes of this country have improved. As a result, they expect part of the greater wealth that has been created to be diverted to the improvement, modernisation and expansion of public transport in London, the south-east and in other parts of the country.

Superimposed on the resentment to which I referred and the rising expectations that I have touched on is a third factor, which is linked to the welcome awakening of interest in environmental concern. It is a questioning of the role of the motor car in our society, concern about the pollution that it is causing and anxiety at the land use implications of catering for its appetite. In London, there has certainly been a major shift of public opinion on this matter. In the past few years, there has been a swing against road construction and in favour of public transport.

Our job as Back Benchers is to report that shift in public expectation to the House. That is what most of us have tried to do in the debate. The Minister's job is more difficult. It is to capture the changing public mood and to convert it into practical, realistic and affordable policies. No one could do that better than my hon. Friend who is a fellow London Member and who has finely tuned political antennae. Some of the guiding principles involved in making that difficult conversion from the gut feeling that we should spend more on public transport to devising and implementing he practical policies of building new lines and modernising others have been touched on in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch said in his excellent speech that we should avoid dogma. We have painted ourselves into a corner over the high-speed Channel tunnel link by saying that there should be no public money for the route. With respect to my hon. Friend the Minister, it is not just a question of a faster link; it is also a question of increasing the capacity. The capacity on the existing proposals will not be adequate if the traffic forecasts are right. It was doubtless a well-intentioned policy at the time to say that there would not be a public subsidy for the high-speed link, but that policy is now outdated and unrealistic and should be changed. We have insisted on high environmental safeguards, which have tipped the project from being viable to unviable. Therefore, it seems wholly sensible that the taxpayer should help to fund the project.

If the full potential of the Channel tunnel investment is to be realised we shall have to look afresh at the rail network in this country, at terminals and all the rest. The investment regime that may have been right when we were considering simply an internal network for this country may be wholly inappropriate when we begin to consider a network that is part of a continental network, with all the implications for competition and exporters that go with that.

I hope that we shall not be dissuaded by Opposition Members from looking to passengers for part of the contribution towards the greater investment that we all wish to see. We are not pushing up fares simply because we are reducing subsidies to public transport. Fares are being increased because the Government are committed to a major expansion in public transport and they rightly believe that as the passenger is the principal beneficiary, he has a role to play in funding the investment.

In retrospect, the worst days for London were when subsidy was diverted into keeping the fares down, when there was little expansion and when congestion worsened. In retrospect, that was short-sighted policy to which I hope that we shall not revert. I am prepared to defend higher fares to my constituents as long as they are linked to substantial investment and to an improvement in services from which they will then benefit.

We have had a debate about level playing fields. I was persuaded by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch that at the moment there is some discrimination against investment in public transport. I listened to what the Minister said: he hotly denied my hon. Friend's claim. I felt that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch had the balance of the argument, but I am prepared to be persuaded.

I also listened with interest to the remarks about the east-west cross route. That will be of major interest to people in west London because many people who live in Ealing work in the City. The Central line is congested and slow and an extension from Paddington to Liverpool Street would therefore be of major interest. I am not sure that I accept the argument, which we heard only when the Government said that they could afford only one link, that London's traffic could not cope with two links at the same time. That argument was put forward only after a decision was made that only one would be funded. I am not persuaded by that, because I believe that there is sufficient capacity in London and that London needs both.

I agree that there is a problem with exporting the spoil, but that could be done by canal, for example. Paddington is on a canal and much of the spoil could be removed by that route. The Jubilee line clearly has links with the river Thames and the Chelsea-Hackney route is not all that far removed from the river. Therefore, I do not accept those arguments and I hope that the east-west cross route, which was at the top of the list, is the one that goes ahead.

Two points have not yet been mentioned. The first is highly relevant. Much of the work for which hon. Members have asked during the debate involves legislation and would use the private Bill procedure. I speak as the sponsor of the King's Cross Railways Bill. I am genuinely concerned that the private Bill procedure will not be adequate to cope with the sheer volume of legislation that we want to see, which would be sponsored by British Rail or London Regional Transport. It is easy to put a sleeping policeman in front of a private Bill. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) is an expert at it. I have come across it in his opposition to the King's Cross Bill.

If, as a nation, we are to invest heavily in public transport, is it adequate to expect one or two Back Benchers to persuade 100 people to stay behind after a debate on a light evening? Is it right that there should be no amendment in Committee because of the consequences on the Bill on Report? If we are to have a major expansion of public transport we need to examine the private Bill procedure. In my view it is wholly inappropriate.

So far in the debate no one has mentioned the disabled. Some 12 per cent. of the population have a mobility handicap. There are 500,000 such people in London. Much progress has been made in making public transport more accessible. Some 90 per cent. of all new buses will have the features recommended by the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee, including lower step heights, textured and colour-contrasted handrails, and bell pushes which can be reached without getting out of one's seat.

The United Kingdom is working within the European Community to establish the best standards for wheelchair accessibility for buses. Over 2,500 taxis now operating through the radio circuit are wheelchair accessible. By the year 2000 all taxis in London will be accessible to the disabled. Then we have the Taxicard scheme which provides over 750,000 trips for the disabled and others each year, with the number ever rising.

Britain leads the rest of Europe in designing coaches that are accessible to the disabled. The French and Belgian railways have adopted a BR design for on-train facilities. By 1993 all rail routes in Britain will be accessible to people in wheelchairs. Indeed, many trains already have appropriate facilities. There are other services for the disabled such as dial-a-ride in London for which, I am delighted to say, the Government have increased the budget by £1 million. In this debate on public transport, let us not ignore the needs of the disabled.

I was reassured by the commitment of my hon. Friend the Minister to support public transport. I hope that he will be influenced by pressure not just from Opposition Members but from Conservative Members. All my hon. Friends who have spoken wish to see a continuing shift in Government priorities. They are determined to see that public transport gets a square deal.

1.37 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) is right to draw attention to the shortcomings of the private Bill procedure. I hope that the House will examine those matters seriously along the lines that he suggested.

I pay tribute to the way in which British Rail and Scot Rail conducted the centenary celebrations on the Forth bridge, the southern end of which is in my constituency. It was done with dignity, credit and aplomb and that should be recorded here.

As an hon. Member who is sponsored by the National Union of Railwaymen, I draw attention yet again to the success of the Edinburgh-Bathgate line. It is a new line, the financial and other expectations of which have far exceeded what was anticipated.

I welcome what the Minister said about the noise insulation on new lines. I wish that initiative well. It is important, and I take the point of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) about parity with motorways.

I interrupted the opening speech on the complex matter of the electrification of the Glasgow to Edinburgh line. There is a strong view, which I hope is increasingly shared by Mr. Bleasdale and others, who will take the decisions, that it would be much cheaper and more practical to electrify one of the southern routes than one of the northern routes. Both routes go through my constituency and Linlithgow is my local station. I recognise the problem of the cost of electrifying the line through the Queen street tunnel. Perhaps soon there will be a statement for expectant Scots on this important matter.

Lastly, I speak with some passion on an issue about which I hope the Department of Transport, including the Minister, will do something quickly, by which I mean this afternoon. It concerns the Department because for some years specialist rail equipment of great complexity has been fabricated at the Atlas steel works in Armadale. The steel works is unique in Britain in a number of respects. It was established originally to make armoured plate for the Dreadnought battleships. It has been taken over by William Cook plc. It is not part of my case to denigrate those who run Cooks. Andrew Cook is an extremely distinguished and imaginative iron founder and has a reputation for modernisation. In many of his actions he has not been an asset stripper. The circumstances of Armadale, however, are sad to say the least. It has been decided to close the foundry.

I may have other opportunities to raise in the House other aspects of the events that are taking place at Armadale. I have been lucky to secure a ten-minute Bill on 25 April to amend the Fair Trading Act 1973 to allow the courts further powers of interdict and injunction to prevent purchasers of assets of firms which are subject to potential inquiry by the Office of Fair Trading and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission from pre-empting possible decisions of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry arising out of recommendations of the MMC.

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

This very afternoon—this is an indication of the urgency—Mr. Charles Cruickshank and his colleagues in the Office of Fair Trading are seeing William Cook plc about the decision to close the Armadale foundry. Immediately, before a possible recommendation to the MMC, the issue for this debate is where British Rail will obtain the important specialist equipment that it requires if it does not come from Armadale. What will it do if it does not have a guarantee that the equipment, which this very afternoon is being transported by lorry to the North British steel foundry in Bathgate, will be used for many years to come? There is a feeling that Aurora, for all its protestations, will not remain at the North British site at Bathgate for very much longer. If that is the position, and other than the rail-making equipment going to Sheffield, possibly to Whittens, British Rail will have to purchase vital equipment in France? Is it not highly undesirable, not least from the point of view of purchasers across the exchanges, that equipment which has been expertly made by Atlas for many years should have to be obtained in France? We should not have to be dependent upon the French or on any other source outside Britain.

Could the Department, this afternoon, contact Mr. Charles Cruikshank and Mr. Ray Woolley of the Office of Fair Trading to ascertain their point of view? Could the Department contact the officials of the Scottish Office? The Minister of State, Scottish Office, the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang), and officials such as David McFadyen and Gordon Kincaid, have been nothing but extremely helpful in these circumstances.

I am the Minister's political opponent, but in this matter I have no criticism of him. On the contrary, he is interested in the issue. Will the Department of Transport contact Scottish Office officials this afternoon to find out their view of the position? They could go one better and talk to Mr. Bob Mairs of West Lothian Enterprise, who has a detailed knowledge of the matter, to find out what I am talking about.

This is a matter of considerable consequence to British Rail. When the NUR group, of which I am a member, gave a farewell meal to Sir Robert Reid, he asked whether there were any last-minute requests. I made a request then, before I realised that the Atlas steel works was to be closed down, that the outgoing chairman should find out about the issue. I put that request to the incoming chairman of the same name, Bob Reid, recently of Shell. I hope that British Rail and the Department of Transport will find out urgently about this matter.

The Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, Jim Shaw, and I felt strongly enough about the matter to go to the High Court the day before yesterday to try to get an interdict. I make no criticism, public or private, of Lord Marnoch, the judge, for not giving us that interdict. In this country, fair trading is heavily weighted in favour of ownership and it would be difficult for the court to have come to any other conclusion. I am not criticising the judiciary, but this is an urgent matter of public interest and I want the Minister to find out more about it as quickly as possible.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I hope that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will forgive me if I do not follow him down the foundry route. Courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) we have had an interesting ride—in railway terms, one might call it an excursion ticket—round the country's railways, ending in Scotland. I shall bring the debate chugging back safely to London to consider transport in our capital, and link this debate with the theme of my motion—that the solution to London's traffic and transport problems lies predominantly with public transport.

The background to my speech is the London assessment studies, on which we shall soon have an official announcement. If the reported conclusions of my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Transport, as set out in one national newspaper today and repeated on some radio stations, are true and some of the major road options, such as the Chiswick tunnel, the south circular and the western environmental improvement route, WEIR, were not to be pursued, it would be a great tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's willingness to listen to my hon. Friends and myself in the southern strip of London. I refer particularly to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe), and my hon. Friends the Members for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). That would best show that the Government have their priorities right on the future of London's transport.

I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot respond to this today because it is a leaked story. However, we must look for public transport solutions and imaginative solutions to our capital's problems. I set my arguments against the background of gridlocked roads and rat-run side roads where, as Lord Dewar said, pedestrians are divided between the quick and the dead as they try to cross some of our side streets. My argument is also set against the background of a public transport system which is overloaded, particularly central London, and the history of public transport in London. That history involves private company fighting private company, fighting public company, with no decisions being made.

The other day the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) and I shared a morning assignation, courtesy of LBC radio. She departed from a separate starting point by rail, I started by underground and bus and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) started by taxi. We wanted to see who could reach the station first. I have to say that the taxi got there first followed by the railway train. My package came in last, not least because I started from Battersea square where there is no bus, no railway station and no Underground, so Shanks' pony came into play for the first half mile or so. When I found my Underground station I had crossed the river.

In answer to questions to my hon. Friend the Minister, I was told that there are 244 Underground stations north of the river and only 29 south. That would suggest that more than half the population lives north of the river, but that is not the case. A fair half of the population lives south of the river, yet we are totally unserved by the Underground system. Clapham Junction, the busiest rail junction in the world, is in my constituency with 1,000 passengers per minute passing through it at peak hours. That station is totally unconnected with the Underground system.

In London more than 80 per cent. of commuters into the centre travel by public transport, but 90 per cent. of people travelling to other destinations travel by car because there are no cross routes. The rail network is directed into the centre and our great capital city has no cross routes, particularly running from east to west.

Mr. Adley: Presumably my hon. Friend is aware that in the days of steam there used to be an excellent service from Clapham Junction to Kensington Olympia and to many other places in London. Does he agree that while the phrase "integrated transport policy" may be anathema to some of our hon. Friends, there is still a lack of adequate consultation and joint operation between British Rail and London Underground? Does he agree that Clapham Junction would have tremendous potential if some of the other lines were used?

Mr. Bowis: I could not agree more and I shall come on to some of those opportunities, although I am not sure that I shall incorporate steam in my plans.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Shame.

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend says "Shame" now, but I am not sure that he would approve of steam trains puffing through Fulham.

We have not yet reached the stage at which British Rail is working out ways of bringing long enough trains into our capital city. The trains are too short because the platforms are too short. At one point there was an announcement that British Rail would start a programme of building extensions, but I understand that it has been held back. If we are to have trains which allow people to get in rather than to fall out, we need a serious programme for longer trains to run through inner London.

My hon. Friend the Minister, in his earlier response to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch highlighted the Government's achievements and I pay tribute to them. For the first time we have a Government who are enabling British Rail to invest at a level not seen since the Conservative Government of the 1950s. That is a great tribute. We have gone back on to the rails in terms of investment. The same is true of London Underground and the docklands light railway. I want to see Portillo statues of my hon. Friend to match the Brunel statues all round our capital city, when we have expanded the imagination and opportunity that is lacking in the planning of our network.

Mr. Corbyn: What about Adley statues?

Mr. Bowis: They should be outside London, perhaps on the Christchurch line.

When I speak to the planners in British Rail and London Regional Transport, I am impressed by their knowledge, dedication and striving to provide the service that they believe is required. But I always feel that there is something lacking—that little spark of someone saying, "Let's try something new. Give us an idea and we will work it up to a scheme that we can put forward to our bosses and our paymasters." I want to hear hows rather than whys coming out of those offices when I put ideas to them. We could put forward many ideas to solve our problems.

Hon. Members have mentioned how one assesses the relative investment costs as between rail and road. There was an interesting dialogue between my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) as to the degree to which car drivers pay for roads through the tax system. Most rail passengers also contribute to road costs as car drivers, whereas car drivers often do not use the rail network to any extent and therefore do not make a contribution to it through rail fares.

Rail investment embraces not only tracks but rolling stock.

Mr. Adley: And signalling.

Mr. Bowis: And signalling, as my hon. Friend says. However, figures for the road network include expenditure only on the roads themselves—not on the vehicles that use them. One must be careful to compare like with like.

Reference has been made to the central London rail study. I am an exponent of the Hackney-Chelsea line. The original study suggested an east-west link in addition to the Hackney-Chelsea line, or a north-south cross-rail. If we can have both, that will be fine—but if not, I want the Hackney-Chelsea line. It will not come as any surprise to hon. Members that that is because the Hackney-Chelsea line could be extended south through the virgin territory of Wandsworth, which is developing in terms of new businesses and other developments. It is territory where private sector finance could be brought into play. The line could be taken to the Southfields link with the District line, rather than to Fulham Broadway. At this point, I stand a little aside from my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham in case he has other ideas.

The London assessment studies contain imaginative ideas such as the light railway link to Roehampton, which could relieve some of the A3 traffic. My favourite proposal is the opening up of the west London line, linking it to Clapham Junction, and in turn linking Clapham Junction to the Underground network. If the line was extended from Willesden to Clapham Junction, there would be the option to extend it further south, to Balham.

Other schemes propose linking the east London line to Balham, and one begins to see a network building up that could provide precisely the kind of east-west link, and the links all round London, that the capital currently lacks. Proposals for many other lines are on the drawing board, in other, some private, studies. They include the new Fleet line, extending the Bakerloo line, the new City line, and extending the Piccadilly line to Clapham Junction via Chelsea and Battersea Bridge road.

Also proposed is linking the Jubilee line to the City airport, extending the Central line to Richmond, and taking the DLR down to Lewisham and up to Finsbury Park. Perhaps the most imaginative of all is the inner London rapid transport scheme, which comprises two intertwining circles. That could make the Gospel Oak connection to which the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) referred, with interchanges at Clapham Junction, Willesden Junction, Peckham Rye and Canonbury. That is an imaginative scheme for the future, but other schemes go way back in time. There was a proposal in the 1920s for a Wimbledon-Sutton line. We should consider them all, and decide which can be adopted.

If there must be a minimalist solution, I want the Hackney-Chelsea link, the west London line and the east London line to Balham. I would also like Clapham Junction to be rebuilt. It provides an important cross-link in the rail system, but it is totally inadequate in its present form. It is totally inappropriate for the disabled, for example, and consideration must be given to how the whole station could be redeveloped.

Comparisons have been made with the Paris Metro. I am often told that it offers a cleaner and more frequent service that is easier to use than the London Underground. I am sure that all those claims are true. The Metro also has more stations. Passenger journeys in London total 815 million per annum, whereas they number 1,484 million in Paris. The Paris lines are much shorter for the number of stations that they serve. London has 273 stations, whereas Paris has 351. The Metro provides a more convenient service, so it is used more frequently.

Having considered introducing some of Paris's ideas, perhaps we could consider transport over the Thames, which tends to divide London's traffic systems. People often speak of the need for a new river crossing in south and south-west London. Perhaps we need such a crossing, but it should be not a new road river crossing but a public transport river crossing. I can see the case for an imaginative new bridge, incorporating a light railway, a bus lane, a cycle lane and provision for pedestrians. That would add to local services.

Had I had more time, I would have spoken of buses, midi-buses and the opportunities offered by more bus services. The red route scheme is important in enabling buses to travel through London. If that scheme were linked with a transponder system to enable buses to travel through traffic lights, we would have a bus system in our capital city of which we could be proud.

I shall be the first to erect statues of my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport if he gets transport in London right—every station could have one. In summary, I shall completely misquote Petruchio from "Taming of the Shrew", which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) might at least recognise. He said, "Say that she rail, while then I'll tell her plain she sings as sweetly as a nightingale." The more my hon. Friend the Minister rails, the more we shall give him the plaudits that he deserves.

2.1 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Friday socialism is about to be practised, and I am sure that someone will tell me how much I have so that we may share it evenly until 2.30 pm.

I congratulate the hon. Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on the motions that they have tabled. I cannot understand why they are in the minority in the Conservative party. Their suggestions not only make sense but are very much in demand among the electorate—certainly among the electorate in London, where transport is becoming a hot political issue.

Even the Government are becoming aware of that. A number of stories have been trailed in newspapers that about next Tuesday the Secretary of State will make announcements taking him somewhat out of the realm of the craven supporter of the road lobby. The Labour party welcomes that. It is not anti-car or anti-road, but it believes that the Government are anti-rail, which is demonstrated by their policies. We want more public transport, specifically more rail use, because we believe that rail travel is cost-effective, environmentally friendly and socially desirable. The Labour party is not anti-car, but it is fervently pro-rail and pro-public transport.

What annoys me is that the Government have washed their hands of responsibility for an integrated national transport policy. No one is taking a strategic overview of transport requirements in Britain or in London. The London group, of which I am chair, met the Secretary of State, who said, "I am not in the strategic transport authority"; and British Rail said the same. Who is the strategic transport authority for London? Labour Members and many Londoners are asking that question.

I looked back through some Greater London council publications and found the 1981 Greater London transport survey, which followed the surveys that it commissioned in 1971 and 1962 as the London county council. It considered all forms of transport in London —road, rail, river—and pedestrians and cyclists. Who does that now? The Government have abolished the GLC and taken away the natural strategic transport authority for London and the south-east, but they have not filled the void. Many of the decisions are dictated not by transport requirements or social desirability but by who can put up the most money, and the transport policy follows. That is happening increasingly in London.

I went to an exhibition that was mounted by Olympia and York, which is putting up some of the money—not a great deal—for the Jubilee line. We have agreed that that is not perhaps the first priority for a new line, but the Government favour it because some money is coming up front. Olympia and York is a responsible company which has transport planners who could show the Department of Transport a thing or two. It even has in its offices a model of London including transport lines which the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment use. I am all for socially responsible private sector investment, but the idea that the Government have to go to these people for not only money but expertise shows that the Government are derelict in their duty to Londoners and to transport requirements in the south-east.

I have a specific question which has been asked before but about which I am concerned because it relates to the Channel tunnel and the repeal of section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. Will an announcement be made? We know that public money must be invested to save the project. The Government have painted themselves into a corner by saying that no public money will be invested. I want the Government to make it clear either that they stand by that statement or that if public money is to be invested in some covert way—as a green dowry or money provided in extra subsidies because of commuter traffic —there will be a proper public inquiry to determine the best route to serve the interests of the south-east and the country generally, linking the Channel tunnel and London.

Ms. Ruddock: Is my hon. Friend aware that yesterday a joint statement was issued by the London boroughs of Southwark, Lambeth, Lewisham and Greenwich making the very points that he has made and saying that they totally oppose any overground routing of Channel tunnel rail links for freight or passengers through their boroughs?

Mr. Banks: I well understand the points that are being made. The Minister and I have discussed this matter. There should be a public inquiry. We should not leave matters as they are, with British Rail being able to cobble together a deal with someone who comes up with the money and having to use the arcane procedure of a private Bill to get the legislation through. The Government cannot keep washing their hands of what is perhaps the most important transport decision to be made this century and perhaps the next. The Government cannot walk away from the issue of responsibility.

I want a public inquiry. As hon. Members know, I favour the idea of a second Channel tunnel terminal, to be located at Stratford in my constituency in the London borough of Newham, and there are good reasons for doing that. The case is good: it would be £1 billion cheaper; there would be minimal environmental damage; the project is supported by the relevant local authorities; there is a prospect of providing 10,000 jobs in the area; and it would revitalise the east end of London. It is no good my just continuing to make that point. I should like to see a proper, independent public inquiry so that we can find out what is considered to be the best location for the terminal and the linking fast route. I should be happy to abide by a decision of that inquiry.

The Government's decisions are based not on the transport needs of Londoners but on where they can get the most money. The transport decisions follow. The majority of people in London think that transport is one of the most important of issues. Transport chaos looms in the capital city. It is not just a matter of alarmist talk by the Opposition; everyone who moves about in London —whether on the roads, on the Underground or on Network SouthEast—knows that to be a fact. This is the Government's responsibility. They cannot walk away from it. We demand action from them today.

2.9 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): In view of the time, I shall compress my remarks.

I welcome the debate on railways and public transport policy. It is interesting that whenever railways are debated in the House, there is an inevitable comparison between the investment that British Rail puts into the industry and the investment that is put in by our continental cousins, especially the French. The comparison between British Rail investment and that of SNCF with the TGV concept is always made. It is true that the TGV is a glamorous form of rail transport and that every country would like one. With France's land mass and ability to drive railways through the countryside more easily than we can, it has a transport system that is the envy of most of us.

How modernised are the rural railways in the Pyrenees or in other parts of France when one goes off the main glamour rail routes into areas that do not have the benefit of such investment? There is no doubt that railway investment in the United Kingdom stretches from Penzance to Thurso. Wherever the railway is in operation, especially in rural areas such as mid-Wales and the north of Scotland, new forms of signalling equipment, radio telephone equipment and rolling stock have been introduced. That has transformed the railway system in the area. That is the sum total of our investment, which has reached all parts of the country. The French railway system does not reach every part of France. We must be sure in our minds that we seek from a modern railway system not necessarily high speeds of 180mph or 200mph, nice though that might be, but punctuality, cleanliness and reliability.

We still have some way to go, but I am convinced that the people on the east coast route, who are in the process of receiving a brand new railway system, as we did on the west coast route 20 to 25 years ago, will come to appreciate the terms and concept of investment that the Government, through British Rail, are bringing to a large part of the country. I warmly welcome that.

I also warmly welcome the investment in Birmingham. The cross-city line electrification scheme was long overdue. It is now to start in May, with the erection of the wires and the gantries. It is unfortunate that, such is the loading on British Rail workshops to produce new rolling stock and equipment, it is likely that by the time the wiring and signalling have been completed in two years' time, we shall not receive brand new rolling stock as we were promised, and to which British Rail committed itself, because the factories cannot produce it in time. That emphasises, if it needs emphasis, the investment taking place. As Sir Bob Reid, the outgoing chairman said, railway modernisation and investment are up to the limit that we can handle. We need not endorse the achievements of the railway investment programme any more than by emphasising that statement.

I also endorse the 8 per cent. return on investment. It is very easy to be seduced by representations to throw money at and to give blank cheques to a nationalised industry. That money is then absorbed within the ramifications of the industry so that no one knows where it goes. That happened in the railway modernisation programme in the 1950s, when we embarked on a £1,132 million investment. I can never forget that number. I was and remain an avid rail enthusiast. I saw the new equipment cascading into the railway system. Stations were modernised and marshalling yards were built that were never used and were subsequently closed. Rolling stock and locomotives were ordered to the wrong specifications. They were phased out long before they had reached their life expectancy. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) will know that the western region specified diesel hydraulics that were given the kiss of death long before their motive power had been exhausted.

Mistakes were made because a lump sum was given to the railways, which was spent accordingly. It was spent in the best interests of the industry which thought that it was doing the right thing, but the safeguards that we introduced by demanding that all investment should have a return must be the only sensible way forward. I do not think that that has stopped any worthwhile investment programme for which British Rail has asked. It has been given practically everything that it has requested.

I want briefly to touch on the role of the bus. I remind the House that I am a non-executive director of a national coaching company, so obviously I have an interest in this matter. The bus is the most flexible form of public transport that we have and it operates extremely efficiently. The Government's policy of deregulation has encouraged new and innovative bus services the benefits of which we have seen throughout Britain. In the west midlands, new operators are beginning to come in and offer a worthwhile challenge to monoliths that have been in place for a considerable time. It is causing established companies to reflect on their services and to seek to achieve higher standards of service and efficiency. I welcome what deregulation has achieved. I warmly applaud——

Mr. Adley: I am glad that my hon. Friend declared his interest; it would have been unfortunate had he not done so. Does he think that all the additional costs that his coaches have caused the Metropolitan police and others to incur should be borne by the bus companies? Or does he think that London community charge payers and taxpayers should bear them all?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to draw to the attention of the House his comments about coach congestion in London. There is a distinction between tourist coaches meandering through the streets, their passengers rubber-necking at all the sights, and commuter coaches that come in first thing in the morning, park somewhere and go home in the evening. My company is not a party to that. The company of which I am a director—National Express—operates a daily and hourly national service throughout Britain, of which services to London are only a part. Our coaches come straight to Victoria coach station, unload and leave the capital. Very few remain parked here unless, for example, mechanical problems arise.

The deregulation of the bus industry has proved very successful. It has given the public choice—and choice is what the public wants—between using railways and using inter-city coaches. It has also done wonders in providing the impetus for British Rail to provide an ever more efficient and commercial service.

The problems of London and most of our cities could be partially alleviated if we ensured that buses and coaches could travel along the busways allocated to them, free from the vehicles—frequently illegally parked—that lie in their route at present. I welcome the red routes, which will go a long way to overcoming the worst problems of congestion for public service vehicles, which move the bulk of commuter traffic in our city centres.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister kipdly re-examine the introduction of a form of bus grant? As a result of deregulation, many changes have taken place in the structure and ownership of our companies. Our rolling stock—the fleets—are aging and need replacing. I am convinced that the industry will find the wherewithal to replace those vehicles. But what should we replace them with? We have congestion and pollution—it is absolutely right to say so—but the technology is there to produce buses and heavy goods vehicles that are largely pollution-free. That can be achieved by means of filtration traps and the like. I ask the Minister to consider the possibility of providing grants for environmentally responsible public service vehicles. They would emit fewer fumes and, although they would be more expensive to buy and slightly more costly to run, they would be highly beneficial to the environment.

2.17 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I am sorry that I missed the first part of the speech of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). He has done an enormous amount over the years in support of the principle of railways. I pay tribute to him for that and for introducing this timely debate.

I detect that most Conservative Members are rushing like Daniel to judgment. They seek to give the impression that no Conservative Member ever supported the policy of major road building or of cutting investment in British Rail. They speak as though no one had supported the demand for a return on capital or advocated the privatisation of the railways or any other forms of public transport.

I suspect that the planners at the Department of Transport believe that, under the cost-benefit analysis system, road building is essentially a good thing. The team does not take sufficient account of the serious environmental problems of building major roads, the increased pollution from car exhausts and the internal combustion engine or the loss of open space and public land that the building of major roads entails.

It has been said that the amount of land taken up by the building of major roads in comparison to that for railways has damaged the environment. However, the Government still promote major road building which encourages more car commuting and more road freight which, in turn, causes more pollution and congestion in our cities. That encourages the kind of crazy solutions that were foreshadowed in some of the assessment studies as answers to London's transport problems.

The Government's attitude to railways and railway financing appears to be one of reducing investment and encouraging privatisation by stealth and the rapid sales of BR property. I believe that in the long run that will be detrimental to the interests of the railways because those sales remove capacity for later operational requirements that may be necessary if the railways continue to expand at the present rate.

The Government's attitude does not take sufficient account of the overall environmental impact of developing railways instead of roads. The use of energy by the private car is the most wasteful, most polluting and most depressing aspect of transport policy. The major source of pollution in every city is not industry, but internal combustion engines in private cars. Catalytic converters and emisson filters will not solve that problem because carbon dioxide, a major greenhouse gas, will still be emitted.

As a form of mass transit, the railways are most energy-efficient. Railways give the greatest sense of mobility for people in cities and form the best inter-city network. I strongly support rail development for all those reasons.

I draw attention to rail investment and development in London. London is in chaos. Anyone who tries to travel round the city on foot, by bicycle, in a vehicle for disabled people or on a tube train will recognise that London is dirty, dangerous, congested and polluted. That has a bad effect on the children in our capital city and on the health of everyone else. When fire engines and ambulances cannot move round central London, it becomes downright dangerous for all of us. It is time that something was done about that.

I believe that next Tuesday the Secretary of State for Transport will announce his response after the consultation period on the assessment study. In the month after consultation ended, I hope that he read every letter and the top of every petition and I hope that he has taken account of all the objections. Seventeen thousand people from my constituency objected to the proposal to build a major road through north London. All the postcards, letters and everyone who objected supported improvements to public transport. They called for better funding, lower fares and the better use of public transport.

In my constituency, 27 per cent. of the electorate registered their objections. Only one person muttered to me in the street that there might be a case for road widening, but he had not really thought about it. Therefore, the ratio is 27,000:1 and that one was not very certain.

On Tuesday I hope that the Secretary of State will announce that he will abandon all the road building options for London and instead introduce a refunding of London Regional Transport which will result in lower fares. I hope that he will also announce a major study on safety in LRT, including getting rid of the mechanical Rottweilers at Underground stations so that we no longer have to face those ludicrous ticket barriers. I hope that he will also announce a serious evaluation of railway development potential.

Many lines have been mentioned today which could be developed and improved. In an intervention I referred to the north London line and the Barking to Gospel Oak line. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) talked about the west London line. There are many other under-used rail facilities in London that could be developed, and by building links we could have a first-class rapid transit surface level rail system in London. We should also be integrating transport in the way that was envisaged by the Greater London council and is now advocated by the CBI.

I also believe strongly that we should be looking more closely at the conditions for proper mobility and safety. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) referred to the safety of women on the Underground and on buses. Problems are caused there because of understaffing. We must also consider the safety of cyclists and the lack of mobility for disabled people. The loss of the previous dial-a-ride services and the introduction of LRT dial-a-ride services have not been a happy experience because the zoning system that has been introduced reduces the mobility of the people whom the scheme was designed to support.

There are major decisions to be taken. We lack the democratic forum within London to make them, because the GLC was abolished and there is no transport authority for London. The Minister might not be very keen on bringing back the GLC, but he must recognise that part of the cause of chaos, congestion, dirt, danger and noise in London is due to the lack of an integrated transport planning system. That is what we require in London and require now.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I support the motion which was to be moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), altbough I am happy to intervene under the wing of the motion introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). The motion highlights the excellent campaign that my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea has been waging in south London to turn the attention of our right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Transport more towards public transport and away from road building. If the rumours about the Secretary of State's announcement some time next week or in the near future are correct, they are a credit to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea.

The Opposition have suggested that some Conservative Members have had a last-minute conversion on public transport in London. I assure the Opposition that it is not a conversion, but a realisation of the present position. Over the past eight or nine years, because of Her Majesty's Government's policies, there has been a great economic revival in the capital city. Many people are coming to our capital city to work and to indulge in wealth creation. Statistics show a 23 per cent. increase in the number of passengers travelling on Network SouthEast and, in turn, using the London Underground.

As we need to move many people to London from a great distance, it makes absolute sense to do so by rail and to some extent by bus. Constituents in inner London boroughs and in the suburbs recognise that fact when they say that they are not willing to countenance more major road building. That feeling has been behind campaigns against the major road proposals that were put to the Department, by the engineers.

In their strategic role in the Department of Transport, the Government have most certainly turned their attention to public transport. There has been far more investment in recent years in British Rail and Network SouthEast and in the London Underground than at any time in the past 25 years. There is no doubt that the Department of Transport has encouraged London Regional Transport to concentrate on far more investment now than ever took place during the time of the GLC. Certainly, far more passengers now travel on London Regional Transport than at any time under the GLC.

I encourage my hon. Friend the Minister to consider light rail systems and far more use of hopper buses on short routes in outer London suburbrs such as Surbiton. I am convinced that we should be pursuing far more public transport systems as the way forward and that we should not encourage road building in either inner or outer London.

Mr. Adley: With the leave of the House, I thank my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock), neither of whom have left their places this morning.

I have just one last word for my hon. Friend the Minister. The Government have generated considerable economic success in the past 10 years and have raised expectations about public expenditure on our transport infrastructure. We have converted a public sector borrowing requirement into a public sector debt repayment. Can we use some of those well-earned moneys to build transport infrastructures for the future?

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's statement in their objectives set to British Rail, that projects not meeting the required rate of financial return but having social, environmental or other external benefits, should be assessed by cost-benefit analysis; further welcomes the Government's commitment to maintain the existing railway network, and to continue to pay the Public Service Obligation grant, whilst noting the report of the Central Transport Consultative Committee on British Rail; notes both the investment regime and subsidy policy pursued by the French and West German governments; calls on Her Majesty's Government to assess road and rail projects on an equal basis in the light of the congestion, pollution and aggravation caused by the proliferation of the internal combustion engine; welcomes the Government's important decision to refuse closure of the Settle and Carlisle railway line as a significant change to policies pursued by previous governments; and requests British Rail to end the policy of selling off railway trackbed from which services have been discontinued.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not criticising the Minister, but is it not unsatisfactory that in today's debate there has been no opportunity for a reply to be given to particular questions asked of the Minister? I specifically asked whether the Department of Transport was prepared to take action in relation to the Atlas steel works and the fabrication of rails, but there was no opportunity for a reply. Perhaps by some alchemy the Minister will indicate that his Department is doing that.

Mr. Portillo indicated assent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has made his point, but he knows that it is not a matter for the Chair.

RADIATION EXPOSED CROWN EMPLOYEES (BENEFITS) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon Members: Object.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 30 March.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to motion No. 8——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall take it in a moment.

Mr. Skinner: It is about motion No. 8.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well, I shall take it now.

Mr. Skinner: You will notice Mr. Deputy Speaker that the two business of the House motions deal with the poll tax and various regulations. One relates to business to be considered on Monday and the other to several motions for Thursday. You will also notice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the last few lines of the second motion state that any member of the Government may move one of the motions.

I have been considering this matter, together with Standing Orders Nos. 14 and 15, relating to exempted business and negative procedure. In view of what is taking place politically, I think that it would make a great deal of sense for the Prime Minister to come to the House to defend the poll tax regulations and the poll tax generally on either Monday or Thursday. She is allowed to do so under this procedure. If she is not prepared to defend the poll tax, she should come here, pack up the poll tax and pack herself up with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the Prime Minister will take note of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

"That, at the sitting on Monday 26th March, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), Motions in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Community Charge and Community Charges may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and a half hours after the first of them has been entered upon; and, if proceedings thereon have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at the expiration of that period put successively the Question already proposed from the Chair and the Questions on any further such Motions as may then be made.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 29th March, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Orders No. 14 (Exempted business) and No. 15 (Statutory Instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), if the Motions in the names of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Community Charges and to Social Security and Mr. Secretary Newton relating to Social Security have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put successively the Question already proposed from the Chair and the Questions on any further such Motions as may then be made by a member of the Government, and no other such Motion shall be made.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Haberdashers' Aske's Schools, Hatcham

2.32 pm

Ms. Joan Ruddock: (Lewisham, Deptford): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I cannot anticipate what the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) will say in his Adjournment debate, the subject of which is two schools in my constituency, but the purpose of closing those schools is to create a city technology college. The girls' school has voted against that; the boys' school has voted for it. The Government's proposal is that one CTC should be constituted from those two schools——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Perhaps the hon. Lady will tell me the point of order for the Chair.

Ms. Ruddock: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I felt that it was necessary to give you that explanation because, as a result of what has happened, the Inner London education authority and the London borough of Lewisham are now taking the matter through the courts. There is an appeal hearing in the High Court, which I understand is still going on. Therefore, I wonder whether the matters are sub judice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. Lady's point and am grateful to her for giving me notice of it. I also understand that a case is now before the courts and the matter is, therefore, sub judice. I am sure that the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) and the Minister will take that into account in their remarks.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

2.34 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I do not intend to deal with the subject matter of the case that is still before the courts. It is, as will emerge during my remarks, one of five lawsuits brought by the Inner London education authority. That is some measure of the way in which the authority has tried to frustrate the consultation process in schools becoming a CTC. The Haberdashers' Aske's schools in Hatcham are two voluntary-controlled schools which are administered by the same foundation and have had the same governing body for about 100 years. During the past two years they have undertaken a consultation procedure on whether they should remain voluntary controlled, become grant-maintained or become a city technology college.

The story of that procedure is an amazing story of an attempt by a Labour-controlled authority—ILEA—to frustrate it. ILEA has attempted to manipulate the governing body and to remove CTC supporters from the governing body, and has aided the parents group, which is opposed to the CTC, both financially and in other ways that are improper, if not illegal. It has brought five lawsuits in an attempt to frustrate the procedure and spent upwards of £250,000 of public money in pursuit of what can be described only as party dogma.

ILEA did all those things not only during the consultation period but after democratic decisions had been taken to proceed with turning one of the schools into a CTC. I suggest that that is not only profoundly undemocratic but shows that the Labour education authority—the largest in the country—was not prepared to accept the democratic decision of governors, parents and teachers. It is a scandal of municipal bullying, misuse of public funds for party political purposes and attempts to prevent democracy and flout democratic decisions. It is a tribute to those members of the governing body who are not Labour party appointees that they have pursued an extremely beneficial development in the education of Lewisham children.

The story started in 1988. In April the governing body considered a paper on whether the schools should become a city technology college. It was agreed that there would be a lengthy period of public consultation and that parents would be asked their views on the proposals before any decision was taken. At that stage the governing body was made up of 21 people, including 10 appointed by ILEA —of whom eight were Labour party appointees and two were Conservative party appointees—five foundation governors, two head teachers, two other teachers and two parents.

ILEA suspected, rightly, that the governing body would break 12 to nine in favour of the CTC proposal. Only 24 hours before the meeting was due to take place, ILEA's legal adviser told the four teacher governors—the two head teachers and two other teachers—that they could not vote, on the strange ground that they had a pecuniary interest in the outcome. That matter subsequently went to court. It was the only one of the lawsuits that ILEA won.

Although I do not question the decision of the court, it was extraordinary that an education authority which said that its policy was to promote the involvement of teachers in the administration of its schools, sought to disqualify all four teachers on the governing body from taking part in the decision. The teachers were known to be three to one in favour of the schools becoming a CTC. The effect of ILEA's action was to reduce the majority from nine to eight. The eight Labour appointees then voted and behaved as a block throughout the consultation procedures and thereafter. All the other nine governors —the two parents, the foundation governors and the two non-Labour appointees—voted consistently the other way.

At the meeting it was agreed that consultation would take place on all three options—the schools becoming a CTC, adopting grant-maintained status or remaining as they were. The meeting was in May 1988 and it was decided that the consultation should continue until 17 December. A public consultation document was issued in July. There was a public meeting and parents' meetings in each of the schools. Written representations were made and teachers and parents had meetings in both schools.

It was agreed that if the governing body proceeded with either the CTC or grant-maintained option, there would be further consultation on the preferred option and a parents' ballot. There were two groups of parents—those opposed to and those in favour of the CTC option. Quite improperly, ILEA sought to help and promote the interests of the group that was opposed to the CTC. It paid for and produced what must be an extremely expensive leaflet setting out the opposition case. It connived in making available to that group a list of the names and addresses of the parents of the children at one of the schools. ILEA helped and promoted in a variety of ways the interests of parents who were opposed to the CTC. It was agreed that during the consultation period there would be a regular governors meeting every month to review progress. The eight Labour party appointees on the governing body attempted to ambush this procedure twice in five months by calling emergency meetings with some 72 hours' notice, in the hope of frustrating the proceedings. It became clear at the end of the consultation period that a significant majority of the parents, staff and teachers were in favour of the schools becoming a CTC. It was agreed that there would be a governors meeting on 20 January to make a decision.

At this stage ILEA pulled one of the most disgraceful stunts of any education authority or local authority of which I have knowledge. Its first action, which was not especially disgraceful, was another attempt to frustrate the process. It challenged the consultation procedure. At the end of the procedure, which had continued for six months, it was challenged on the ground that it should have been longer. ILEA lost that case at the High Court and at the Court of Appeal. Its second action was a real scandal. ILEA wrote to all 10 appointed governors on 3 November:

> "I ask you to indicate that as a representative of the authority you will support the authority's policy on the schools, namely to continue their status as voluntary controlled status schools".

That is an outrageous interference with the independence and discretion that is normally accorded to governors. At this stage the eight Labour party appointed governors were behaving like puppets. They responded by saying that they would support the authority. The other two governors, one of whom had been a member of the governing body for nearly 30 years and was a Member of this place—the other one is an extremely hard-working deputy chairman of the board of governors—said that they would not do so, as a result of which they received another letter on 22 December in which the threat was repeated in rather more obvious terms. The clerk to the authority wrote:

> "I am writing pursuant to our previous correspondence to inform you that the authority is minded to consider your removal from the governing body."

At a meeting on 17 January, three days before the proposed governors meeting to make a decision, ILEA proceeded to remove the two governors without giving them a hearing. While that was going on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science wrote to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Science, who had objected vehemently, and I think rightly, to Conservative local education authorities attempting to pack their school governing bodies with 100 per cent. Conservative governors. My right hon. Friend wrote to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he thought that there was a similar case to be considered and whether he would decry and denounce what ILEA was doing. The hon. Member for Blackburn declined to do so for reasons that seemed to me to produce false distinctions. At the end of the day, he was not prepared to criticise ILEA for its behaviour.

The two governors challenged ILEA's decision in the High Court. They won at both the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. It is one of the worst examples of abuse of municipal power and the misuse of ratepayers' money that I have come across.

The governors meeting was finally held and it was agreed to recommend the CTC option, which the consultation process that had thrown up as the most popular. It was agreed that there would be further consultation on the details of the option at a parents' ballot on 13 May. The ballot took place and it was won by 58 to 48. The teachers of both schools had previously voted in favour of there being a CTC. The governors therefore proceeded at a later meeting in July to issue a closure notice and to go ahead with the reconstitution of the schools.

One would have thought that at that stage, after democratic decisions of the parents, governors and teachers, that ILEA would say, "We advanced our side of the argument in the consultation procedure and we lost." No, it was not prepared to do that. Shortly before the final governors meeting ILEA attempted to remove one of the parent governors. That was done in early July. The parent's child was due to leave the school in about a month's time at the end of the summer term. She had had her final interview with the head teacher. The ILEA had the nerve, the brass neck, to say that the parent no longer had the right to be a parent governor although her appointment was clearly to last for the whole school year. The matter was taken to court by the parent governor. ILEA settled on terms requested by her at the door of the court. It agreed to reinstate her and to pay her costs. That is another example of municipal bullying.

ILEA then took yet another action. It ordered the governing body to split into separate governing bodies for the two schools despite there having been one governing body for over 100 years. It thought that it might win a governing body vote in the girls' school, although it knew that it would lose in the boys' school. The Secretary of State refused that application. ILEA went to court and again lost in the High Court and the Court of Appeal. ILEA has subsequently challenged the Secretary of State's decision to issue a closure notice. That is the subject of the existing lawsuit and I shall not dwell on that. It is presently in the Court of Appeal; I understand that the hearing is taking place and judgment is awaited.

Earlier this year, the governing body had to be re-elected and reconstituted under the new rules set by the Education Reform Act 1988. That meant there would be five elected parent governors, instead of two. Those parent governor elections took the form of a direct contest between those who were in favour of the CTC and those against. The pro-CTC parents secured four of the five places, and failed to gain the fifth place by only three votes. One would have thought that was an overwhelming endorsement of the governing body's decision.

However, even in the face of that further democratic decision, ILEA has taken several other steps. It has pursued the appeal, the subject of the outstanding case. The five governors whom ILEA is entitled to appoint to the governing body are all Labour party appointees. Not one representative or appointee has been nominated by the minority parties. ILEA has tried again, by administrative measures, to split the governing bodies and the governors have refused.

Lewisham, which will take over education responsibilities in April, is making noises that it might do the same. I hope that it will not, because if it splits the governing bodies, in a year's time there will be the most awful chaos. That would involve new governing bodies being formed in April 1991 and parents' elections, which would take about six weeks. Therefore, in the middle of June, two years later, there would be a vote on whether the schools should become CTCs. At that time the closure process will already be 19 months down the road, the CTC will be due to open in September 1991, teachers will have been hired, money spent and pupils promised places. I hope that it will not do that, although I am not filled with great hope in the light of some of its other actions. It is threatening to refuse builders access to the sites while they remain technically local education authority administered schools.

At the end of last year, the Audit Commission published a report directed at local education authorities' new responsibilities. It made the crucial point that local education authorities must take note of the Education Reform Act 1988. It said:

> "LEAs should recognise these shifts"
> —in preferences and alternatives—
> "and adapt their procedures. Refusing to do so, campaigning against alternative types of provision and refusing to co-operate with the new CTCs or grant-maintained schools, is hard to reconcile with the LEA's duties."

Apparently, it is not difficult for ILEA to reconcile that, although one would have thought that it should be. I hope that the London borough of Lewisham will adopt a more constructive attitude.

That was an abuse of power by the Inner London education authority on a quite outrageous scale. It attempted to prevent teachers from voting, whom it pretends should be more involved in the running of schools. Its eight appointees behaved like Labour party puppets throughout the procedure and voted as a block. They cannot possibly have all individually agreed on every single issue that came before the governing bodies during that year and a half, but they all voted the same way. It attempted to call three emergency meetings at short notice to reverse decisions that had been taken at meetings of which more reasonable notice had been given. It aided and abetted, in an improper and inappropriate way, the group of parents opposed to the school becoming a CTC. It challenged the consultation in court at a late stage in an attempt to frustrate the procedure. Above all, its attempt to remove the two governors who refused to toe the Labour party line, is one of the most outrageous abuses of municipal power and misuse of ratepayers' money that I have ever witnessed.

After the decision had been made and democratic votes had been taken by the teachers, governors and parents, ILEA refused to acknowledge that decision. It tried to remove a parent governor and split the governing body. It has challenged the Secretary of State in court and even after the new parent governor elections were overwhelmingly won by those in favour of the school becoming a CTC, it pursued that lawsuit and threatens, along with the London borough of Lewisham, to split the governing bodies in a year's time.

In pursuit of this vendetta it has spent more than £250,000 of ratepayers' money. That was an abuse of power, which showed that it had undemocratic objectives of pure party dogma. It is difficult to understand how that can have continued after a democratic decision had been taken. The campaigning that went on before was perhaps the cut and thrust of politics, although it was at the very least bullying for a rich local education authority to use its resources, money and power in that way, but it was totally wrong for it to do so after a democratic decision had been taken.

I should like the Government to do two things to stop this frustration. First, the governing bodies should not be able to vote for the revocation of closure notices which the Secretary of State has issued to be effective without the Secretary of State's approval. If any such processes succeed in frustrating the wishes of the governing bodies of the schools, those closure notices should not be able to be revoked without the consent of the Secretary of State. Secondly, governing bodies should not be able to be split by their local education authorities against the wishes of the members of the joint governing bodies without the Secretary of State's approval. The consultation procedure has shown that those two processes are weapons which those who oppose schools becoming grant-maintained or city technology colleges have in their hands in an extremely unfair way.

Throughout the whole of this sorry saga the Labour-controlled Inner London education authority has flouted democratic procedures, packed the governing body or attempted to do so, misused public money and refused to accept democratic decisions. I am sorry to say that that vexatious harassment continues to this day.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Alan Howarth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) on securing this Adjournment debate, and I congratulate his constituents on being represented by him. It is acknowledged on both sides of the House that he is an independent and determined representative of his constituents' interests in education and other matters. As a good representative of his constituents he cares very much about educational opportunities and that is why he is a strong supporter of the proposal that there should be a city technology college in Lewisham.

It is sad that there should have been the history of bitterness and disagreement that my hon. Friend has described. I deplore the obstructionism and the negative, ungenerous and reactionary attitude of the Inner London education authority in the face of proposals that are certainly intended to benefit children and young people in that part of London and would undoubtedly be to their benefit. It is sad that there should be that disagreement, and it passes belief that the assertion should be made that nothing should change in the face of the significant educational disadvantage which too many children have for far too long experienced in parts of London.

Against that background, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was pleased to agree with the Haberdashers' Company in its generous proposal to participate in establishing a city technology college in the present Haberdashers' Aske's schools. As legal proceedings are continuing in the Court of Appeal, clearly it would be inappropriate for me to comment on matters that are the subject of those proceedings, as you have already advised me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend outlined the complex and disturbing history of those events fully and usefully, so I shall not dwell on the history of the proposal.

At the end of his remarks my hon. Friend asked me two specific questions. They are important and, of course, relevant to the circumstances that he described. I shall certainly ask my right hon. Friend to consider with great care the suggestions that he made.

I should like to set the Lewisham CTC project in the context of my right hon. Friend's programme to establish a network of city technology colleges. All such schools are established in pursuit of the same broad aims, and have fundamental characteristics in common. Each school will also have its own distinct character, and the potential to make an important contribution to education in its area.

Provision was made in section 105 of the Education Reform Act 1988 for the establishment of city technology colleges. These are independent non fee-paying schools, established in urban areas, for pupils aged 11 to 18. They are required to offer the national curriculum but place special emphasis on mathematics, science and technology. They are established and maintained by sponsors drawn from business and industry, and other sponsors such as livery companies. Capital funding is through a partnership between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the sponsors. My right hon. Friend supports the running costs of CTCs on a basis comparable with expenditure on secondary education by local education authorities in similar areas.

Why has my right hon. Friend sought to establish CTCs? It was the overall purpose of the Education Reform Act 1988 to improve quality and to widen parental choice in education. The city technology college programme addressed a particular problem in education in this country—the fact that children of average and below average ability have been performing less well in mathematics and science than those in some of our competitor countries—West Germany, for example. That problem has been particularly apparent in inner urban areas.

There is an issue, not just of academic attainment, but of whether, in comparison with what happens in some other countries, our young people are adequately prepared for their role in the entrepreneurial and technological society in which we live. Opportunities are becoming more widely available for young people in schools to understand and experience the world of business and industry, and the changing technology, changing markets, and changing management practice in those environments.

Such opportunities need to be extended and reinforced. Ways of achieving that include involving business sponsors in the management of schools and approaches to teaching and learning that take account of the impact of new technology in today's world. City technology colleges are adopting those approaches.

The CTCs already in existence are making a determined and vigorous attack on the problems that I have outlined. Three colleges have opened. Altogether, 12 have firm opening dates for this year and next. Parents in the areas where city technology colleges have opened, or are about to open, are responding positively to the wider choice and new opportunities offered to their children. Admissions to the schools have been heavily oversubscribed in every case. The numbers of applications for teaching posts in CTCs have also been generally very high, and it is clear that many teachers are strongly attracted to the opportunity to teach in those schools.

The curriculum of a CTC will place particular emphasis on mathematics, science and technology, and the use of information technology to support the curriculum in other subjects. The organisation and management of the schools will also normally involve extensive use of new technology, familiarising pupils with everyday uses in businesses and other organisations. CTCs will nevertheless teach a balanced curriculum. It will be possible for CTCs to achieve those two objectives because they normally operate a longer school day than other secondary schools —and in some cases, a longer school year. That approach makes heavy demands on teachers and pupils alike, but, at the admission stage, the schools ensure that parents fully understand that entering a CTC involves a special degree of commitment to the opportunity offered, including a broad spectrum of opportunities post-16.

The Government's intention is that CTCs will demonstrate new approaches to enabling secondary pupils of all abilities to achieve higher levels of attainment, particularly in mathematics, science and technology. The schools will be exemplars. It is intended that they should build on the good practice that is being developed, but which has not yet been sufficiently widely replicated. CTCs will develop innovative approaches that other schools will want to adopt. As a result, we expect that standards will be raised across the system. I hope that Lewisham children will have the opportunity to benefit in that way.

Each CTC will be consciously part of the national network of CTCs aiming to make a significant contribution to this country's education. A CTC also has an important role as a local school. It will inevitably develop working links with other schools in its area. Those will necessarily include close and fruitful relationships with feeder primary schools. It will be important, for example, for primary teachers, pupils and parents to understand and indeed to "taste" what a CTC offers to pupils within its catchment area. Without such contacts and co-operation, parents and pupils will not be able to exercise a free choice or be prepared for the opportunities available.

CTCs will also seek to develop mutually beneficial relationships with other secondary schools and with local colleges, with a view to sensible sharing of facilities and joint teaching initiatives.

In establishing CTCs, the Government have added to the diversity of educational opportunity in this country, on the basis that problems which have been with us for a long time need to be approached in a variety of ways, with opportunities given for experiment and innovation. Wherever CTCs are situated, and whatever the political views and priorities of the local education authority, it should be remembered that CTC places are open to young people of all levels of ability in their designated catchment areas, and that a new and exciting type of opportunity is involved.

It is, therefore, clearly against the interests of local children and the likely wishes of their parents if local education authorities adopt the attitude which some, sadly, have adopted of not only opposing the establishment of a CTC in their area but of ostracising it once it is established.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, I find deplorable the reactionary, ungenerous, defensive and negative attitude of far too many in the educational establishment —whether they be councillors, officers or, regrettably, teachers—who have not been willing to be generous in their recognition of the attempt made by others who have taken advantage of the opportunity offered by the Government to exercise their democratic right to vote for independence in the grant-maintained sector. They have not been willing to recognise the generosity of benefactors such as the Haberdashers' Company, which is willing to give generous resources to the benefit of education in areas where all too often it has not been of the standard that we want for local children. It is absurd to deny local children the opportunity of a CTC.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West, I look forward to the establishment of the Haberdashers' CTC and to a new and exciting phase in its long support of education in Lewisham. That will be to the benefit of children in Lewisham.

Mr. Maples: I asked my hon. Friend two specific points, which he said he would discuss with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, about the withdrawal of closure notices and the splitting of governing bodies without someone else's consent. Does he agree that those methods of frustration should not be available to people who oppose these procedures?

Mr. Howarth: I understand my hon. Friend's strength of feeling on those two points, which are enormously important in the context of the events that he outlined. It would be wrong, however, for me to express a view on the proprieties or practicalities of the law. I am more than happy to undertake to draw those important considerations to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State so that he can think carefully about the appropriate policy.

In the meantime, I very much share my hon. Friend's view that a CTC in Lewisham represents a splendid opportunity for young people there. I am sure that friends of education and children in the borough of Lewisham will look forward to the successful establishment of this important educational enterprise.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past Three o'clock.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Teachers (Unfair Dismissal)

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to ensure that teachers will be properly protected from unfair dismissal by boards of governors having regard to the additional new powers being conferred on such boards.

Dr. Mawhinney: The employment of teachers in schools in Northern Ireland will continue to be subject to the normal contracts of employment and the protection afforded by employment legislation. Where a board of governors has the power to require a teacher to cease work at a school the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 lays down clear procedures which must be followed. These provide for the employing authority to give advice to the board of governors in each case and for the teacher concerned to have an opportunity to make representations before a decision is taken, and a subsequent right of appeal.

I shall be taking steps to ensure that forthcoming guidance to employing authorities in relation to local management of schools will stress the need for appropriate advice, support and training to be given to boards of governors in relation to their new powers in this area.

The Department of Education (NI) will also, after consultation with interested parties, be making an order modifying present employment legislation relating to the employer-employee relationship in order to ensure that the powers of boards of governors are matched by corresponding obligations.

Suicides

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many attempted suicides were recorded in Northern Ireland during 1989 at (a) prison establishments, (b) remand establishments and (c) young offenders centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: The precise information requested is not available as it is not possible always to distinguish between an attempted suicide and self-inflicted injury perpetrated for other reasons.

The table records incidents of self-inflicted injury in Northern Ireland prison service establishments during 1989:

Establishment	Number of incidents recorded—convicted prisoners	Number of incidents recorded—unconvicted prisoners	Total
Her Majesty's Prison Belfast	9	28	37
Her Majesty's Prison Magilligan	3	—	3
Her Majesty's Prison Maze	3	—	3
Her Majesty's Prison Maghaberry	3	2	5
Her Majesty's Young Offenders Centre Hydebank	2	1	3

Pre-School Education

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will review the availability and quality of pre-school education in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 9 March 1990]: Responsibility for services for pre-school children is shared between the Department of Health and Social Services and the Department of Education for Northern Ireland.

As part of a broader review of health and social services boards' policy on child care, the social services inspectorate of the Department of Health and Social Services is currently undertaking an examination of the level of daycare provision available for young children. The results of this review will be available shortly. Day care facilities are required to be registered by the boards, and the quality of care provided in them is monitored by regular visits by social workers.

The availability of nursery education for children under compulsory school age in nursery schools and nursery classes in primary schools is kept under review by the Department of Education, but in recent years limited resources for school building have made it necessary to give priority to provision for children of compulsory school age. The Department of Education monitors the quality of nursery education being provided through its inspectorate's programme of school inspections and visits.

ENERGY

Natural Gas

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) at what pressure, in the pipeline used to distribute natural gas in the United Kingdom, the natural gas is contained in (a) the high pressure regional transmission line, (b) the national transmission line, (c) the medium pressure distribution line and (d) the low pressure distribution line;

(2) how many kilometres of pipeline are used to distribute natural gas in the United Kingdom;

(3) of the total number of kilometres of pipeline used to distribute natural gas in the United Kingdom, how many kilometres are (a) high pressure regional transmission line, (b) national transmission line, (c) medium pressure distribution line and (d) low pressure distribution line;

(4) what is the age of the pipeline used to distribute natural gas in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Wakeham: These are matters for British Gas plc.

Gas Meters

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give precise figures for the results of the sample study of 100 meters mentioned in the 1989 Office of Gas Supply annual report concerning the relative accuracy of synthetic diaphragm meters and leather diaphragm meters.

Mr. Wakeham: The study referred to was commissioned by the Office of Gas Supply. It is therefore a matter for Ofgas.

Privatisation

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the activities his Department will carry out after the privatisation of the electricity industry and British Coal.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department will carry out such activities as are appropriate to the achievement of its objectives as stated in chapter 5 (energy) of "Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93" (Cm. 1005).

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Wakeham: Total expenditure on fees paid to outside organisations in relation to the privatisation of Amersham International, Britoil and Enterprise Oil could not be provided without incurring disproportionate cost. Fees paid to outside organisations in the case of the privatisation of British Gas and in the preparation for the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales are:

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Wakeham: The staffing of my Department's press office, including the speech-writing unit, is currently 13. There are no vacancies and no decisions have been made to change the complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimated expenditure in 1989-90 is £615,000. This figure includes:

(i) forecast expenditure by the Press Office.

(ii) staff costs (salaries, accommodation and common services) for all permanent information service and support staff currently in post in the press office (including the speech-writing unit).

The corresponding expenditure for previous years is as follows:

1988-89	475,000
1987-88	460,000
1986-87	293,000

Expenditure for the years prior to 1986-87 is not available on a comparable basis. Currently proposed expenditure for 1990-91 is £655,000.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) on 13 March 1989, Official Report, column 20.

The actual expenditure in 1988-89 and the estimated expenditure in the following two years is as follows:

Financial year	£
1988-89	27,496
1989-90	6,000
1990-91	12,000

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, further to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, columns 455-58, whether Dewe Rogerson submitted the lowest tender for the contract it obtained in February.

Mr. Wakeham: In appointing advisers, the Department considers all the relevant factors including price, experience, capability and value for money. The relative merits of candidates, on any of these factors, is commercially sensitive and it is the Government's established practice not to reveal information on performance of candidates in tender competitions.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, further to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, columns 455-58, how many companies were invited to tender for the contracts awarded to each of the advisers listed in his reply with the exception of the UKAEA, Nuclear Services Group and Dewe Rogerson; what were the names of the unsuccessful tenderers; and whether the tender accepted was the lowest.

Mr. Wakeham: It is my Department's policy to award contracts whenever possible by competitive tender, thus securing competitive rates for work. This procedure has been followed for the majority of the contracts awarded to the companies listed in my earlier reply. Details of individual cases are commercially confidential.

Kleinwort Benson

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions and for what purpose his Department has commissioned work from Kleinwort Benson since July 1988.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the role of Messrs Kleinwort Benson in the planned privatisation of electricity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy has commissioned work from Kleinwort Benson on a continuing basis since its appointment as our financial adviser to the flotation of the electricity industry.

Waste Heat

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has made an assessment of the waste heat generated by radio and television transmission stations; what investigations are taking place on how to enable the use of this waste heat; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: Equipment for such purposes is available from equipment suppliers, and I understand that following discussions with my Energy Efficiency Office some four years ago the BBC now makes use of such waste heat where it is practical to do so and has initiated a plan to improve energy efficiency in all its operations.

Oil Dumping

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what quantity of oil is dumped each year into the North sea from drilling; what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of such dumping; and if he has any plans to prohibit this practice.

Mr. Wakeham: The annual report published by the Department of Energy on "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom" lists the quantity of oil discharged with drill cuttings into the sea since 1981. In 1988 the amount, from 265 wells, was 19,480 tonnes (73·5 te/well). For 1989 the figure is in the region of 12,260 tonnes from 257 wells (47·7 te/well).

The reduction from 1988 to 1989 is due to the requirement that, as from 1 January 1989, the maximum oil on cuttings permitted to be discharged to the sea was 150 grammes oil/kilogramme cuttings.

All operators who wish to use oil-based drilling muds on production and development wells must undertake a programme of defined seabed surveys. The decision to restrict the level of oil on cuttings to 150 grammes/kilogramme was based on the results of these environmental surveys.

The North sea conference this week adopted the following provisions:

(i) Each North Sea country will develop National plans by 1991 aimed at prohibiting the discharges of oil contaminated cuttings; these plans are to be presented to the Paris Commission in 1991.

(ii) All discharges of oil contaminated cuttings from exploration and appraisal wells will be prohibited by 1994.

(iii) The Paris Commission is to decide not later than 1992, based upon work to be carried out by the Commission, on a practical and achievable date for prohibiting the discharge of all oil contaminated cuttings.

THE ARTS

Science Museum

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will give the attendance figures at (a) the South Kensington site, (b) the Bradford site and (c) the York site of the science museum for each of the last five years; and if he will indicate at what date charges were introduced at each site.

Mr. Luce: I am advised that the number of admissions at the science museum and the following outstations for the years 1985 to 1989 are as follows:

Admissions 1985-89

Year	Science museum (South Kensington)	National railway museum (York)	National museum of photography, film and television (Bradford)
1985	2,738,900	1,113,700	549,900
1986	2,994,500	932,900	677,300
1987	3,116,300	649,800	702,700
1988	2,261,000	565,600	824,800
1989	1,121,100	542,700	736,400

Figures for the years before charges were introduced are estimated attendances. I understand that admission charges were introduced at the national railway museum, York in April 1987 and at the science museum in October 1988. There are no admission charges to the national museum of photography, film and television, Bradford.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Arts what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Luce: The Office of Arts and Libraries has no statistical divisions or posts.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Arts (1) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91;

(2) what was the total expenditure by his office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Luce: The Office of Arts and Libraries is serviced by the press office of the Cabinet Office. I therefore refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to his corresponding questions in respect of the Cabinet Office.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Arts what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Luce: None.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Arts what were the figures for the spending by his office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to his corresponding question in respect of the Cabinet Office.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Arts what were the total fees paid out by his office to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Luce: The Office of Arts and Libraries was established in July 1983. No management consultants have been employed.

Arts Council

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish a list of all Arts Council clients that have a current deficit.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The Arts Council advises me that precise information cannot be provided until final end-year figures are available, as the financial position of arts organisations is constantly changing. In the latest survey, 43 of the Arts Council's 140 clients were projecting a deficit. Many of these were small, and most of the arts organisations concerned have put in hand action to remedy them.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Developing Countries (Debt)

82. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made representations to encourage British commercial banks to write down debts owed by developing countries in line with their increased provisions set aside to cover those debts.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has made no such representations. It is for commercial banks to decide whether to write down debts owed by developing countries, in line with their own commercial judgments.

Invisible Trade

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual total United Kingdom trade surplus in invisibles in each year since 1985.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates are available as series AIMB on the Central Statistical Office databases which is accessible via the Library.

Family Expenditure

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of how much in combination the increases in electricity, gas, water charges, mortgage repayments and the poll tax will cost in 1990-91 as against 1989-90, for a family on average earnings with two children.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that I am unable to provide this calculation.

Contingency Reserve

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of the contingency reserve.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The reserve for 1990-91 has been set at £3 billion, as announced in the 1989 Autumn Statement.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the private medical insurance industry concerning the extension of the present tax reliefs on private medical insurance.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has received a number of representations.

Works of Art

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how works of art donated to the nation in lieu of Inland Revenue debts are accounted for in the budget for arts and libraries and the public expenditure planning system.

Mr. Norman Lamont: When a work of art is accepted in lieu of tax, the Inland Revenue is reimbursed for the tax forgone. Both the Office of Arts and Libraries and the Department of the Environment have vote provision to make such payments: in 1989-90 this amounted to £1 million for each of them. This provision forms part of their respective public expenditure programmes.

Also, as announced on 26 July 1985, this provision may be supplemented by access to the reserve for up to £10 million in any one year for large and important offers. When such offers are accepted, parliamentary approval for the extra provision is obtained by a supplementary estimate. This access to the reserve does not add to the planned total of public expenditure. No compensating reductions are sought from the Office of Arts and Libraries or the Department of the Environment when such access is granted.

National Income

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage, in the latest available year, of the national income of the United Kingdom was made up of wages and salaries.

Mr. Major: During 1988, the latest available year, wages and salaries made up 63·5 per cent. of national income.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Lilley: The information the hon. Member requests is already available in the appropriation accounts for the departments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the relevant years. The relevant expenditure recorded in those accounts includes fees paid to outside organisations but those fees could not be identified separately except at disproportionate cost. Costs incurred by Her Majesty's Treasury in connection with the privatisation programme in 1989-90 and 1990-91 will be reported to Parliament in due course in the usual way.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing, for each region, total investment by companies in plant and machinery.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 7 March 1990]: The available data relate to capital expenditure in manufacturing industry. Figures for 1987, the latest available year, are given in the table:

Net capital expenditure in manufacturing industry[1] on plant and machinery in 1987 by standard region of the United Kingdom

Region	£ million
North	491
Yorkshire and Humberside	882
East Midlands	610
East Anglia	258

WALES

Library Services

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been made by district councils in Wales, which are not library authorities, for an order under subsection (2) of clause 207 of the Local Government Act 1972, to operate library services.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A total of 15 district councils in Wales, which were not then library authorities, made application under this provision in the period before its expiry on 1 April 1974.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he intends to amend section 207 of the Local Government Act 1972, in respect of the provision of library services in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has no present intention of doing so.

Meibion Glyndŵr

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many letters he has received claiming to know the identity of Meibion Glyndŵr and claiming the £50,000 reward offered for such information; on what dates these letters were received; and what action he has taken.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received two letters claiming to know the identity of Meibion Glyndŵr during the past year. Both have been forwarded to the Home Office.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to secure a transcript of all the comments made in the conference held in Aberystwyth on Saturday 23 February on the need for a new Welsh language Act; and if he will make a statement in response to such an Act.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has already received a report on the conference held in Aberystwyth on 23 February. Careful consideration is being given to the legislative proposals submitted by the Welsh Language Board.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many courses are currently offered in the Welsh language in (a) Gwynedd technical college, (b) Llandrillo tech and (c) the North East Wales institute of higher education; and if he will name the courses and the number of students currently on each one.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Course details and the number of students currently taking courses in the Welsh language are not readily available. Information is held only in respect of bilingual further education courses by vocational subject areas at the three institutions:

(a) Gwynedd Technical College—Secretarial, Business and Commerce, Nursery Nursing, Catering, Home Economics, Community Care, Communication.
(b) Llandrillo Technical College—Secretarial, Business and Commerce
(c) North East Wales Institute of Higher Education—Business and Commerce, Nursery Nursing, Technician.

Dr. Thomas : To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many courses in the Welsh language will be offered in (a) Clwyd college and (b) Gwynedd college following the implementation of programmes on tertiary education in both counties.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has not received any formal proposals affecting the organisation of secondary education in Clwyd and Gwynedd. If proposals are submitted and approved, the question of provision of Welsh language courses will be a matter for the respective authority.

Bathing Water Pollution

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the results of all the total coliforms samples at Kinmel bay during the 1989 bathing season, together with the dates on which the samples were taken.

Mr. Grist: The information is shown in the table:

Roads

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will be inviting tenders for the construction of the second and third sections of the M4 missing link near Port Talbot.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave on 22 January 1990, Official Report, column 608.

Telephone Exchanges

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many telephone exchanges were based in each district, borough and city council in Wales prior to the privatisation of British Telecom.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information is not available in the form requested. There were, however, 609 exchanges and two trunk exchanges in Wales prior to the privatisation of British Telecom.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: At 1 March 1990, the number of staff in post in the information officer grades in the Welsh Office was 12. At that date there were five vacancies. The proposed complement for 1990-91 remains 17.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: Figures for expenditure by the Department's information division, including staff and press cutting service but excluding media advertising and promotion material, cannot readily be disaggregated for the years 1979-88.

Figures for the succeeding years are:

1989-90	487,000

The estimated budget for 1990-91 has yet to be settled.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: Current staffing levels within my Department's economic and statistical services division are as follows:

As at 1 January 1990

Professional Posts	Staff in Post
Senior Economic Adviser (Grade 5)	1·0
Chief Statistician (Grade 5)	1·0
Senior Statistician (Grade 6)	1·0
Statistician (Grade 7)	10·5
Principal Research Officer (Grade 7)	2·5
Economic Adviser (Grade 7)	1·0
Statistical Computing Officer	2·0
Senior Assistant Statistician	6·0
Assistant Statistician	2·0
Total Professional Posts	27·0
Administrative Posts
Grade 7	1·0
Higher Executive Officer	3·0
Executive Officer	14·5
Administrative Officer	22·0
Administrative Assistant	5·0
Personal Secretary	2·0
Total Administrative Staff	47·5
Grand Total	74·5

Since the introduction of delegated manpower budgeting, the formal complement is no longer the basis for staffing. The budget for 1990-91 is not yet determined.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: It is not the practice to comment on individual advisers' fees. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will report the total cost of water privatisation to Parliament, in due course, in the normal way.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the figures for spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: Figures for expenditure on newspaper advertising for the years 1979-80 to 1984-85 could not be split without disproportionate cost. The information is as follows:

	Radio advertising	Television advertising	Newspaper advertising	Other promotional material
1979-80	Nil		61,000	24,200
1980-81	Nil		62,000	22,171
1981-82	Nil		100,000	43,773
1982-83	Nil		99,000	28,486
1983-84	Nil		108,000	34,234
1984-85	Nil		66,300	100,331
1985-86	Nil	Nil	30,825	91,602
1986-87	Nil	27,000	49,254	330,711
1987-88	Nil	18,363	38,612	589,478
1988-89	Nil	42,400	37,190	975,050
1989-90	Nil	60,408	239,996	953,096

Note: The total budget and media split for such expenditure in 1990-91 is not yet determined.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Cancer

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what importance he places on the monitoring of the incidence of various forms of cancer in Wales, generally and by district, in relation to (a) identifying trends, (b) seeking to identify causes and (c) the search for prevention and cure.

Mr. Grist: Cancer registration data covering all forms of cancer in Wales are continually collected, kept under review and periodically published. The most recent report, published in 1988, is entitled "Cancer Registration in Wales 1974-1984". These activities form an important part of the Department's efforts to improve the public health of the Principality.

Health Service Contracts

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether the paper "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Contracts" published by the Department of Health applies to Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Contracts" was issued to Health Service management in Wales on 6 March 1990 under cover of a letter from the director, NHS Wales. Subject to discussion with district health authorities and other health interests in Wales, the arrangements proposed in the guidance will apply in the Principality.

Malpas Bypass

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest expected date for the start of work on the Malpas bypass.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Start of work is planned in the financial year 1990-91 as announced in the Welsh Office commentary on the public expenditure White Paper published on 9 March.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) staff and (b) staff hours are deployed in his private office on hon. Members' immigration arbitration decisions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Staff in my private office and that of my right hon. and learned Friend undertake a range of duties, including the consideration of hon. Members' representations to Ministers on individual immigration cases. No staff are employed solely to deal with such representations and no record is kept of the number of staff hours spent on such work.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to collect information on the number of representations his private office receives from hon. Members on arbitration on a decision of the chief immigration officer.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. This information is not readily available and its collection would serve little practical purpose. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to his question on 2 March at column 349.

Prisons (Emergency Procedures)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department in ensuring that all prison officers are fully trained to deal with an emergency within the prison in which they are working.

Mr. Mellor: The policy is that all prison officers should be made aware of what is expected of them in an emergency and be trained in the necessary skills. All new prison officers are required to attend a nine-week residential course and a range of in-service training is provided. During the past year the service has been engaged in a substantial programme to train staff in methods of dealing with major incidents of violent concerted indiscipline.

Meibion Glyndŵr

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many letters he has received from people claiming to know the identity of Meibion Glyndŵr and inquiring about the £50,000 reward offered for such information; and what action has been taken consequent on such correspondence;

(2) whether the policy of offering a £50,000 reward by the North Wales police for information concerning Meibion Glyndŵr was approved by his Department prior to being instigated.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There is no record of the Home Office having received any letters making such claims. If any were received, they would be passed directly to the police for investigation. The decision whether to offer a reward is an operational matter for the chief officer, which does not require the approval of the Home Office.

BBC

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has made any official representations to the BBC regarding political bias in BBC local radio.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Suspects' Rights

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to take account of the findings of the May inquiry before deciding on any changes to suspects' rights.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend does not intend to hold up the review of the codes of practice made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which is nearing completion, but when considering any proposals for changes to suspects' rights he will have regard to the possible merits of postponing decisions until after Sir John May's recommendations have been received.

Suicides

Sir Charles Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many suicides and how many attempted suicides have taken place in penal establishments in each of the last 10 years; and how many of these were (a) remand prisoners, (b) female prisoners, (c) prisoners under 21 and (d) prisoners from ethnic minorities;

(2) how many suicides and how many attempted suicides have taken place in each individual penal establishment in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: Table A gives the numbers of inmates in each prison establishment in England and Wales who have died in each year since 1980 and have been found at an inquest to have committed suicide. Figures are also given for the number of incidents of self-injury in 1989 which were regarded as suicide attempts; only partial information is available for earlier years.

Table B gives the number of suicides by unconvicted inmates, female inmates and inmates under the age of 21. No such breakdown can be given of figures for attempted suicides. Information on the ethnic origin of inmates who have committed suicide is not readily available.

Table A: Suicides at prison establishments 1980-1989 and attempted suicides 1989

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes he is proposing to reduce the number of hours that young remand prisoners are kept locked in cells.

Mr. Mellor: Governors are encouraged to provide the best regimes possible within the resources available to them. A seminar was held in June 1989 for most prisons and remand centres holding young unconvicted prisoners for the purpose of exchanging knowledge and experience in providing for the needs of such prisoners. This led to action plans being prepared for improving procedures and enhancing regimes, including provision for education classes, physical education and other facilities involving more time out of cell. These plans are now being implemented and the results of the seminar have been communicated to other establishments so that the shared experience may help generally in efforts to improve procedures and regimes.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply figures for the number of people currently held on remand in British prisons and the numbers of these who have to share cells with (a) one other person and (b) two or more people.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 January 1990 there were 9,760 males and 443 females held on remand in England and Wales, compared with 10,486 males and 477 females on 31 January 1989.

The most recent readily available information on multiple occupancy of cells designed for one in local prisons and remand centres is given in the table, along with comparable figures for the previous year:

	12 February 1989	11 February 1990
Two in a Cell
Males	11,068	10,476
Females	118	80
Three in a Cell

These figures cover sentenced and convicted unsentenced prisoners as well as unconvicted prisoners; the information is not collected in a way that enables the number of unconvicted prisoners to be separately identified.

Responsibility for prisons in Scotland rests with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply figures for the number of people who are currently on remand in British prisons and who have applied for bail, who are having to share cells with (a) one other person and (b) two or more people.

Mr. Mellor: Figures for the number of people held on remand who have applied for bail are not collected centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Metropolitan police; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that, at the end of February 1990, the complement and strength figures by grade for the statistics branch of the Metropolitan police office were:

	Complement	Strength
Grade 7	1	1·0
SEO	1	—
HEO	3	3·0
EO	8	8·0
AO	60	52·5
Support Grade Band 1	1	1·0
	80	71·5

Only the grade 7 post is filled by a statistician, the remaining posts being filled by executive, administrative and support grades staff, who undertake a mixture of statistical and administrative duties. An additional grade 7 post filled by a statistician is located in the management support department. The complement of the branch will be reduced by three posts in 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is given in the table:

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Waddington: Under the Director of Information there are 20 press officers with seven support staff. In addition within the public relations branch there are 16 publicity officers with six support staff. The same balance and complement is proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Metropolitan police; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that, at the end of February 1990, 88 staff of all grades were employed within the directorate of public affairs of the Metropolitan police office against a complement of 89 posts. A final decision has yet to be taken about the complement of the directorate for 1990-91.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Waddington: Figures for expenditure on newspaper and television advertising for the years from 1979-80 to 1983-84 were given in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 25 May 1985 at column 587 and those for 1984-85 were given in answer to another question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 19 December 1985 at column 275.

Figures for radio advertising and other promotional literature for the years from 1979-80 to 1984-85 were given in answer to questions from the hon. Member on 19 November 1986 at columns 202-04 and the hon. Member was also given in those replies figures for expenditure on newspaper, television and radio advertising and other promotional literature for 1985-86. Expenditure figures for the years from 1986-87 to 1990-91 are as follows:

Year	Total advertising expenditure (all media) £ million	Production and distribution of other promotional material £ million
1987-88	4·7	2·1
1988-89	5·4	2·8
1989-90 (estimate)	5·6	3·5
1990-91 (provisional)	8·3	4·5

It would not be possible to provide more detailed information for these years except at disproportionate cost.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total fees paid out by the Metropolitan police to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner that payments by the Metropolitan police to management and computer consultants in each financial year from 1984-85, estimated expenditure for 1989-90 and budget estimates for 1990-91 are as follows:

1985-86	433,000
1986-87	558,000
1987-88	702,000
1988-89	742,000
[1]1989-90	981,000
[2]1990-91	755,000

[2] Budget estimate.

Separate information on management consultants alone is not readily available and cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost. Information for the years prior to 1984-85 is not available.

Breathalysers

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will arrange for a test for the BTE breathalyser device to be carried out by the organisation which validates the accuracy and reliability of similar machines used by the police and for the results to be published and distributed to all police authorities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no knowledge of the BTE breathalyser device. If my hon. Friend is able to provide further details of the device, such as the name of the manufacturer, we will make inquiries.

Asthmatic Prisoners

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recorded asthmatics were received into prison in the last year for which there are figures; and how many asthma attacks were reported in that year.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not recorded centrally. Perhaps my hon. Friend would write to me if he has an individual case in mind.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Foreign Students

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of foreign students who have entered British universities for each year since 1985.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers of full-time undergraduate and postgraduate overseas domiciled new entrants at British universities were as follows:

Academic year beginning	Number
1985	23,219
1986	24,809
1987	24,909
1988	26,856

Source: Universities' Statistical Record.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the income to British universities from foreign students for the past five years.

Mr. Jackson: British universities' fee income from mainly non-EC overseas full-time students in 1988-89 is as follows:

Academic Year	£ million
1983-84	92·40
1984-85	104·45
1985-86	124·56
1986-87	142·16
1987-88	156·51
[1]1988-89	171·20

Surplus School Places

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is his estimate of the cost of keeping surplus places in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of surplus places in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools; and if he will give his answer in tabular form by local education authority.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The premises-related costs at current prices of retaining a surplus primary and secondary place are estimated to be £140 and £230 a year respectively. There are additional but unquantified teaching costs, and opportunity costs arising from inefficient retention of buildings and land.

It is estimated that in January 1989 there were approximately 800,000 surplus primary school places and 860,000 surplus secondary school places in England. Information about the number of surplus places in individual local education authorities is not held centrally.

Local Management of Schools

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will explain the arrangements which will allow the transitional funding arrangements for local management of schools to be extended beyond the normal four-year period.

Mrs. Rumbold: We are looking sympathetically at LEA proposals to extend the transition period for individual schools which would otherwise face annual reductions of 1 per cent. or more in their total budgets because of high inherited staff costs.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the general schools budget has been proposed by each education authority for which he has responsibility for distribution to individual schools for use under local management of schools; and what levels he has agreed to in the schemes which he has approved.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) on 5 February 1990, Official Report, column 451. The total amount held back from distribution to schools by local education authorities is not subject to approval. However, there is an upper limit of 10 per cent. of the general schools budget on the amount that may be held back for spending on the majority of items over which local education authorities have discretion whether to retain central control.

Special Educational Needs

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will update the table published in reply to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) of 16 November 1989, Official Report, columns 389-92, listing the number of children with statements of special educational needs and as a percentage of all pupils in maintained schools in England by local education authority; and if he will list the numbers and percentages of children with statements of special educational needs for the years 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested for 1985 and 1989 is given in the following tables.

Directly comparable figures for 1984 are not available. The Education Act 1981, which replaced the system of special educational treatment for pupils under the Education Act 1944 with the concept of special educational provision, did not come into effect until April 1983. The first collection of statistics on the number of pupils with statements of special educational needs was in January 1984 and consequently the numbers in this early transitional period are small compared to subsequent years.

In January 1984 in England there were 14,563 pupils with statements of special educational needs and 124,312 pupils requiring special educational treatment attending maintained schools. These represent 0·2 and 1·7 per cent.

of all pupils in maintained schools respectively. Many of the latter would subsequently have been made the subject of a statement.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many appeals he has received in respect of the special education provision being made for children with special learning difficulties such as dyslexia; and what was the longest and shortest period of time taken in making a decision on these appeals.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he received the appeal in respect of the special educational provision being made for Lorne Felgate of Shoeburyness, Essex; and when he expects to make a decision.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend received the appeal on 22 May 1989. There has been an extended exchange of correspondence between the parents and the LEA involved and he expects to make a decision as soon as inquiries with those parties have been concluded.

Single-sex Schools, London

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in respect of each of those local education authority maintained single-sex schools in London which have been closed since 1985 he will list (i) the gender of pupils, (ii) the physical capacity and (iii) the number of pupils on roll at the most recent convenient date before closure.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information on the physical capacity of schools is not collected centrally. The maintained single-sex schools in inner London which have closed since 1985 and the number of pupils on roll before closure are as follows:

LEAs (Invoice Settlement)

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has issued any notices to local education authorities about the settlement of invoices from suppliers.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has not issued any notices to local education authorities about the settlement of invoices from suppliers.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mrs. Rumbold: The current number of staff in post and the total number of posts (including vacancies) is as follows:

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mrs. Rumbold: The expenditure figures for press and public relations by this Department for the financial years 1984-85 to 1989-90 are provided in the table. Figures for 1979 to 1983-84 are not available on a comparable basis. The 1989-90 figure is provisional. The 1990-91 estimate is not finalised.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mrs. Rumbold: The current number of staff in post and the total number of posts, including vacancies, is as follows:

	Staff in post	Total posts (including vacancies)

Grade 3 (Director of Statistics)	1	1
Grade 5 (Chief Statistician)	2	2

No decision has been reached on what, if any, changes there should be in the staffing structure in 1990-91.

The difference between last year's figures and the figures shown in the table is due to the fact that during the year 61 posts from statistics branch in Darlington (mainly concerned with data processing functions) were transferred to information systems branch.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year: and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mrs. Rumbold: In the privatisation of the National Seed Development Organisation and some of the assets of the Plant Breeding Institute, the fees and other sale expenses totalled about £600,000, as stated in the published appropriation account for class XII vote 13 for 1987-88. This is the only privatisation conducted by this Department in the period referred to.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what instructions have been given by his Department to General Certificate of Education examination boards to cease to pay teachers, with retrospective effect to the 1989 examination, for marking A-level course work and project work; whether it is intended that such marking in future should be undertaken by teachers on an unpaid basis in directed time under their contract of employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: None. Such arrangements are for the GCE examination boards to organise.

Teachers

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of his proposals for licensed teachers and articled teachers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has announced his acceptance of 16 bids for support under the local education authority training grants scheme (LEATGS) for articled teacher schemes. The schemes will be run by partnerships involving both local education authorities and initial teacher training institutions. A total of some 600 places will be available for articled teachers this September.

The bids received for funding of licensed teacher training under the new LEATGS national priority area reflect extensive interest in the scheme among LEAs. In advance of specific funding becoming available, 21 licensed teachers have already been appointed and a further 25 applications are under consideration.

The Government are providing grant aid to support £5·3 million of expenditure by LEAs on the articled and licensed teacher schemes in financial year 1990-91. An announcement on the allocation to individual LEAs will be made shortly.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he is taking to ensure that a larger proportion of religious education teachers are qualified to teach this subject.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government support the in-service training of teachers in religious education under the local education authority training grants scheme. The total of expenditure supported in 1989-90 is £1·1 million. In 1990-91, training in religious education will be subsumed within the national priority area for the basic curriculum and collective worship.

Teachers (Incentive Allowances)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the level of incentive allowance which would require to be paid in addition to basic starting salary to enable a teacher to enter the housing market, by region, on the basis of the figures given in the answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 19 February, Official Report, column 518.

Mrs. Rumbold: The ability of an individual on any given salary to enter the housing market will vary according to the size of mortgage he requires for the property of his choice, the lending rules of the source of his mortgage and the proportion of his income he is prepared to devote to this purpose.

Institute of Food Research

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will reconsider his decision to close the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research.

Agricultural and Food Research Council

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the decision was taken that the Agricultural and Food Research Council would henceforth concentrate on generic, rather than commodity, research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The funds received by the Agricultural and Food Research Council (AFRC) from the science budget are used to support basic and strategic research underpinning the needs of the United Kingdom farming and food industries. Commissions for commodity research, placed with the council, are being reduced following the Government's policy decision to withdraw from near-market research. The council is adjusting its programme accordingly, but commodity research remains an important element of the AFRC programme.

Fiji

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom Government have been asked for any advice over the drafting of a new constitution for Fiji; and if he will make a statement.

Romania

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has had on the human rights situation in Romania in the post-revolutionary period.

However, there is still cause for concern in a number of areas, such as the rights of minorities.

South Africa

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the South African Government in respect of the further release of political prisoners.

We hope those talks will begin as soon as possible.

Additional expenditure by the ODA reflects a commitment by it to enhance public awareness of overseas development issues. It is not possible to break down these figures to identify the medium used.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Accounts

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to amend the Companies Acts to direct all large companies to disclose exit values of their assets.

Mr. Redwood: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to disclosure of net realisable values. I am not persuaded that the burdens that such a general requirement would impose on companies would be justified.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to amend the Companies Acts to place upon company auditors the same duties for reporting fraud which are conferred upon auditors auditing businesses covered by the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Redwood: No. The Financial Services Act does not impose a duty upon auditors to report suspected fraud. It removes any obstacles there may be to an auditor reporting relevant matters to the regulatory authorities. This provision goes substantially beyond fraud and reflects the special features of the regulatory regime. In the case of companies in general, whether or not an auditor should report suspected fraud to management, the members of the company, or to third parties depends on the circumstances, as is explained in the newly published auditing guideline on the auditor's responsibility in relation to fraud, other irregularities and errors.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require auditors of all large companies to examine the chairman's report.

Mr. Redwood: No. Auditing guidelines already recommend auditors to review financial information in the chairman's report where it is published as part of, or in conjunction with, the annual report.

Mr. Redwood: This is a matter for the Securities and Investments Board.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many experiments were carried out on animals in respect of cosmetics testing in (a) 1989, (b) 1988, (c) 1987, (d) 1986, (e) 1985, (f) 1980 and (g) 1975; if he has any figures readily available giving a breakdown in respect of species of animals involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of staff employed at the National Engineering Laboratory for each of the last 10 years broken down by category is as follows:

As at 1 April	Non Industrial Staff	Industrial Staff	Total Staff
1980	523·0	267·0	790·0
1981	495·0	246·0	741·0
1982	468·5	237·5	706·0
1983	456·5	226·5	683·0
1984	458·5	193·0	651·5
1985	461·0	185·0	646·0
1986	448·0	186·0	634·0
1987	463·0	168·0	631·0
1988	472·0	156·0	628·0
1989	431·0	145·0	576·0

The budget for the current financial year (1989-90) makes provision for a total of 550 staff as at 31 March 1990.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if a decision has been taken on the appointment for the new director of the National Engineering Laboratory; and if he will make a statement on the appointment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The post of director of the National Engineering Laboratory will be replaced by that of a chief executive in preparation for the laboratory becoming a next steps agency. No decision has yet been taken on the appointment of a chief executive. The Secretary of State has no statement about the appointment at this time.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Minister responsible for the National Engineering Laboratory last visited the establishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As Minister for Industry I visited the National Engineering Laboratory on 15 February 1990. Neither the Secretary of State nor I have a statement to make about the National Engineering Laboratory at this time.

Single European Market

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been and will be taken to ensure that inner cities benefit from the single European market of 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Inner-city firms, like all other companies in the United Kingdom, benefit from the "European Open for Business" campaign, and from help available through the enterprise initiative. In addition, city action teams (CATs) and inner-city task forces are sponsoring projects linked to preparations for the single European market. These include "Skills Upgrade for 1992", a Doncaster task force project which informs small inner-city firms about EC regulations, funding and contacts, and a Tyne and Wear CAT project, single market training for small and medium-sized businesses in Tyne and Wear, Durham and Northumberland.

Inner-City Programmes

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which are the inner-city programmes his Department is carrying out; what non-Government organisations are taking part in such programmes; where each of these programmes is operating; and on what date each one was started.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The only programme carried out by my Department that is specifically targeted on inner cities is the inner-city task force initiative. A wide range of private and voluntary sector organisations, and local authorities, work with the task forces. A list of the dates on which the existing task forces were announced is as follows:

	Date
Leeds (Chapeltown/Harehills)	February 1986
Manchester (Moss Side and Hulme)	February 1986
Bristol	February 1986
Middlesbrough	February 1986
North Kensington	February 1986

Company Sizes

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the comparable figures for the number of small, medium and large companies in the United Kingdom, Japan and West Germany.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 19 February 1990]: Although some information is published by the individual countries' statistical services there are few sources in which international data are compiled in a comparable form. The most reliable surveys available have been carried out by the Statistical Office of the European Communities (SOEC) and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). Both studies include businesses which are not incorporated as well as companies and define size in terms of number of people employed. The available comparative data relate to manufacturing industry only. Inclusion of the service sector would be likely to raise the proportions employed in smaller companies still further in each country.

An SOEC report entitled "Structure and activity of industry: data by size of enterprises 1983" contains the following comparison between the United Kingdom and West Germany:

Distribution of number of enterprises and persons employed in manufacturing industry, 1983

	Number of persons employed
	1 to 19	20 to 99	100 to 499	500 and over	Undisclosed (20 and over)	Total
United Kingdom
Enterprises:
Number (000s)	76·2	17·5	5·9	1·6	0·7	101·9
Percentage	74·8	17·2	5·8	1·5	0·7	100
Persons employed:
Number (000s)	553	766	1,279	2,210	297	5,105
Percentage	10·8	15·0	25·1	43·3	5·8	100
West Germany
Enterprises:
Number (000s)	189·2	22·6	9·8		—	221·5
Percentage	85·4	10·2	4·4		—	100
Persons employed:
Number (000s)	925	1,014	5,641		—	7,581
Percentage	12·2	13·4	74·4		—	100

The "OECD Employment Outlook", published in September 1985, provides a source of comparative data for the United Kingdom and Japan. Enterprises are defined in terms of company groups, so that the concentration of industry cannot be directly compared with the SOEC report. The OECD study presents size distributions by employment numbers but not by numbers of enterprises, and the absolute numbers are not stated.

Distribution of persons employed by size of enterprise in manufacturing industry

	Number of persons employed
	1 to 29	30 to 99	100 to 499	500 and over	Percentage total
United Kingdom	20·3		13·4	66·3	100
Japan 1983[1]	27·8	19·3	19·6	33·3	100

[1] Wage earners and salaried employees only.

In the early '70s only 17·5 per cent. of Japanese employees in manufacturing worked for companies employing more than 1,000 people. However this proportion is based on individual places of business and not company groups and is therefore not directly comparable with figures shown in the table relating to the OECD study.

Cot Mattresses (Chemical Hazard)

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department has taken to alert cot manufacturers to the possible dangers to young babies from chemicals used in fire retardant mattresses and any link with cot death syndrome.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 9 March at column 901.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the results of the scientific assessment of the relationship between chemicals used in fire retardant mattresses and cot death syndrome to be available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have been asked to reply. The group of independent experts has been asked by the chief medical officer to report as soon as possible.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Public Relations and Statistics

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the figures for (a) staff employed and (b) expenditure on (i) press and publicity and (ii) statistical work in his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: There are no Duchy of Lancaster staff employed in, nor has there been expenditure on, press and publicity or statistical work.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much has been spent by his office on official hospitality in the financial years 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 to date.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: There has been nil expenditure on official hospitality by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's office during the period in question.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Office Statistics

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Lord President of the Council (1) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Privy Council Office; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91;

(2) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Privy Council Office; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91;

(3) what was the total expenditure by the Privy Council Office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91;

(4) what were the figures for the spending by the Privy Council Office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91;

(5) what were the total fees paid out by the Privy Council Office to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Privy Council Office has no staff, current expenditure or projected budgets specifically allocated to press and public relations or statistical work, and no expenditure is currently being incurred, or is proposed, in respect of advertising or the services of management consultants. Annual expenditure in the region of £3,000 is incurred in respect of the publication of Gazette notices.

DEFENCE

Footpath 43, Menwith with Darley

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he closed footpath 43 in the parish of Menwith with Darley; under what powers he acted; with which local authorities and bodies representing users of the footpath he consulted prior to acting; and what opportunity members of the public had to make representations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Footpath 43 in the parish of Menwith with Darley was stopped up and reprovided in accordance with sections 16 and 17 of the Defence Act 1842 on 1 October 1985, after consultation with North Yorkshire county council. There is no provision in the Act for representations from members of the public.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how old is HMS Endurance; what plans there are for its replacement; and what is the latest year planned for ordering a replacement.

Mr. Neubert: The hull of HMS Endurance is now 33 years old. She was converted to an ice patrol ship in 1967-68 and accepted into the Royal Navy in 1968. Her 1986 refit extended her life until at least the mid-1990s. A decision on her replacement is therefore not urgent.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether HMS Endurance's services have been offered to the Natural Environment Research Council's programme for researching global warming.

Mr. Neubert: HMS Endurance contributes logistic support on an ad hoc basis to the programmes of the British Antarctic Survey, some of which are related to the Natural Environment Research Council's work on global climate change.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any plans to include HMS Endurance's facilities in the meteorological study on global warming.

Mr. Neubert: HMS Endurance, like all Royal Navy vessels, carries equipment and personnel capable of performing meteorological observations. Results of these observations are sent to the Meteorological Office and the use of them contributes to the marine climatological database.

Service Personnel (HIV Infection)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men and women were identified as being HIV positive for each of the forces in 1989; what action was followed after diagnosis; whether any representations have subsequently been received concerning the military authorities' actions in these cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to discuss individual medical cases. However, one member of the services was identified as HIV positive in 1989. There were no representations concerning this case.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on putting out to tender the maintenance and minor works services currently carried out by the Property Services Agency for the armed services in Northern Ireland following the privatisation of the Property Services Agency in 1992.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: From 1 April 1990, the MOD will be "untied" from the PSA. Untying gives the MOD a number of new responsibilities, including choosing who should supply its works services. From that date, the MOD will be mounting a number of competitions for design and project management for major new works. We will also be testing the market, in a variety of locations, for the provision of property management services covering minor new works and certain maintenance tasks.

The first phases of market testing of property management cover sites in Great Britain; it is not currently planned to extend this early market testing to Northern Ireland.

The Government are reviewing whether any aspects of the current arrangements for works services in Northern Ireland are unsuitable for execution by the private sector and, if necessary, alternative arrangements will be made.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Alan Clark: The staff complements by grade in Ministry of Defence statistical divisions as at 1 March 1990 are as follows:

[1] Statistical posts.

It is not anticipated that there will be any significant changes in staffing complements for 1990-91.

The differences between these figures and those provided for last year are largely accounted for by the transfer in January 1990 of a number of staff and their work to an area outside the defence statistical organisation. The staff and the work transferred were all administrative.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Alan Clark: There is a total of 221 posts on the strength of the defence public relations staffs. These include staff in single service command headquarters and in central staffs in the MOD. Latest available figures show there to be 212 staff in post and nine vacancies. The proposed complement for 1990-91 is 220.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The last year for which figures are available is 1982-83. Figures for the period 1982-83 to 1988-89 are as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	5·1
1983-84	6·3
1984-85	6·8
1985-86	6·7
1986-87	7·3
1987-88	7·0

Our estimated expenditure figure for 1989-90 is £7·8 million and for 1990-91 £8·4 million.

Figures for 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 are not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate expense. The figures provided include staff costs and expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications and equipment.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Neubert: The fees paid out by my Department to outside organisations in respect of privatisation relate solely to the sale of Royal Ordnance plc in April 1987. These fees amounted to £1·9 million and were for work carried out between 1 January 1985 and completion of the sale.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information is not held centrally. I shall write to the hon. Member.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Neubert: Fees paid to management consultants engaged centrally by the Ministry of Defence for the years 1984 to 1989 are as follows:

Financial year	£ million
1984-85	0·604
1986-87	6·203
1987-88	5·140
1988-89	3·109
1989-90	[1]4·555
1990-91	[2]5·625

[1] Estimated expenditure.
[2] Budget provision.

Figures for earlier years cannot be produced without disproportionate effort.

Personnel (West Germany)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom (a) military and (b) civilian personnel are employed, or stationed, in West Germany.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 64,294 service personnel and 1,817 MOD civilians are stationed in the Federal Republic of Germany (not including Berlin). The figure for service personnel covers all United Kingdom regular forces, male and female. Army personnel from BAOR on emergency tours in Northern Ireland are included in the figures, but personnel on short tours elsewhere are not.

Homosexuality

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in each of the years 1987, 1988 and 1989, how many service men and women were administratively discharged from the Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force as a result of their homosexuality or homosexual behaviour.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 6 March 1990]: The information requested is as follows:

	Royal Navy	Army	Royal Air Force
1987	5	57	16
1988	2	46	15
1989	4	32	19

HEALTH

Hospitals (Red Alerts)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many different types of red alert hospitals operate; and what each one represents.

Mr. Freeman: Red alert is a term used by some health authorities usually to indicate a situation where a hospital is able to accept only emergency admissions, for example, because of a flu epidemic. Whether to operate a red alert system and in what circumstances are matters for local determination.

Immunisation

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has completed his study of the Peckham report on immunisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Yes. Many of the recommendations made in the Peckham report were appropriate for immunisation services at local level, and they have the support of the Department of Health. Other recommendations relate to the national level, and the Health Education Authority and the Department are launching a national publicity campaign this autumn, which will be supported by new materials on immunisation to be sent to GPs and nurses involved in immunisation.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the recommendations of the working party set up by the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation in connection with advising on the immunisation schedule; and whether he proposes that the schedule should apply nationally and uniformly.

Mr. Freeman: The joint committee on vaccination and immunisation, having considered the recent progress in immunisation uptake and factors which could hinder further improvements, has recommended that an accelerated schedule of primary immunisations (at age two, three and four months) should be implemented consistently in all district health authorities. Full details of this new schedule have already been sent to district immunisation co-ordinators and will be sent shortly to all doctors and nurses involved in immunisation, together with the most recent advice from the JCVI.

Child Record Cards

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide detailed information on the pilot study into parent-held child record cards.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A number of health authorities have been experimenting successfully with parent-held child health records. A working party of the British Paediatric Association has been reviewing these local arrangements and has designed an exemplar national record. The Department is to discuss with the BPA the promotion of the record and the arrangements for making it available to individual health authorities. We support the project since it is a good way of involving parents in the health care of their children.

Nurses (Accommodation)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he is giving to regional and district health authorities concerning the rates element of the board and lodging charges for residential accommodation for nurses; and if he will ensure that such charges are reduced to reflect the abolition of domestic rates when the collective community charge is implemented on 1 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The level of lodging charges is a matter for the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council. I understand that the management side hopes to raise the issue at the meeting of the council on 13 March.

Nursing Staff

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply of 7 February, Official Report, column 707, regarding computer modelling of the supply of nursing staff, whether he will publish the results of any work carried out as a result of the computer model being made available to the National Health Service in 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health authorities use the computer model as a management tool in the continuing process of nurse manpower planning, specifically with reference to the implementation of Project 2000, and this should be reflected in their nurse manpower policies. It is for health authorities to determine whether to publish their conclusions in this area.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested, showing the number of staff at 1 March 1990, is shown in the table. A small increase in staff is expected in 1990-91 but exact details have not yet been determined. These figures are not comparable with earlier figures due to changes in the statistics division caused by the formation of separate Departments of Health and Social Security in April 1989.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The information is shown in the table. It covers all the staff employed in the statistical divisions of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys including the medical statistics and social survey divisions. It excludes staff employed in the finance, personnel and administration division and in the information technology division. Staff complements as such are no longer used since expenditure is controlled by financial rather than manpower limits. The planned staff figures for 1 October 1990 are therefore subject to change. The number of staff employed will increase over the next 12 months in the build-up to the 1991 census.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The number of staff presently employed in the press and publicity section of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in 1989-90 and planned for 1990-91 is eight and nine respectively. There are no vacancies. The figures include five staff who are employed on a temporary basis to work on publicity activities for the 1991 census and an additional temporary post for 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91;

(2) what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department has no section that can be separately identified as public relations. Functions which are commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division.

The position on 1 March 1990 was:

Staff presently employed 52

Full complement of staff including vacant posts 57

Twenty-six of the staff presently employed are information officers. Disussions on the proposed complement for 1990-91 are not yet complete. Estimated expenditure for manpower and running costs in 1989-90 is £898,000. The budget for 1990-91 has not yet been agreed. Figures for 1979-80 to 1988-89 are not available in the form requested.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total expenditure by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the table. The figures, in cash terms, include staff costs and expenditure on, or planned for, the census of population.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the figures for the spending by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the table. The figures in cash terms include expenditure on, or planned for, the census of population.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 16 November 1989 at columns 431-32 in respect of payments up to and including 1988-89. The estimated expenditure for 1989-90 is £4,870,500. No decision has yet been reached on the 1990-91 budget.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the total fees paid out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: Figures are available only from 1984-85 onwards. They are:

1984-85	13,000
1985-86	71,000
1986-87	89,000
1987-88	359,000
1988-89	884,000
[2]1990-91	830,000

[2] Budget.

The figures from 1987-88 onwards largely reflect the cost of employing consultants from a variety of firms to undertake strategic management and information technology studies and to assist with subsequent implementation, in areas where the necessary skills and expertise are not available within the office.

Health Service Contracts

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will deposit copies of the "Working for Patients" implementation document on "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Contracts" in the Vote Office and similarly deposit all subsequent papers on publication.

Mr. Freeman: Yes. Copies have now been placed in the Vote Office.

Self-governing Hospitals

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what funds have been provided to the Mersey regional health authority and the health authorities within its region for carrying out studies to enable hospitals to apply for self-governing status;

(2) what has been the expenditure so far by his Department on projects designed to inform the implementation of the Government's proposals for the setting up of National Health Service hospital trusts; and what is his estimate of the likely expenditure on such projects during the next financial year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Some work has been commissioned centrally to support the proposals for National Health Service trusts. The total cost of these projects was £181,600 in 1989-90. No resources have been allocated specifically to Mersey or other regions for spending on projects designed to inform the process of setting up NHS trusts. We have made no allocation for these purposes in respect of 1990-91.

Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what inquiries are being made into whether there is any link between the number of deaths from cancer in Shropshire and the fire at the central ordnance depot at Donnington in 1983.

Mr. Freeman: The Department is making no inquiries and in the light of the information on the materials released by the fire, none are considered necessary. Monitoring the health of a local population is a matter for the director of public health.

Radioactive Implants

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce legislation to require that persons fitted with medicinal radioactive implants are registered and carry a card.

Mr. Freeman: There are no plans to introduce statutory registration for persons fitted with medicinal radioactive implants. However, those persons fitted with nuclear-powered cardiac pacemakers are required to carry a bracelet and identity card.

Hepatitis B

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will give the latest figures for the number of people vaccinated against hepatitis B;

(2) if he will give the take-up figures of hepatitis B vaccine among each of the high-risk groups identified by the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation;

(3) if he will list those areas in which general practitioners may claim item-of-service payments for administering the hepatitis B vaccine;

(4) what guidance his Department has issued to general practitioners regarding vaccination against hepatitis B for the general public and high-risk groups;

(5) what information he has regarding the link between hepatitis B and liver cancer;

(6) what is his Department's estimate of the number of hepatitis B carriers in the population;

(7) what statistics his Department collects on the incidence and treatment of hepatitis B among the general population and high-risk groups;

(8) what steps his Department has taken to publicise the availability of hepatitis B vaccines to the general public and high-risk groups.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The Department holds no figures for the number of people vaccinated against hepatitis B either in total or amongst the high-risk groups as identified by the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation (JCVI). However, over 800,000 doses of the vaccine were distributed in 1989. No item-of-service fees are payable for administering hepatitis B vaccine.

Guidance and recommendations to general practitioners regarding hepatitis B vaccine is contained in the JCVI's memorandum "Immunisation against Infectious Disease", a new edition of which will be issued to all doctors shortly.

It is known that some sufferers of hepatitis B may go on to develop hepatocellular carcinoma. It is estimated that one in 500 of the general adult population may be carriers of hepatitis B surface antigenaemia.

Acute viral hepatitis is a notifiable disease and the public health laboratory service continues to monitor its incidence. Reports of cases to the PHLS had declined to just over 600 in 1989.

Useful information on hepatitis B is included in the Health Education Authority's (HEA) booklet "Guide to a Healthy Sex Life", and I understand that the HEA is currently reviewing this and other publications on sexually transmitted diseases.

Myeloid Leukaemia

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will update the list of the 20 areas with the highest incidence of myeloid leukaemia contained in his answer to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) of 15 April 1986, Official Report, columns 371-72.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1990, c. 543]: The data requested are shown in the table, and have been updated to 1988:

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Eastern Europe

69. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much is being provided in 1990-91 in the form of overseas aid to assist the countries of eastern Europe.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1990-91 we expect to seek parliamentary approval in main estimates for £13·5 million to cover expenditure on Poland and Hungary under the know-how fund, and on an agricultural project in Poland. This expenditure is additional to the official United Kingdom aid programme. Supplementary estimate provision for 1990-91 and later years may be sought when the public expenditure implications of other commitments, such as the establishment of know-how funds for other countries in eastern Europe, are clearer.

Africa

70. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by how much aid to African states has increased since 1987.

Mrs. Chalker: Britain's bilateral aid to Africa rose from £305 million in 1987 to £422 million in 1988. In the same period our multilateral aid programme (for example, our contributions to the World bank, the European development fund and the various UN agencies) rose from £523 million to £659 million, with over half these funds being destined ultimately for Africa. Figures for 1989 are not yet available.

Rehabilitation Courses

71. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much support the Government provided for community-based rehabilitation courses and programmes in the last year for which he has figures; and how the support was deployed.

Mrs. Chalker: A list of projects funded by ODA in 1989-90, which focus on the needs of disabled people, was provided in the answer that my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) gave my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on 6 December 1989 at columns 231-32. Many of these activities are community based or have a community-based component. In addition, nine overseas students studying on the diploma for teachers and planners of community-based rehabilitation in developing countries at the Institute of Child Health in London have been financed this year from the overseas aid programme.

Overseas Aid

72. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of gross domestic product the United Kingdom currently spends on overseas aid.

Mrs. Chalker: The latest available figure for United Kingdom net official development assistance expressed as a percentage of gross national product is 0·32 per cent. in 1988.

78. Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to increase the share of gross national product spent on official development assistance to developing countries.

Mrs. Chalker: As announced in Cm. 1002, the Government plan to increase the aid programme from £1,502 million in 1989-90 to £1,750 million in 1992-93. On the basis of the forecast for United Kingdom domestic inflation contained in the Autumn Statement published on 22 November 1989 this represents an increase of 4 per cent. in real terms. The Government accept in principle the United Nations 0·7 per cent. target for official development assistance as a proportion of gross national product but recognise that progress towards this target must depend on economic circumstances and other calls on resources.

Kenya

73. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonweath Affairs whether the Minister for Overseas Development has recently visited Kenya.

Mrs. Chalker: I visited Kenya from 6 to 8 March.

Brazil

74. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonweath Affairs how many forestry projects have been agreed with the Government of Brazil.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) on 1 March at column 283.

Tropical Forests

75. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonweath Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will be proposing reforms to the tropical forestry action plan during the joint meeting between the European Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries on 19 to 24 March.

Mrs. Chalker: I called for the reform of the tropical forestry action plan when I addressed the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation general conference in November. Following that conference the FAO commissioned an independent review of TFAP. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met the review team on 6 March.

The meeting between the European Community (EC) and African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) countries on 19 to 24 March is a forum for representatives of the European and ACP Parliaments. Representatives of EC and ACP Governments meet on 28 and 29 March to discuss issues related to the Lome conventions. We have no plans to pursue reforms to the tropical forestry action plan at this meeting.

Vietnam

76. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonweath Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States Government regarding aid to Vietnam.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave to the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) on 7 March.

Nicaragua

77. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on aid to Nicaragua.

Mrs. Chalker: We are considering the possibility of a small bilateral technical co-operation programme to Nicaragua. In doing so we are taking account of the discussions that my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr Garel-Jones) had with the President-elect during his visit to Managua last week.

However, central America is not a priority area for United Kingdom bilateral aid. The main channel for United Kingdom assistance to Nicaragua will continue to be through our contribution to EC aid. We shall seek to ensure that EC aid to Nicaragua is maintained, and possibly increased, once Senora Chamorro's democratically elected Government take office.

Tanzania

79. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid the United Kingdom currently gives to Tanzania.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1988 (the latest year for which firm figures are available) the cost of our bilateral aid amounted to £33·4 million. During my visit to Tanzania earlier this month I increased our latest pledge of balance of payments support to £17·5 million, for spending by the end of financial year 1990-91. All our bilateral aid to Tanzania is on grant terms.

In addition to our bilateral aid we contribute through multilateral agencies, including the EC. Tanzania has been allocated 169 million ecu (about £125 million) under Lome III for the period 1985-90, of which our share is around £20 million.

81. Mr. Raison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Minister for Overseas Development holds regular discussions with the Government of Tanzania.

Mrs. Chalker: I have just reurned from a full and useful visit to Tanzania, during which I renewed the regular discussions which I and my predecessors have maintained with the Tanzanian Government.

Ethiopia

80. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any further information on food aid distribution to famine areas of Ethiopia.

Mrs. Chalker: The recent capture of the port of Massawa by the Eritrean People's Liberation Front is a serious setback to the relief effort and alternative means of delivering relief supplies to the hungry via the port of Assab are under urgent consideration by donors. The recent statement by the Government of Ethiopia that they will permit local Church organisations to open a relief corridor from the port of Assab into Tigray is a welcome step forward. It is vital that all parties to the conflict allow this relief operation to proceed without hindrance.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response his Department has made to the recent proposal for free passage of relief aid by the Tigray People's Liberation Front; and if he will raise this matter at his next meeting with the United Nations.

Mrs. Chalker: This proposal was made in response to a plan, agreed between the Ethiopian Government and a local Church group but rejected by the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front, for distribution of relief supplies within Tigray. The plan has since been abandoned as a result of the capture of the port of Massawa by the Eritrean People's Liberation Front and other means of getting food to the hungry are under urgent consideration by donors.

I returned from Ethiopia yesterday. Following discussions there I am hopeful that arrangements made with the agreement of both the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front and the Government of Ethiopia will allow relief food supplies to cross into Wello and Tigray by what is known as the southern route and that the first convoy will leave this week. I have discussed arrangements in detail with the UN Secretary-General's special representative and other UN officials who are closely involved in Addis Ababa, as well as with the leaders of the joint relief partnership and President Mengistu and members of the Government of Ethiopia.

South Africa

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to increase overseas aid to South Africa in the light of political developments.

Mrs. Chalker: I welcome the recent political developments in South Africa. We are currently reviewing our aid programme for black South Africans and I expect to make an announcement shortly.

Technical Training and Education

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals for technical training and educational aid he has for Nigeria, Ghana, Sierra Leone and the Gambia.

Mrs. Chalker: We will maintain our substantial programmes of training in Britain for each of the four countries. We are also funding projects in each country for technical training and education.

Uganda

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current development assistance Britain provides to Uganda; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1988, the latest year for which firm figures are available, we provided £28·6 million in bilateral aid to Uganda, in addition to our share of assistance from multilateral agencies. During my visit to Uganda last week, I announced that the £10 million balance of payments assistance pledged in 1989 in support of Uganda's economic recovery programme would be increased to £15 million. This brings our total commitments since 1986 to over £155 million, including £53 million in balance of payments support.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the consequences for Her Majesty's Government-funded elephant conservation schemes in Africa arising out of the decisions to allow the Hong Kong ivory stocks to be traded.

Mrs. Chalker: I do not expect the decision to have an effect on any of the conservation schemes funded by Her Majesty's Government.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Local Offices

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were refused (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans, listed separately, on the grounds that there were insufficient funds/priority too low, by his offices in Redcar, Eston, Middlesbrough, Stockton and Hartlepool, during the period April 1988 to March 1989, and during the period April 1989 to December 1989.

Mr. Scott: The information given in the table represents the number of processed applications which were refused on grounds of insufficient priority. The number of people refused or awarded payments from the social fund is not collected. Individuals can make more than one application during each accounting period.

actual spend in respect of (i) community care grants and (ii) loans, listed separately, for each of his offices in Redcar, Eston, Middlesbrough, Stockton and Hartlepool, for the period April to December 1989, inclusive.

Mr. Scott: The information given in the table represents the spending profile set at the start of this financial year for each office specified. The profile is adjusted at the end of each month to take account of actual expenditure and can be adjusted at any time to take account of local circumstances. Community Charge

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's estimate of the cost in a full year in relation to the capital thresholds above which no community charge rebate is allowed of (a) doubling the threshold to £16,000 for a married couple, (b) abolishing the capital thresholds altogether and (c) abolishing the capital thresholds for pensioners only, so that, in the latter two cases, income is the only criterion for qualification for community charge rebate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available to enable a precise answer to be given to my hon. Friend's question. It seems probable that doubling the upper capital limit for community charge benefit to £16,000 for a married couple would cost about £10 million. For answers to parts (b) and (c) I refer my hon. Friend to my replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on 22 February at column 896 and 2 March at column 367.

Disability

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether his Department has commissioned any research about the care needs and care costs of disabled people aged over 65 years.

Mr. Scott: The Government commissioned the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) to carry out major surveys of disability in Great Britain between 1985 and 1988. Two of these covered disabled adults in private households and communal establishments, and they provide information about the extra costs of home services for people aged over 65 and the extra costs incurred by those with personal care disabilities. The six OPCS reports of the surveys' findings are in the Library. A follow-up study to the surveys in the family expenditure survey has been carried out to compare the actual spending of disabled and non-disabled people, and the results of that study will be published in the next few months. A number of studies of the care needs of people in residential care and nursing homes have been carried out by the social policy research unit at York university. The findings are published in "Public Support for Private Residential Care", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a table showing a regional breakdown of the numbers of people claiming disability benefits as a percentage of all claimants and as a percentage of the general population.

Mr. Scott: Attendance allowance, invalid care allowance and mobility allowance are administered centrally, and a regional breakdown of claimants is not available. The regional breakdown for severe disablement allowance, as at April 1988, is in the table:

Region	Number of claimants	Percentage of all claimants	Percentage of general population
North	18,200	7	0·59
Yorkshire and Humberside	25,200	10	0·51
East Midlands	17,100	6	0·43
East Anglia	7,500	3	0·37
South East	63,600	24	0·37

North West	37,000	14	0·58
Scotland	32,400	12	0·64
Wales	19,800	8	0·69

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), Official Report, 26 February, column 59, if he will provide a breakdown at 1990 prices of (a) the weekly benefit entitlement when not working of a single disabled person and (b) the net weekly income of a single disabled person with earnings of (i) £5, (ii) £10, (iii) £15, (iv) £20, (v) £30, (vi) £40 and (vii) £50 after housing costs, on the assumption of the introduction of the disability employment credit, planned for introduction in April 1992.

Mr. Scott: The detailed arrangements for the disability employment credit are under consideration. No decision has yet been taken on the thresholds for entitlement to the benefit.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the numbers of (a) single people receiving the severe disability premium as at 11 April 1988, 10 April 1989 and 9 October 1989 and (b) members of a couple receiving the severe disability premium as at 11 April 1988, 10 April 1989, and 9 October 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the latest annual statistical inquiry shows that, at May 1988, 28,184 income support claims included the lower rate of the severe disability premium, paid to single people and to couples of whom one member qualifies for the premium, and 6,585 income support claims included the higher rate of this premium, paid where both members of a couple qualify.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the proposed disability employment credit will be available to those disabled people who are able to work but have savings in excess of £6,000.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the proposed disability employment credit will provide employment opportunities for those disabled people who are capable of working but are not able to work more than 24 hours per week.

Mr. Scott: The detailed arrangements for the disability employment credit are under consideration. No decisions have yet been taken on an hours limit or capital rule for the benefit.

Residential Care

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the number, and annual cost in benefits, of elderly persons in private nursing homes registered with district health authorities, by metropolitan district and district in the north-west of England;

(2) what is the number, and annual cost in benefits, of elderly persons in private residential homes, registered with appropriate local councils by metropolitan district and district in the north-west of England.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information in the form requested is not available.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his best estimate of the number of people in private or voluntary residential or nursing home care who will be funded through preserved income support (i) when the new system of funding to be implemented under proposals in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill first comes into effect and (ii) in each of the subsequent 10 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information about expected numbers of income support claimants as well as expenditure is published in the public expenditure White Paper (Cm 1014). It has never been the practice to make separate forecasts about any individual group within the planning totals.

Occupational Deafness

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to increase the scope of occupations qualifying for disablement benefit for the industrial disease of occupational deafness, to include damage to the nerve endings in the inner ear caused by high pitched screeches due to worn machinery in the tin-plate industry.

Mr. Scott: No.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth's letter of 28 November 1989 about Mr. and Mrs. Griffin of Rugby.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My noble Friend Lord Henley has replied to my hon. Friend.

Income Support

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, by region, how many 16 and 17-year-olds had made applications for income support on grounds of extreme hardship; how many had been granted at 10 November 1989, 8 December 1989, 5 January 1990 and 9 February 1990; and how many at the same dates had been granted income support on grounds of being within exempted categories, shown by category.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The cumulative totals of the number of 16 and 17-year-olds who had made an application for income support on the grounds of severe hardship and the number granted benefit on this basis at 10 November 1989, 8 December 1989, 5 January 1990 and 9 February 1990 are in table A.

Figures for the number of 16 and 17-year-olds granted income support on the grounds of being within exempted categories are collected on a monthly basis and are, therefore, not available for the particular dates requested.

Table B shows the number of awards, by category, for each of the months ended 31 October 1989, 30 November 1989, 31 December 1989 and 31 January 1990.

Community Care Grants

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many social security offices community care grants for shoes are deemed to be of low priority in cases which in other respects meet the criterion for community care grant of having a particular disability which causes excessive wear and tear.

Mr. Scott: I regret that the information requested is not collected.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Functions which are currently associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division.

The latest information is that 79 staff are in post. In addition, there are seven vacancies. Of the total 19 are information officer grades. Discussions on the proposed staffing for 1990-91 are not yet complete.

The staffing figures for the current period are not comparable with previous years. Following reorganisation within the Department, information division acquired management responsibility for staff previously located in other divisions.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Functions commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division.

Information is not available in the form requested for the years 1979-80 and the following years to 1988-89.

Expenditure for the DSS information division following separation from the Department of Health for 1989-90 is as follows:

	£ million
Manpower	1·157
Running costs	0·07

Discussions on the proposed 1990-91 budgets for manpower and running costs for the information division are not complete.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Staff in post and vancacies in the Department's statistical branches at 1 March 1990 are shown in the table. These figures are not strictly comparable with those for previous years because of reorganisation of the Department's analytical services. Final decisions on budgets for 1990-91 have not yet been made.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No such fees have been identified and no such expenditure is planned for 1990-91.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: For information from 1979-80 to 1988-89, I refer the hon. Member to replies given to him on 19 December 1986 at columns 793-94, on 14 January 1988 at column 402 and on 13 March 1989 at column 30.

The total estimated outturn for publicity in 1989-90 is £16·3 million. Of this, £6·661 million has been committed for the purpose of advertising.

	£ million
Television	3·974
Press	1·567

Other material (promotion/information)	9·639

The estimate for the 1990-91 publicity budget is £14·89 million. Detailed decisions on media have not yet been made.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The estimated expenditure from 1984-85 onwards on fees and expenses for management consultants on social security matters is as follows:

Year	£ million
1984-85	0·959
1985-86	1·722
1986-87	0·976
1987-88	1·082
1988-89	1·203
1990-91	2·854

The figures are approximate since expenditure up to and including the 1988-89 financial year is from a joint health and social security budget. In some cases expenditure has been apportioned where consultants have been engaged on both health and social security matters. The figures include some computer consultancy where this cannot be separately identified. The information for years prior to 1984-85 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Fuel Payments

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his policy on the treatment of cash in lieu of fuel payments as income in respect of housing benefits, following the recent tribunal decision in respect of an applicant in Bridgend.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In the income-related benefits, the normal rule is for all forms of income to be taken into account. Regulations provide for certain types of income to be disregarded, in part or in full. Cash in lieu of concessionary fuel is not specified as disregardable income, and therefore is taken fully into account in the calculation of housing benefit and the other income-related benefits. Local authorities have no discretion in this matter. The decision made by a social security appeal tribunal in the Bridgend case is not binding on any other case, nor on the housing benefit scheme, since tribunals have no power to review local authorities' decisions.

Arthur Andersen (Party)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the number of his Department's staff invited to the Arthur Andersen Consulting roll-out party on 8 February 1990, their departments and grades; and how much of the cost will be met by his Department.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Andersen Consulting decided to hold this party in recognition of the successful achievements during the past seven years in developing, with the Department of Social Security (DSS), the operational strategy computer systems. It wanted to mark these achievements with a joint disco party for its staff and those DSS staff, especially those in middle and junior grades, who had for several years been working long hours and under great pressure in developing the systems. There was no cost to DSS.

Social Fund

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 1 March, Official Report, column 319 regarding advice to social fund officers on reviews of claims following the High Court judgment, what is the necessary advice on the question of reviews to which he referred.

Mr. Scott: We will shortly be issuing advice to social fund officers on their responsibilities for reviewing applications in accordance with the legislation and the directions. I shall send the hon. Member a copy.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 6 March, Official Report, column 584, if he will inform the hon. Member for Oldham, West when he makes the information available in machine-readable form to the Library.

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will indicate, out of total loan payments made available under the social fund, the sum written off as irrecoverable or for any other reason, in 1988-89, and hence the extra outlay provided at the start of the 1989-90 financial year in order to maintain loan payments at the previous level; and if he will give his estimate for the same purpose in the current financial year.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 26 February 1990]: During 1988-89 loan repayments to the value of £53,000 were treated as impracticable to pursue. This did not affect the amount available for loans in 1989-90. The corresponding amount in 1989-90 for the period to the end of January 1990 was £735,000; this sum includes loans made in 1988-89.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what monetary amount has been deducted up to the end of January 1990 from income support in order to repay social fund loans (a) nationally, (b) regionally and (c) in each local Department of Social Security area.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 7 March 1990]: Provisional information in relation to national and regional data in the period April 1989 to January 1990 is given in the table. The other information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will discuss with the farming and agrochemical industries measures to reduce the use of pesticides in agricultural production and storage.

Mr. Maclean: The Government's policy is that the use of pesticides should be the minimum compatible with efficient food production. Government funding of related research and development amounts to some £18 million per annum and the results are published. A proposed code of practice containing advice on the safe use of pesticides on farms and holdings has been laid before Parliament.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to ensure that food consumers are safe from exposure to pesticides used in food production and storage.

Mr. Maclean: No pesticide may be used in this country until it has been approved by Ministers in six Government Departments including my Department and the Department of Health. No pesticide is approved for use unless Ministers are satisfied that it presents no risk to consumers. The approvals process is backed up by statutory residue levels, which apply to both imported and home-grown produce, and by monitoring carried out by the working party on pesticide residues. The results of monitoring are published.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has made to the EC on the off-label clearance scheme;

(2) what representations he has received about the outlawing of the off-label clearance scheme; and what effect this will have on small horticulture units in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: Talks on EC proposals for pesticide approvals are continuing in the Council working group. The United Kingdom Government are very aware of the need to protect off-label approvals and are pressing for acceptable wording. The National Farmers Union is being kept informed.

Veterinary Investigation Service

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the work of the veterinary investigation service is undertaken for agricultural producers on a fee-paying basis; and what proportion fulfils public health functions.

Mr. Curry: The proportion of the work of the veterinary investigation service undertaken for agricultural producers on a fee-paying basis is 36·4 per cent.; that undertaken for public health functions is 25·2 per cent. and the remainder, 38·6 per cent. relates to statutory animal health programmes.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the annual cost of the veterinary investigation service; and what was the number of cases referred to each centre since 1985.

Mr. Curry: The running cost of the veterinary investigation service in the financial year 1988-89 was £5,256,226. The number of submissions to each veterinary investigation centre since 1985 is given in the table:

North Sea Dumping

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the companies to which his Department has granted permits to dump industrial liquid and flyash waste in the North sea.

Mr. Curry: The companies that currently hold licences under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to dump liquid industrial waste and flyash in the North sea are as follows:

National Power
ICI Chemicals and Polymers Ltd.
Cleanaway Ltd. (licence to dispose of waste from Tate and Lyle Sugars)
Sterling Organics Ltd.
Allied Colloids Ltd.
Effluent Services Ltd. (three licences to dispose of waste from Orsynetics, Woolcombers Ltd. and Fine Organics Ltd.)
Chlor Chem Ltd.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) of 22 February, Official Report, columns 898-99, if he will specify the two wastes for which North sea dumping licences may have to be extended beyond the 1992 deadline for reasons of technical feasibility and the amounts involved.

Mr. Curry: We have announced that it is our intention that no liquid industrial wastes or flyash will be dumped at sea after the end of 1992. In two cases however it might not be technically feasible to meet this deadline. We will extend the licences for those last two wastes into 1993 only if absolutely necessary on technical grounds and for the shortest possible part of that year.

The wastes concerned are:

Sterling Organics—Aqueous residue from preparation of paracetamol; 42,000 tonnes per year.

ICI—Acid ammonium sulphate residue effluent from acrylics production; 165,000 tonnes per year.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) of 22 February, Official Report, columns 898-99, if he will list the nine wastes covered by the 1987 North sea declaration that are still dumped; the quantities involved of each waste and, in each case, when it is anticipated that these disposals at sea will end.

Mr. Curry: All licences for the industrial wastes covered by the 1987 North sea declaration will be withdrawn as soon as alternative methods of disposal are available. The anticipated timetable for termination of sea disposal is as follows. Quantities of waste are expressed as an annual licensed tonnage. Where a licence is withdrawn within a year a correspondingly lower tonnage will be involved.

	Tonnage
To be terminated by summer 1990:
Orsynetics
Salt solution manufacture of O tolyl biguanide exported for use in paint and soap manufacture	3,000
To be terminated within a year:
Chlor Chem
Acidic effluent from production of water treatment chemicals	1,000
Fine Organics
Effluent from pharmaceutical production	8,000
Tate and Lyle Sugars
Filtration sludge from sugar refining	33,000
Woolcombers
Waste from washing wool	900
Allied Colloids
Acid ammonium sulphate effluent from acrylics production	15,000
To be terminated by 1992:
National Power
Pulverised fuel ash	550,000
Sterling Organics
Effluent from pharmaceutical manufacture	33,000
ICI Chemicals and Polymers Ltd.
Acid ammonium sulphate effluent from acrylics production	165,000

For the last two wastes licences will be extended into 1993 only if absolutely necessary on technical grounds and for the shortest possible part of that year.

Liquid Egg

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department has commissioned into whether grade A hens' eggs derived from laying flocks naturally infected with salmonella enteritidis PT4, when broken out under hygienic conditions within 24 hours of being laid and frozen down immediately after being broken out, may cause the product so derived to be so heavily contaminated as to cause a liquid egg pasteurisation process to fail.

Mr. Maclean: It is very unusual for hens' eggs to be processed within 24 hours of being laid as most egg-processing plants take their raw materials from a wide area. The time taken to deliver eggs to a processing plant would enable any salmonella present to multiply and as I explained to my hon. Friend on 5 February only a moderate heat treatment can be applied to liquid egg during the pasteurisation process otherwise its functional properties are destroyed. For this reason, processing plants cannot accept raw product which is likely to be heavily contaminated with salmonella enteritidis PT4 and no specific research has therefore been commissioned in this area.

Mayonnaise

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department has commissioned into whether, in the course of preparation of home-made mayonnaise in a commercial kitchen, where other foods contaminated by salmonella enteritidis PT4 are present, it is possible to contaminate the mayonnaise during preparation or storage either directly or indirectly from those foods.

Mr. Curry: The contamination of one food by another is always a risk in any food preparation area, including a commercial kitchen. Appropriate safeguards should always be taken to prevent the entry of any contaminated foods into these areas particularly if cooked foods or foods which receive no cooking, such as mayonnaise, are being prepared.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the experimental farms involved in his Department's research into bovine spongiform encephalopathy; what control methods for the cattle will be imposed; and if he will make a statement as to how the research will be carried out.

Mr. Curry: The following experimental husbandry farms are involved collaboratively with the central veterinary laboratory in research into BSE:

1. Studies of maternal transmission and its incidence
   - Boxworth
   - Gleadthorpe
   - Drayton
2. Studies to determine whether embryos derived from BSE-infected cows are infective for recipient dams and the progeny
   - High Mowthorpe
   - Redesdale

The animals used in both experiments, as well as those on all Ministry farms, will be subject to the same strict procedures that apply throughout Great Britain where BSE occurs or is suspected. In addition, the brains of all experimental animals that die or are culled at the end of these experiments will be examined histologically for evidence of lesions of BSE. The research is being carried out in accordance with recognised scientific procedures using the best scientific expertise available.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list by month for the last four years to date and by county, the number of cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy that have been reported in the counties of Yorkshire and Humberside.

Mr. Maclean: BSE was made notifiable on 21 June 1988. Cases recorded before then are not therefore allocated by date of report but by other criteria, such as date of onset of clinical symptoms.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, by location and date, the number of cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy diagnosed at slaughterhouses by his Department's health inspectors.

Mr. Maclean: Suspect cases of BSE occurring at slaughterhouses have, from 1989 onwards, been recorded on a quarterly basis for each region. Information for 1988 is available as a total for each region from 21 June, when BSE became notifiable, to the end of the year. It has been the Ministry's long-established practice not to disclose details of premises from which notifiable diseases have been reported.

Food Prices

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) pursuant to the answer of 26 February to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), Official Report, column 69, if he will express the figure of 1 to 1·5 per cent. on food prices as an average amount in pounds added to each family's food bill;

(2) pursuant to the reply given to the hon. Member for Southend, East, Official Report, 26 February, column 69, if he will estimate what the additional cost would be in weekly cash terms for the average family's food bill if the present monetary gap associated with the green pound were eliminated.

Mr. Curry: The average effect is estimated to be about 60p per week per household.

Slaughtering (Infected Premises)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will commission research to determine why premises on which birds have been compulsorily slaughtered have subsequently become reinfected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: To date there have been very few reports of reinfection on premises where birds have been compulsorily slaughtered and my Department does not plan at present to carry out the kind of research suggested. The assistance of my Department's veterinary investigation centres is available to veterinary practitioners should they wish to advise their clients on salmonella control in poultry or investigate possible causes of reinfection.

Spent Hens

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what current compensation is paid to an egg producer by his Ministry for a spent hen over 72 weeks of age; and what level of compensation was payable at the inception of the Zoonoses Order 1989.

Mr. Maclean: The present rate of compensation paid for a laying bird over 72 weeks of age is 34p. The rate at 1 March 1989, when the Zoonoses Order 1989 came into force, was 18p per bird.

Hens (Slaughter)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many hens of all descriptions have been compulsorily slaughtered under the provisions of the Zoonoses Order 1989 and the Animal Health Act 1981.

Mr. Maclean: Up to 2 March 1990, a total of 1,126,547 birds have been compulsorily slaughtered under the Animal Health Act 1981 as applied by the Zoonoses Order 1989.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total value of payments to all contractors used to assist his Ministry in compulsorily slaughtering hens of all descriptions under the provisions of (a) the Zoonoses Order 1989 and (b) the Animal Health Act 1981.

Mr. Maclean: Up to 2 March 1990, £42,300 has been paid to contractors assisting in the compulsory slaughter of salmonella-infected flocks.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will reconsider the policy of compulsory slaughter of chickens in the light of levels of employment in meat processing plants.

Mr. Maclean: The Government's measures to tackle salmonella are being kept under review.

Salmonella

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if any of the broiler flocks identified by his Department in the joint public health laboratory service/SVS salmonella update for January as being infected with salmonella have been compulsorily slaughtered.

Mr. Maclean: No broiler flocks have been compulsorily slaughtered.

Eggs

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what grounds he refuses to issue licences to farms which are subject to infected place notices under the Zoonoses Order 1989, to allow the sale of fresh, intact or frozen eggs to processors for pasteurisation.

Mr. Maclean: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave on 5 February, Official Report, column 499.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: The information required for the financial years 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The figures for subsequent years are as follows:

	£ million
1984-85	3·2
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	3·1
1987-88	0·6

Figures for the years 1984-85 to 1986-87 refer to the total cost of press, public relations and paid publicity which could be separated to show expenditure on press and public relations only at disproportionate cost. Figures for 1987-88 to 1989-90 relate to press and public relations alone. The estimated budget for press and public relations for 1990-91 is £1·2 million.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: The number of staff and complement in the press branch of the information division and related posts in the region is 26 and 29. The complement of staff is expected to be the same in 1990-91.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

	Staff in post 1 March 1990	Complement 1 March 1990
Grade 5	2·0	2·0
Grade 7	11·0	11·0
Senior Assistant Statistician /Assistant Statistician	9·0	10·0
Administrative support staff	130·5	134·5

It is expected that the staffing complements for 1990-91 will be a few posts higher than at present.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: The Department has not paid any sums to outside organisations for this purpose in the period 1979-80 to date. We keep continually under review the contribution that the Department might make to the Government privatisation policy.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: Expenditure by my Department in the financial year 1982-83 and each subsequent year is as follows:

	TV (a)	Radio (b)	Press advertising (c)	Other promotional (d)
1982-83	Nil	Nil	3,000	n/a
1983-84	Nil	Nil	27,000	n/a
1984-85	Nil	Nil	26,000	575,000
1985-86	Nil	Nil	29,000	656,000
1986-87	Nil	Nil	54,000	825,000
1987-88	Nil	Nil	12,000	693,000
1988-89	Nil	Nil	380,000	1,004,000
1989-90	Nil	Nil	116,000	2,372,000

n/a—Not available.

Figures for promotional advertising prior to 1982-83 are not available as the information for those years includes recruitment and other types of advertising. Information is not readily available to distinguish between expenditure on advertising in newspapers and that in the press generally. Separate figures for expenditure on other promotional material prior to 1984-85 are available only at disproportionate costs. The overall publicity budget for 1990-91 is estimated to be £2·4 million.

Irish Sea

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the amount of heavy metal contamination of fish in the Irish sea; and what assessment he has made of its ecological and direct health dangers.

Mr. Curry: Data on the heavy metal content of fish in the Irish sea collected by my Department's scientists as part of their regular monitoring of coastal waters are contained in "Aquatic Environment Monitoring Report" Nos. 16 and 17 which are available in the Library of the House. The conclusions in this report indicate that heavy metal contamination of fish in the Irish sea poses no ecological dangers.

The steering group on food surveillance produces regular reports on levels of contaminants in food, including fish, which are considered by the Department of Health's committee on toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment. The results of these reports do not indicate that there is any risk to consumers as a result of eating fish.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect of sewage and industrial dumping on the level of phytoplankton, and implications for the ecosystem in the Irish sea.

Mr. Curry: There is no industrial waste dumping in the Irish sea. The Department's assessment is that disposals of sewage sludge in Liverpool bay do not affect levels of phytoplankton and in turn therefore there are no implications for the ecosystem of the Irish sea.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his assessment of the effect of industrial radioactive and chemical pollution and waste disposal on the quantity and safety of fish caught in the Irish sea.

Mr. Curry: Data on radioactive discharges to the Irish sea and in seafood from the Irish sea which are collected and analysed by my Department's scientists are published on an annual basis in the "Aquatic Environment Monitoring Report" series, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

In addition, the concentrations of a range of non-radioactive contaminants in fish caught around our shores including the Irish sea, are routinely monitored by my Department's scientists. The results of this monitoring are assessed by the interdepartmental steering group on food surveillance.

The data and assessments indicate that the levels of contamination monitored do not give any cause for concern from a human consumption standpoint and do not represent a significant risk to either marine life or its habitat.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the amount per year of radioactive waste placed on the Irish sea basin.

Mr. Curry: Radioactive waste is not disposed of by placing it on the Irish sea basin. Details of the radioactivity contained in low-level liquid radioactive waste discharged under authorisation from nuclear facilities bordering the Irish sea are published annually in the Ministry's "Aquatic Environment Monitoring Report" series, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

During 1988 the amount of radioactivity contained in discharges to the Irish sea was:

	TBq
Tritium	1,843
Other beta activity	192
Alpha	2·5

Imported Mineral Waters

Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the nitrate and sodium levels of imported mineral waters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Ministry does not keep records of the composition of individual brands of imported natural mineral waters.

However I have recently written to the Commission urging that in the interests of consumer information the chemical analysis of mineral water should be displayed on the bottle.

Poultry

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the registration fee levied on all poultry laying flock keepers who are required to register has not yet been determined.

Mr. Maclean: The Poultry Flocks, Hatcheries and Processed Animal Protein (Fees) Order 1990 was laid before the House on 9 March.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the registration fee levied on all poultry flock keepers who are required to register will accrue to his Ministry.

Mr. Maclean : The registration of poultry laying flocks is being carried out by Agriculture Departments and so they will recover the associated costs.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why only larger flocks of poultry laying hens have to be registered.

Mr. Maclean: The resources for enforcing the salmonella legislation need to be concentrated particularly on flocks of 100 birds or more, which together supply over 98 per cent. of the eggs produced in this country. Flocks under this size are not required to be registered but the owners are subject to checks to ensure that they are meeting the salmonella testing requirements, which apply to all flocks from which eggs are sold for human consumption.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Government will allocate any additional resources to enable local authorities to enforce the Poultry Laying Flocks (Testing and Registration Etc.) Order 1989.

Mr. Maclean: The resources needed for this work will be taken into account in future decisions on local authority funding.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how successful the Poultry Laying Flocks (Testing and Registration Etc.) Order 1989 has been in providing a system of maintaining hens producing eggs for human consumption and in setting hygienic standards for handling and storage of eggs on farms.

Mr. Maclean: It is too early to judge the success of these new controls some of which came into effect last October, while the remainder become effective from 2 April 1990.

Mountain Spring Water (Cyprus)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the type and extent of bacteria found in Cypriot mountain spring water.

Mr. Maclean: This information is not generally available. However, I understand that last year two brands of bottled water from Cyprus were removed from sale following action by port and environmental health officials on evidence of unsatisfactory microbiological purity.

Benzene

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the validity of the statements by Mme Denise Pepin from the Institute of Hydrology in Clermont-Ferrand that benzene was only one group of trace elements filtered out from the mineral water and that of Dr. John Fawell, toxicologist at the water research centre in Buckinghamshire that it was not possible for the benzene to be naturally occurring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I assume the question refers to Perrier water. I have asked my officials to write to the EC Commission raising this and other questions concerned with its exploitation and labelling.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Curry: The total fees paid out by my Department to management consultants, excluding computer consultants, for 1984-85 to 1988-89, the estimated expenditure in 1989-90 and provision for 1990-91 are given in the table:

1984-85	27,110
1985-86	174,724
1986-87	135,279
1987-88	44,015
1988-89	162,114
[1]1989-90	143,175
[2]1990-91	123,198

[2] Provision.

Information for earlier years is not available except at disproportionate cost.

Lindane

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer of 6 March, Official Report, columns 559-60, what levels of lindane have been detected; and what level is regarded as posing a threat to marine life.

Mr. Curry: Scientists from my Department conducted a survey of the concentrations of lindane in the waters of the English Channel in November last year. The concentrations of lindane found were 0·13 to 0·65 ng/l. This compares with 1 to 4 ng/l reported by scientists from the Federal Republic of Germany for the North sea in 1986, when the highest concentrations were found in the German Bight. The safe level for marine life set by United Kingdom authorities is 10 ng/l and that set by the European Community is 20 ng/l.

Institute of Food Research

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many projects are presently being undertaken at the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research; how many are to be transferred to either Reading or Norwich; and how many of these are related to food safety.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 19 February 1990, Official Report, column 576.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the implications for food safety, in respect of microwaves, of the decision to close the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research.

Mr. Maclean: There are no implications for food safety, in respect of microwaves, of this closure, as there are facilities elsewhere with the capability to carry out research in this area. This will be evident from the answer which I gave on 13 December 1989, Official Report, column 694.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what facilities will exist, following the closure of the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research, capable of monitoring the safety of novel food processes on a scale appropriate to industrial conditions.

Mr. Maclean: It is for the industry to establish the safety of any novel food process. The research associations and institutes of higher education have appropriate facilities in addition to those of industry.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received (a) in favour of and (b) against the projected closure of the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have received many representations against the proposed closure of the Bristol laboratory. Most of them were essentially worried about the consequences for food safety R and D. I can assure the hon. Member that the closure will not affect the Government's continuing commitment to address and resolve food safety and hygiene issues of concern to taxpayers, consumers, producers and industry.

Indeed the Government are spending more money—£11·5 million in total—this year on R and D into food safety. Consolidation of the work of the Institute of Food Research at Norwich and Reading will allow greater emphasis to be placed on the basic and molecular sciences, especially in key areas such as food safety where major programmes will be further strengthened and expanded.

Gold Sinny Wrasse

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research is currently being undertaken by his Department into the use of the gold sinny wrasse as a substitute for pesticide use in fish farming.

Mr. Lang: I have been asked to reply.

Control of sea lice infestation is mainly a problem for marine salmon farms all but a few of which, in the United Kingdom, are located in Scotland.

The possible use of gold sinny wrasse to control sea lice is being investigated in trials by the Institute of Fishery Technology Research in Norway and in Scotland by the Sea Fish Industry Authority's sea farming unit in conjunction with the salmon farming industry.

A full evaluation of the Sea Fish Industry Authority's initial trials is not expected until the end of the year. Preliminary results including those from small-scale field trials with wrasse taken from the wild suggest that numbers of sea lice on farmed salmon are reduced in enclosures shared by wrasse. The viability of this method for large-scale and long-term control of sea lice is uncertain as yet and more work will be needed before commercial viability can be assessed.

Although the work is not being undertaken directly at the hands of Fisheries Departments, the results will be of considerable interest in relation to the investigation of other possible alternative controls on sea lice. DAFS scientists are co-ordinating a large-scale project, part funded by the European Communities research programme into possible development of a vaccine treatment. Other work is being undertaken with industry support, for example, the institute of aquaculture, university of Stirling has been commissioned by the Scottish Salmon Growers' Association to investigate alternative treatment methods. It is not possible to say when positive results or practical methods of treatment might emerge from these investigations.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Director of Public Prosecutions

56. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the content of his most recent discussions with the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Attorney-General: I frequently meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss matters of departmental interest, but I do not publish the contents of our discussions.

59. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions; and what subjects were discussed.

61. Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions; and what matters were discussed.

The Attorney-General: I last met the Director of Public Prosecutions on Monday 26 February 1990 when we discussed matters of departmental interest.

Crown Prosecution Service

60. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a further statement about the operation of the Crown prosecution service.

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service continues vigorously to pursue the objectives detailed in the DPP's annual report to Parliament presented on 28 July 1989.

House of Fraser

62. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General what advice he has received from the serious fraud squad following its inquiries into the implications of the issues raised in the House of Fraser report; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I refer to the written answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) on 1 March.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Lord Chancellor's Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

The Attorney-General: The number of staff by grade presently employed in the statistics branch of the Lord Chancellor's Department, together with the full complement, are as follows. No changes in complement are proposed for 1990-91.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Lord Chancellor's Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

The Attorney-General: At present there are six permanent staff employed in the press office of the Lord Chancellor's Department and one on secondment for six months. There are no vacancies at present and no current plans to increase the complement.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total expenditure by the Lord Chancellor's Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

The Attorney-General: The estimated 1989-90 expenditure by the Lord Chancellor's Department on press and public relations is £35,000 excluding staff costs. The budget for 1990-91 is £45,000.

Total expenditure excluding staff costs is:

1984-85	5,180
1985-86	13,253
1986-87	23,282
1987-88	34,500
1988-89	34,159

The amounts spent for the previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what were the figures for the spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

The Attorney-General: The figures for the Lord Chancellor's Department, excluding staff costs, are as follows:

	1988-89 Actual £	1989-90 Forecast £	1990-91 Forecast £
Television advertising	Nil	Nil	Nil

Other promotional material	32,500	35,000	45,000

The breakdown of the amounts spent on respective areas and the amounts spent for the previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost, but the total expenditure including staff costs was:

1984-85	135,730
1985-86	176,613
1986-87	148,020
1987-88	137,001

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what were the total fees paid out by the Lord Chancellor's Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

The Attorney-General: On the information available, the cost to the Lord Chancellor's Department of employing management consultants for each financial year from 1984-85 to date is as follows:

[1] forecast

The figures exclude computer consultancy. Figures for 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Crown Court, Barrow-in-Furness

Mr. Franks: To ask the Attorney-General what plans he has to improve facilities at the Crown court in Barrow-in-Furness.

The Attorney-General: The Crown court at Barrow-in-Furness sits only some 33 days per year and uses the magistrates court's premises. The magistrates court building is the responsibility of the magistrates courts committee and any improvement to the facilities is primarily a matter for it. There is a proposal to replace this building in the next few years, and therefore, there are no plans to make improvements to the facilities.

Bailiffs

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Attorney-General what information he has as to the number of firms in (i) England, (ii) each English region and (iii) each district council area of Wales of certificated bailiffs; and how many operatives they employ.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department is not responsible for the employment of certificated bailiffs and the information sought is not kept. Each county court is, however, required to exhibit a list of bailiffs who have been granted a certificate to levy distress for rent by a judge of that court.

ENVIRONMENT

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice is made available by the TCS privatisation unit on compliance with European Economic Community directives on procurement.

Mr. Chope: Guidance on compliance with these directives is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Crown Suppliers privatisation unit takes account of Treasury guidance when advising Departments about the implications of privatisation of the Crown Suppliers.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to determine whether guarantees in relation to TCS work accord with EEC and GATT directives.

Mr. Chope: All Departments have been made aware by Her Majesty's Treasury of the requirements of the EC directives and GATT agreement on Government procurement. My Department will comply with those requirements in any agreement which it has or may enter into with the Crown Suppliers, involving undertakings about future business levels for a period.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total value of contracts that the Crown Suppliers has won through tender competition for suppliers to the private sector.

Mr. Chope: Total sales by the Crown Suppliers to the private sector from April to December 1989 were to the value of £748,000, of which £118,000 was awarded through tenders.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he anticipates that the audit of the 1989 trading results of the Crown Suppliers will be complete; and who will undertake that audit.

Mr. Chope: The audit of the 1989 trading results of the Crown Suppliers will be undertaken by the National Audit Office. Completion of the audit is planned for May 1990.

South Yorkshire Fire Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority over its financial situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment carefully considered the representations made by the authority on his proposals for the 1990-91 local authority grant settlement before taking final decisions on the settlement. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, subsequently met a delegation from the authority to discuss its financial situation.

Housing (London)

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the number of housing association units for rent approved by the Housing Corporation within the London boroughs, under its block three (new) programme in each of the years 1985-86, 1987-88 and 1988-89, with figures to be apportioned between newly built and rehabilitated units and with hostel and shared housing bedspaces to be itemised separately;

(2) what was the number of units for rent within the London boroughs completed by housing associations, where funding was through housing association grant dispensed by the Housing Corporation in each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89, with figures to be apportioned between newly built and rehabilitated units and with hostel and shared housing bedspaces to be itemised separately.

Mr. Chope: This information is not held by the Department but by the Housing Corporation. I have therefore asked the Housing Corporation to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what were the total numbers of housing association homes for rent completed by housing associations within the London boroughs, excluding units already owned by associations that received housing association grant for major repairs, where the primary funding source was local authority housing association grant for each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89, with figures to be apportioned between newly built and rehabilitated units and with hostel and shared housing bedspaces to be itemised separately;

(2) what were the total numbers of housing association units for rent within the London boroughs that were approved by his Department for housing association grant, block three, where the funding authority was a local authority not the Housing Corporation, for each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89, with figures to be apportioned between newly built and rehabilitated units with hostel and shared housing bedspaces to be itemised separately.

Mr. Chope: The detailed information requested is not available. Total numbers of housing association dwellings funded by English local authorities are published in table 2.26 of the quarterly HMSO publication "Housing and Construction Statistics Part 2", which is in the Library.

Housing

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide in the Official Report figures consistent with tables 8.1 and 8.2 of Cm. 1008 for the years 1984-85 to 1989-90 but broken down on the same basis as table 9.1 of Cm. 609.

Mr. Chope: The figures are as follows:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate the amounts of each of the components in the standard spending assessments of each London borough, together with the respective totals.

Mr. Chope: The amounts are listed in the table:

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions govern the eligibility of student nurses for community charge relief at the student rate; and what proportion of student nurses will pay at the student rate in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: The eligibility criteria for the student relief are set out in the Personal Community Charge (Students) Regulations 1989 (S.I. 1989/443). They provide that students on undergraduate nursing courses and those undertaking Project 2000 training will be eligible for the student relief. No precise estimate can be made of the numbers involved. However I understand that, by 1 April 1990, Project 2000 schemes will be in operation at 13 of the 86 nursing schools in England. Over the next few years the scheme will be extended to cover all pre-registration nursing trainees receiving their training in schools of nursing.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his written reply dated 14 February, Official Report, column 222, concerning the amount of poll tax payable in 1990-91 per adult for each region, and so on whether he will provide in each case an estimate of the number of adults, excluding ratepayers' spouses, who do not currently pay rates.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 26 February 1990]: The available information is shown in the table. This is based on data taken from the family expenditure survey and shows the estimated number of adults in each region who are not the head of household or their spouse.

Numbers may not add due to rounding.

Council Houses

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much local authorities spend on former council houses they no longer own; and when he anticipates local authorities being free of debt on these former assets.

Mr. Chope: Local authorities in England spent £110 million up to 31 March 1989 on reinstatement grants under part XVI of the Housing Act 1985. Information is not available on how much authorities pay in home improvement grants on former council houses. Authorities generally manage their debt on a collective basis and it is, therefore, impossible to attribute a specific amount of outstanding debt to specific former assets. Outstanding debt in authorities' housing revenue accounts, however, is taken into account in the assessment of housing subsidy.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average price of council houses sold during the period 1985 to the end of 1989.

Mr. Chope: The average discounted selling price for local authority and new town sales in England between January 1985 and December 1989 was £16,200.

Housing Corporation

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Housing Corporation has given the south-west housing associations permission to bring money forward from 1990-91 into the current financial year to pay urgent bills.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 30 January 1990, Official Report, column 175, that the capital resources available to the Housing Corporation in 1989-90 would be increased by £120 million, with a corresponding reduction in 1990-91, to reflect a greater speeding up of housing schemes by housing associations than had been forecast. This will enable the Housing Corporation to meet equitably the inescapable commitments of housing associations across all regions for the rest of the financial year.

Residential Property (Greater London)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the percentage change in the price of residential properties in Greater London following the limiting of Miras to one per dwelling.

Mr. Chope: The rules giving mortgage interest tax relief were changed from 1 August 1988; changes in mix-adjusted house prices in Greater London from the third quarter of 1988 are as follows:

	Percentage change on previous quarter
1988
July-September	7
October-December	7
1989
January-March	−4
April-June	5
July-September	−1
October-December	−3

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why, in table 3-11 of the United Kingdom radioactive waste inventory (DOE/RW 188.061), substantial low-level waste arisings are included with the figures for committed sources.

Mr. Trippier: I presume that the hon. Member refers to the table on page 3-11 which gives this information. These low-level waste arisings are those from the operation and decommissioning of plant currently in existence, under construction or required in future for currently approved programmes.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff of the Property Services Agency were serving abroad on 1 February; in which countries they were stationed; and whether they will be given the opportunity to return to the United Kingdom before privatisation.

Mr. Chope: At 1 February 1990 the numbers of civil servants in the Property Services Agency serving abroad were:

	Non-industrial	Industrial
Germany	274	5
Cyprus	53	20
Gibraltar	49	4
Hong Kong	12	—
Ascension	6	4
Belize	10	12
Bermuda	1	—
Falkland Islands	20	—
Canada	2	—
United States of America	1	—
	428	45

Up to privatisation, staff serving abroad will be expected to serve out their tours in the normal way.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what number of Property Services Agency staff have been told that they cannot accept or apply for Civil Service posts outside the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Chope: None, but all staff are aware that their release will depend on whether they need to be replaced and if so when a suitable replacement can be found.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of consultants and contractors who failed the Property Services Agency's security clearance tests in 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Chope: It is not the practice to give detailed information about security vetting.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the staff of the Property Services Agency will lose their civil servant status following their transfer to the proposed Government-owned company.

Mr. Chope: Yes.

Property Holdings

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what number of staff Property Holdings will have on 1 April, in the following groups: (a) P and T, (b) AEG and (c) support.

Mr. Chope: It is anticipated that at 1 April 1990 the non-industrial staff numbers in Property Holdings will be:

	Number
P and T	160
AEG	470
Support	40

PSA and Crown Suppliers

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has made any statement to the staff of the Property Services Agency or TCS about their future since he became Secretary of State.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend's speeches in the debates on the Second and Third Readings of the Property Services Agency and Crown Suppliers Bill included statements about the future prospects for the staff of TCS and the agency.

Interdepartmental Dispatch Service

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will require new employees of the interdepartmental dispatch service to be security cleared following privatisation.

Mr. Chope: The existing requirements in relation to the security clearance of IDS staff engaged in the carriage of Government mail will continue after privatisation.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten: The numbers and grades of staff and complement in the statistical divisions[1] of DOE(C), at 1 March 1990 are as follows:

	Staff in post as at 1 March 1990	Complement
Chief Statistician	5	5
Statistician	17	17
Senior Assistant Statistician	6	6
Assistant Statistician	3	3
G7	1	2

HEO	13·5	13
EO	29	29
AO	32	36
AA	6·5	13
Secretary/Typist	4	4
Total	121	131

[1] The statistical divisions, in DOE(C) comprise Housing data statistics, Construction Industry Statistics, Finance Local Authority Statistics, Land and General Statistics and Environmental Protection Statistics.

There are also statisticians employed throughout the Department in posts of a largely administrative nature; these numbered 11 at 1 March 1990. Complements for 1990-91 have not yet been finalised.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten: On 1 March there were 44 staff employed in the information directorate of my Department (including PSA), against a complement of 47. The proposed complement for 1990-91 is 48.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten: Following is the information for water privatisation advisers:

1986-87	1·1
1987-88	0·6
1988-89	5·1
1989-90[1]	23·0

Expenditure relating to the privatisation of the Crown Suppliers was £40,000 in 1988-89 and is estimated to be £280,000 for 1989-90.

No expenditure was incurred on privatisation advisers prior to 1986-87. Final decisions have not yet been made about costs to be incurred in 1990-91.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information relating to the financial years 1979-80 and 1984-85 inclusive is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. Final decisions have not yet been made about costs to be incurred in 1990-91.

Following is the information relating to the remaining financial years for my Department including PSA:

	£ million
1985-86	4·3
1986-87	5·0
1987-88	5·3
1988-89	8·4
1989-90[1]	16·4

Waste Imports

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give (a) figures for (i) the amount of waste controlled by the transfrontier shipment regulations and (ii) the amount of waste not controlled by the transfrontier shipment regulations imported into the United Kingdom between 31 October 1988 and 30 October 1989 and (b) details of the wastes not controlled by the transfrontier shipment regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: A total of 36,789 tonnes of waste was imported into England and Wales under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988, between 31 October 1988 and 30 October 1989. Information is not held centrally on the quantities or types of imported waste that are not controlled by the transfrontier regulations.

Palace of Westminster (Hairdressing)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made on the provision in the Palace of Westminster of hairdressing facilities for hon. Ladies and female staff; and when he expects the facility to become available.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware of having received any request from the House authorities to consider converting accommodation for use as hairdressing facilities.

Demolition

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his statement of 2 March, Official Report, columns 531-34, he will set out the options he is considering with regard to meeting the objectives of residential planning demolition restraint.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As I indicated to the House on 2 March, I intend shortly to issue a consultation paper about whether the demolition of dwellinghouses should be brought within planning control. It will set out the issue and invite views on the scale of the problem nationwide. I expect the paper to seek comments on the following options:

(a) designation of more conservation areas;
(b) designation of local or special development areas;
(c) a system of prior notification of demolition of residential property;
(d) a code of practice for housebuilders;
(e) further policy advice from my Department;
(f) require planning permission to be obtained before demolishing any dwellinghouse.

Maintenance

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the cash-limited amount for minor maintenance work charged to class XX, vote 18, subhead G (maintenance and other operating costs) for 1989-90 was exhausted.

Mr. Chope: Funds are still available, but, in order to stay within the provision voted by Parliament, it is necessary to consider priorities with particular care during the rest of the financial year.

Water Filters

Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what harmful bacteria have been identified as generally present in a carbon water filter.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Carbon filters absorb organic matter present in water and also promote the decomposition of chlorine. Therefore, a carbon filter can support the development of a wide range of bacteria by providing nutrients for growth and by protecting bacteria from the disinfectant action of chlorine.

The following potentially harmful species of bacteria have been detected in carbon water filters:

Pseudomonas Aeruginosa, Aeromonas Hydrophilla, Klebsiella.

These species are all known to be opportunistic pathogens and as such as potentially harmful to the very young, the elderly and immuno-compromised patients.

Kleinwort Benson

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions and for what purpose his Department has commissioned work from Kleinwort Benson since July 1988.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am not aware that my Department has placed any commission with Kleinwort Benson since July 1988.

Fridge Bank

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider supporting a national fridge bank scheme as a way of reducing chlorofluorocarbons by removing old and unwanted fridges.

Mr. Trippier: We have commissioned a technical report by Coopers and Lybrand which deals with the problem of the existing stock of chlorofluorocarbons. We will consider whether any new initiatives are appropriate in the light of that report.

Rating Reform

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those regulations governing the introduction of the community charge and the uniform business rate which have yet to be (a) laid before the House and (b) debated by the House.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The regulations still to be laid before the House are as follows:

The Community Charge

1. Amendments to the administration and enforcement regulations.
2. Make up of the general fund.
3. Arrangements for netting of RSG and redistributed NNDR payments to local authorities and NNDR contributions from local authorities.
4. The form of the bills to be used when an authority is charge capped.
5. Adjustments to rates recoverable or written off after 1 April 1990 relating to earlier years.
6. Exemption of 18-19 year olds still at school.

National Non-Domestic Rates

7. Valuation of caravan sites, universities and polytechnics.
8. Alteration of lists—appeals against rateable values and Valuation and Community Charge Tribunals procedures for NNDR.
9. Savings from General Rate Act 1967 and related provisions.
10. Repeals and Consequential amendments.
11. Payment of interest on overpaid rates.
12. Transitional arrangements: additional rules to deal with special cases.
13. Rateable Values of Utilities: National Power plc and nuclear power stations. (Subject to an Affirmative Resolution).

The last debate which covered affirmative regulations and regulations subject to negative resolutions that had been prayed against took place in the House on 20 December 1989. On 18 January 1990 the House approved the report giving effect to the 1990-91 grant settlement.

Industrial Waste

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures his Department has taken to provide incentives for companies to reduce pollutant output and to penalise those who fail to comply with current regulations governing the output of industrial waste.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 9 March 1990]: Companies whose processes pollute the environment are expected to meet the full costs of the measures which the regulatory authorities require them to take in order to control the level of their emissions or discharges. Failure to comply is punishable by law, and offenders may face unlimited fines in the higher courts under provisions contained in the new Environmental Protection Bill.

Chemical Waste

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department has taken to oblige the dumpers of chemical waste to prove its safety before dumping is permitted.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 9 March 1990]: Under the Control of Pollution Act 1974, chemical waste must be disposed of to suitably licensed, land-based facilities. In granting the licence, the waste disposal authority must be satisfied that the proposed activities will not endanger public health or pollute water. Disposals of wastes at sea are licensed by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food only where there are suitable land-based facilities, and where the materials involved will not have an adverse effect upon the marine environment.

North Sea Dumping

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the ministerial declaration made at the second international North sea conference concerning the reduction of inputs of dangerous substances to rivers and estuaries is achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1990, c.734.]: I represented the Government at the third North sea conference in The Hague on 7 and 8 March. This was a constructive conference, as a result of which the North sea will be a cleaner and more wholesome sea. The United Kingdom was able to make a positive contribution to the outcome. The main features of the final declaration were as follows.

We confirmed our intention to end the dumping of industrial waste by the end of 1992, and to end dumping of sewage sludge by the end of 1998. We agreed on a strengthened approach to the reduction of nutrient inputs. In this, the decision that I announced before the conference to treat all sewage discharges made a significant contribution.

Our agreement on a harmonised approach to the control of dangerous substances is a most important step forward. It addresses the most serious source of contamination of the North sea, namely rivers. The commitment to reduce still further the impact of certain substances, to both air and water, underlines the urgency of our approach to this central problem.

We agreed to phase out and destroy all PCBs by 1999 at the latest. We made clear our fundamental objection to the long-term storage of PCBs, which is environmentally dangerous. Destruction is essential and I am particularly pleased that we pledged ourselves to provide sufficient destruction facilities for each country to destroy its own waste.

Finally, I should like to single out the agreement on wildlife, a topic which previously has been neglected. The agreement provides for action to protect and conserve wildlife, especially dophins and porpoises, and habitats. It will serve as a platform on which to build more extensive and ambitious proposals in the years to come.

The efforts of all signatories must now be directed towards the implementation of the final declaration. The United Kingdom will produce an implementation plan within three months.

A copy of the final declaration is being deposited in the Library.

Irish Sea

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to increase funding for monitoring radioactive sewage and chemical waste dumping into the Irish sea and research into the environmental implications.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

My Department undertakes a substantial programme of environmental monitoring and research covering the Irish sea. We have no current plans to increase the resources committed to this work but the programme is kept under continuous review.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a comparative study of levels of radiation in the Irish sea and in other seas.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

We have no plans to do so. Such a study has been carried out by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority. The results were published in July last year as "The Radioactivity of the Sea", by M. I. Walker and K. S. B. Rose, AERE R 13365.

Flood Prevention

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes have been made by the National Rivers Authority on finance available for flood prevention; and if he will list these areas by area.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 5 March 1990]: I have been asked to reply.

The flood defence expenditure of the National Rivers Authority is primarily funded by means of grants towards capital expenditure from my Department and the Welsh Office and by levies on local authorities. The table provides estimates for 1989-90 and 1990-91 by flood defence district:

SCOTLAND

Law Reform

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland by what means he will determine whether prospective members of the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board possess each of the required attributes prescribed in paragraph 4 of schedule 1 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill; and whether prospective members will be required to sit an examination or other written test.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There will be no examination or written test for prospective members of the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board. The membership will be selected with regard to the areas of expertise or knowledge set out in paragraph 4 of schedule 1.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many staff will be employed in each of the first five years of operation by the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board in terms of paragraph 8 of schedule 12 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill; and what is the estimate of the total remuneration to be paid to them including employers' national insurance contributions, taxation, pensions and allowances.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Such matters will be for the board to determine.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ensure that there is always a certain minimum number of qualified solicitors on the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I do not propose any such permanent quotas, although I fully expect solicitors to be represented in the initial appointments.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what bodies he proposes to consult prior to making appointments to the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At the least I expect to consult bodies representing the interests referred to in schedule 1, paragraph 4 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the amount of funds the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board will be required to establish and maintain in terms of paragraph 16 of schedule 1 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This will be a matter for the board.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what revenue the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board will be entitled to receive and from what sources; what is the estimate of the annual revenue of the board at the end of each of the first five years of operation; and what is his estimate of the total expenditure of the board in each of the first five years of operation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to clause 14(2) and schedule 1, paragraph 11(2) (c) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill as regards sources of revenue. It is not yet possible to forecast the revenue and expenditure of the board.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he anticipates that the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board will be established.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Subject to proceedings on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, during 1991.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many responses he has received to the proposals for multi-disciplinary practices.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) on 26 February 1990.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many times and on what dates he has met representatives of the Law Society of Scotland with regard to part II of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill; and if he has sought their detailed views with regard to clause 15(5) and clause 15(9) thereof;

(2) when he last met with members of the Scottish Law Society to discuss legal reform; and on how many occasions since he has met with representatives of the Scottish Law Society.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South on 26 February 1990. I am aware of views expressed by the Law Society on the subsections referred to, notably that the powers there should be duties.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will confer upon the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board powers to suspend the business of any qualified conveyancer, prior to such person having been formally found guilty of professional misconduct.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Such a situation would not arise since the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill does not provide for a qualified conveyancer, as such, to offer conveyancing services.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make it his policy to publish prior to the commencement of the Committee stage of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill a code of conduct to govern the manner in which conveyancing practitioners conduct the provision of conveyancing services, and the matters referred to in paragraphs (b) to (e) inclusive of clause 15(9) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill;

(2) when he first drafted a code of conduct to apply to persons other than solicitors permitted to carry out conveyancing services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: An annex showing what a code of conduct on conveyancing might provide for was published in my right hon. and learned Friend's consultation paper, "The Legal Profession in Scotland", in March 1989. There is room for further refinement of what the code should contain before any attempt is made to draft regulations—a process on which I do not propose to embark before the Bill is enacted.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the public will be entitled to inspect the register of confirmation practitioners to be set up in terms of clause 17(1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, any conditions attached against the applicant's name in the register in terms of clause 17(5)(a) of said Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if there are to be conferred upon the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board disciplinary powers analogous to those possessed by the Scottish solicitors disciplinary tribunal.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are many parallels between the disciplinary powers proposed for the board and those of the Scottish solicitors disciplinary tribunal.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if there are to be conferred upon the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board powers to levy fines.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This question is under consideration.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has had with the Director General of Fair Trading on regulations referred to in clause 15(5) and clause 15(9) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill; and whether these and other regulations under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill will be available before the Bill passes through Committee stage in the House.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The making of regulations under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) (Bill) and consultation on their terms is dependent on the passage of the Bill.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what disciplinary powers are to be conferred upon the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board, other than suspension or revocation of registration.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to clause 18(3) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance he will give to the Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board with regard to (a) educational qualifications and (b) practical training necessary before any person applying for registration as a qualified conveyancer has his application granted.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Responsibility for rules on these matters will be with the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. The board will be able to seek whatever guidance it requires.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated salary to be paid to (a) the chairman and (b) the members of the proposed Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board in its first year of operation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These matters have not been decided.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated total annual cost from public funds of the proposed Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board to be set up in accordance with clause 14 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, for each of the first five years of its operation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This will depend on how quickly the board becomes self-financing.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he received to the consultation paper, "The Legal Profession in Scotland", from the Society of Scottish Conservative Lawyers.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend received one response from the Society of Scottish Conservative Lawyers, dealing with solicitors' rights of audience before the Court of Session and the House of Lords.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research he has initiated into the impact upon the provision of legal aid services in Scotland of the proposals contained in the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill to allow non-solicitors to carry out conveyancing services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None. The Scottish Home and Health Department has however commissioned a study of the geographical distribution and accessibility of solicitors' offices in Scotland. This work should provide the basis for a follow-up study after the proposals contained in the Bill have been implemented.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what research was carried out to assess how the fees charged by solicitors for conveyancing services varied as from region to region; and what research was carried out prior to the publication of the paper, "The Legal Profession in Scotland", with regard to the downward effect on the level of fees of the abolition of scale fees and permission to advertise;

(2) what market research the Government carried out prior to publication of the paper, "The Legal Profession in Scotland" and what market research has been carried out as to the level of fees charged by solicitors in Scotland for conveyancing services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A research project is currently under way to compare fees charged for conveyancing before and after the abolition of scale fees in 1985. A further project nearing completion has examined the impact of advertising by solicitors on their fee-charging practices. Both projects use data drawn from a number of market areas of different sizes throughout Scotland.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps will be taken to ensure that solicitors undertaking work under the legal aid schemes compete on level terms with non-solicitors solely undertaking conveyancing and confirmation services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Hardly any legal aid expenditure is on conveyancing and confirmation but I intend that clients should have the same access to legal advice and assistance for such matters whether they use a solicitor or an appropriate practitioner. The basis of remuneration will also be the same.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether premises have been identified to be used by the proposed Scottish Conveyancing and Confirmation Practitioners Board.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the public will be entitled to inspect the register of conveyancing practitioners referred to in clause 15 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, under clause 19 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, qualified conveyancers and other non-solicitors will be empowered to carry out conveyancing services and be entitled to carry out commercial conveyancing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Leukaemia

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what action he has taken following the publication of the Gardner report into leukaemia and pre-conceptual radiation at Sellafield;

(2) what plans he has in the light of the Gardner report suggesting a direct link between parental exposure to radiation at nuclear installations and childhood leukaemia to establish further case control studies along the lines of Gardner in Scotland;

(3) when the results of the case control study at Dounreay into possible leukaemia clusters will be published.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The results of the case control study at Dounreay are expected by the summer. The Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment is currently assessing the evidence relating to leukaemia incidence around all the other Scottish nuclear sites and Scotland as a whole.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: The figures for the Scottish Office are:

	Staff in post at 1 March 1990	Vacant Posts	Proposed staff 1990-91
Professional Grades:
Grade 5	2	—	2
Grade 7	16	—	16
Asst/Senior Asst Statistician	10	3	13

Executive Officer	23	—	23
Administrative Officer	46	—	46
Administrative Assistant	16	3	18
Personal Secretary	2	—	2
Total	125	6	130

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: At 1 March 1990 the number of staff employed in the information officer grades in the Scottish information office was 31½. At that date there were no vacancies.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: The running costs of the Scottish information office for each year from 1985-86 are as follows:

1985-86	0·9
1986-87	1·0
1987-88	1·1
1988-89	1·2
[1]1989-90	1·4
[2]1990-91	1·6

[2] Plans.

These figures exclude expenditure on information campaigns.

Directly comparable figures for years prior to the introduction of new Scottish Office budgetary arrangements in 1985-86 are not available.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: No expenditure was incurred between the years 1979-80 and 1986-87 inclusive. Expenditure since then has been:

1987-88	615,648
1988-89	2,314,775
[1]1989-90	5,205,000

[1] Estimated outturn.

The provision for 1990-91 will be contained in the supply estimates to be published on 20 March.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional materials in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: The latest estimates of expenditure by the Scottish Office in the current financial year on television; radio; newspaper advertising; and printed and other material are £957,000, £73,000, £1,080,000 and £913,000 respectively. The corresponding figures for 1988-89 were £591,000, £36,000, £422,000 and £1,064,000 respectively.

Prior to 1988-89 an analysis of expenditure was not maintained in the form requested. Total expenditure on information publicity for 1979-80 and subsequent years to 1988-89 was:

1979-80	263,000
1980-81	362,000
1981-82	393,000
1982-83	386,000
1983-84	360,000
1984-85	704,000
1985-86	677,000
1986-87	857,000
1987-88	1,094,000

Proposed provision for expenditure by the Scottish Office on information campaigns in 1990-91 is £2·5 million. Detailed decisions on expenditure by media have not yet been taken. None of these figures includes the running costs of the Scottish information office.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer which I gave him on 13 March 1989 at column 35. Additional information is as follows:

[1]1988-89	1,162,108
[2]1989-90	289,276
[2]1990-91	408,000

Caledonian MacBrayne

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the names of the chairman and directors of Caledonian MacBrayne; what are their periods of office and their annual remuneration; and what were the organisations, voluntary associations and political parties from which they were recruited, selected or appointed to their posts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The names of those who have accepted the Secretary of State's invitation to form the new board of Caledonian MacBrayne Limited, along with relevant initial periods of appointment, are shown in the table:

(Chairman)	A. J. Struthers	3 years
(Chief Executive)	C. S. Paterson	—
	W. G. Cochrane	3 years
	A. Gilchrist	2 years
	K. H. MacKenzie	3 years
	G. MacLeod	2 years
	D. Martin	3 years
	Mrs. E. Sillars	3 years

The chairman will be paid £15,000 per annum and all board members will be paid £4,500 per annum. In considering appointments to the board, the Secretary of State took care to strike a balance between commercial expertise and first-hand knowledge both of the islands which the company's vessels serve and of the needs of the company's customers. No one has been invited to join the board on the basis of links with any organisation, voluntary association or political party. All appointments were made on merit.

New Towns

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many complaints he has received against Cumbernauld and Kilsyth district council's administration of grants for the improvement or modernisation of private homes in Cumbernauld new town in each of the past three years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No complaints have been received during the past three years.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many complaints he has received against Cumbernauld and Kilsyth district council's administration of capital consents for the refurbishment of council houses in Cumbernauld new town in each of the past three years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the past two financial years and in the current financial year to date, I have received one letter of complaint.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the salaries paid annually to the chairman, vice-chairman and board members of Cumbernauld development corporation.

Mr. Lang: The levels of remuneration of the chairman, deputy chairman and members of Cumbernauld development corporation in the 1989-90 financial year are as follows:

Chairman	17,172
Deputy chairman	7,804
Members	3,525

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if the salaries paid to the chairmen, deputy chairmen, and board members of new town development corporations are intended solely as payment for attendance at board meetings; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are the duties and responsibilities of persons appointed to serve on the boards of new town development corporations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Salaries paid to the chairman, deputy chairman and board members of new town development corporations are not intended solely as payment for attendance at board meetings.

The task of a new town development corporation is to undertake the planning and development of the new town; to provide the wide range of facilities required, including housing, industrial and commercial development; and to co-ordinate action with the local authorities responsible for various services. Board members are appointed on a part-time basis under the provisions of the New Towns (Scotland) Act 1968 and receive remuneration in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Their duties involve attendance at corporation meetings, which are normally held monthly, and such other tasks, for example as chairman or member of internal committees or as representatives of the corporation in public as may from time to time be required. Most board members participate willingly in a range of such tasks.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the estimated cost to each local authority of providing alternative methods of sewage and waste disposal when the ban on dumping such waste at sea is enforced; if he will provide these funds to secure an immediate ban; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In Scotland, there are no licences in force for dumping of industrial waste at sea and none will be issued. The only current licences issued in Scotland are for dumping of sewage sludge at sea by local authorities. The announcement by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 5 March 1990 that dumping of sewage sludge at sea is to be phased out by the end of 1998 affects two sewerage authorities, Strathclyde and Lothian. These authorities will now be required to find alternative land-based disposal routes and their preliminary assessments indicate that the capital cost of incineration as an alternative to sea disposal might be about £52 million in Strathclyde and about £12 million in Lothian. As new disposal facilities will take time to design, obtain planning permission, and construct, an immediate ban on sea disposal would not be practicable.

Junior Hospital Doctors

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what currently are the hours of work of junior hospital doctors in each regional health authority area in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on the hours actually worked by junior hospital doctors is not available centrally. The Scottish Home and Health Department asked health boards in January 1989 to review all junior doctors' rota commitments with a view to eliminating those which required doctors to be on duty more often than one night and one weekend in three. Reports on the outcome of this exercise are currently being evaluated.

Geese

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what types of geese have been killed on Islay since April 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The numbers of Greenland white-fronted and Barnacle geese reported as killed were six and 752 respectively. Figures for the 1989-90 season will not be available until after 31 May this year.

Dementia

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of dementia in any form there were in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greater Glasgow for each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people suffering from dementia were living in public institutions, for each year since 1979 in (a) Greater Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The number of people resident in mental handicap or mental illness hospitals and units on 31 December in each year with a diagnosis of dementia is as follows:

	Greater Glasgow	Strathclyde	Scotland
1979	824	1,493	4,197
1980	869	1,588	4,407
1981	882	1,651	4,554
1982	934	1,710	4,821
1983	989	1,843	5,112
1984	1,010	1,873	5,102
1985	1,019	1,907	5,481
1986	1,092	2,030	5,886
1987	1,113	2,058	5,972
[1]1988	1,135	2,027	6,001
[1]1989	1,135	2,032	6,050

[1] Provisional.

The number of mentally confused [1] persons resident in local authority homes on 31 March in each year is as follows:

	Greater Glasgow	Strathclyde	Scotland
1979	—	—	—
1980	—	445	1,383
1981	—	547	1,573
1982	—	615	1,446
1983	433	768	1,582
1984	417	813	1,650
1985	393	815	1,760
1986	420	907	1,864
1987	509	1,067	2,136
1988	537	1,110	2,428

[1] The term "confused" in this context refers almost entirely to the elderly suffering from dementia, but could include some people with other conditions.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies his Department has carried out or sponsored about the problem of dementia in Scotland since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The chief scientist office of the Scottish Office has, since 1979, sponsored the following studies on dementia:

An image analysing computer study of human cerebral cortex with special reference to parenthymatous senile dementia.

An investigation into the effectiveness of a reality orientation programme in a psychogeriatric day hospital.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The information requested is as follows:

Factory Shortages, Strathclyde

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to solve the problem of factory shortages in Strathclyde.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The growth in economic activity in Scotland has inevitably led to increased demand for factory space. The Government recognise that the private sector cannot always meet this need. To this end they continue to make funds available to a range of bodies, including local authorities, new town development corporations and the Scottish Development Agency. Since April 1986, the agency alone has spent over £40 million under its factory building programme.

In the current year the three Strathclyde new towns are expected to spend around £26 million on new factory construction and over £4 million on rehabilitation of existing units. An additional £5 million has been made available to local authorities specifically to help meet the demand for small factory units and industrial workshops, just over half of which went to Strathclyde.

Eye and Dental Health

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is for each year since 1975, and in 1990 moneys, the National Health Service expenditure for the treatment of eye-related and dental diseases in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to encourage people in Scotland to have regular (a) eye and (b) dental tests.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The Government joined with the ophthalmic profession in a national eye awareness campaign to promote the benefits of eye care to the consumer. A series of newspaper and television advertisements ran from May to December 1989.

Awareness of the need to visit a dentist is stimulated by on-going health board campaigns and initiatives promoted generally through the community dental service. Further encouragement to have regular dental checks will be provided by the new contract for general dental practitioners.

Mental Health

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is, for each year since 1975, the amount of public funds provided for research on mental health in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: Funding awarded by the Scottish Home and Health Department and the Scottish Education Department for research into mental handicap and illness is as follows:

1975	—
1976	25,980
1977	59,711
1978	66,703
1979	61,563
1980	277,216
1981	53,769
1982	28,700
1983	103,937
1984	98,608
1985	209,160
1986	393,514
1987	105,260
1988	175,103
1989	267,730

Community Care

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is, for each year since 1975, the total amount of public funds provided for community care or similar projects in Scotland, in 1990 moneys.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 9 March 1990]: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. Community care extends over a wide range of different services and expenditure on it is not separately classified as such.

Pre-school Education

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will review the availability and quality of pre-school education in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 9 March 1990]: It is for local authorities to decide on the extent and nature of pre-school education they provide. However, the number of children attending local authority nursery schools in Scotland has risen from 31,770 in 1979 to 40,855 in 1988, an increase of 28 per cent., while over the same period allowance for nursery education as part of overall provision for local authority current expenditure for education has increased from £13·5 million to £35·5 million. So far as the quality of education is concerned, I await the conclusions of the committee of inquiry into the educational experience of the under-fives chaired by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Education and Science, and will consider carefully their relevance to Scotland.

TRANSPORT

South Circular

14. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the progress of his consideration of proposals for the south circular road.

Mr. Parkinson: The several thousand responses received on the south circular assessment study are currently being collated and analysed. Decisions on the way forward will be announced as soon as possible.

Channel Tunnel

15. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement of the implications for transport policy should the Channel tunnel not be completed.

Mr. Portillo: I am confident that the Channel tunnel will be completed and see no point in speculating otherwise.

26. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much public money will be spent on the rail link with the Channel Tunnel and the provision of new rolling stock; and when he expects to make a journey through the tunnel on a train.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail is planning to spend over £1 billion on trains, station and maintenance facilities and track and signalling improvements, so that a full international passenger and freight service can begin on the day that the Channel tunnel opens. The holder of my office could expect to make a journey in June 1993.

Road Accidents, Worcestershire

16. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fatal road accidents there were in the county of Worcestershire during 1989; and what was the comparable figure for (a) 1979 and (b) 1984.

Mr. Atkins: In 1988, the latest complete year for which figures are available, there were 72 fatal accidents in Hereford and Worcester. The comparable figures for 1979 and 1984 were 85 and 72 fatal accidents, respectively.

Vehicle Excise Evasion

17. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has as to the amount of revenue likely to be lost in 1989-90 as a result of vehicle excise evasion.

Mr. Atkins: A roadside survey carried out by the Department in June 1989 estimated the revenue loss through evasion of vehicle excise duty throughout Great Britain in 1989-90 was £103 million, or 3·5 per cent. of revenue due.

Further details can be obtained from the transport statistics report "Vehicle Excise Duty Evasion in Great Britain in 1989-90" which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Regional Airports

18. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of air passengers currently use regional airports.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is collected by the Civil Aviation Authority. I understand that in the year ending October 1989, 33·8 per cent. of terminal passengers at United Kingdom airports used regional airports.

London Assessment Studies

19. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received by 28 February on the London assessment studies.

Mr. Atkins: The many comments received by that date are currently being collated and analysed.

25. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the results of the consultation process for the London assessment studies.

32. Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the results of the consultation process for the London assessment studies.

Mr. Atkins: As soon as possible.

London Underground

20. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the future investment in London Underground.

Mr. Portillo: London Underground Limited plans to invest £1·7 billion over the next three years—more than double the level of investment over the last three years. Its plans include major projects such as the extension of the Jubilee line and the 85 new trains for the Central line. The plans also include a host of more modest investment proposals, all designed to make London's underground system safer, more reliable and less congested.

43. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to increase funding to allow increased capacity in London Underground stations.

Mr. Portillo: The grant to London Regional Transport will rise from £287 million this year to £672 million in 1992-93. This will, among other things, enable London Underground to invest over £200 million over the next three years in increasing the capacity of the most congested stations, including Victoria, Waterloo, King's Cross, Tottenham Court Road, Holborn and Angel. Schemes have been drawn up for 20 stations and more are in preparation.

Transport Planning, London

21. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new proposals the Government are putting forward to achieve better transport planning and co-ordination between the 32 London boroughs and the City of London.

Mr. Atkins: The discussion document, "Traffic in London", published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 14 December 1989, includes proposals for new traffic management guidance for London and a London traffic director, who could ensure the coherent development and operation of a priority "red route" network for London and the co-ordination of a London-wide parking strategy. The responses to public consultation on the proposals are being assessed.

Railway Services (Midlands)

22. Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will discuss proposals for investment in railway passenger services in the midlands.

Mr. Portillo: Whenever my right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of BR, we discuss a wide range of issues.

British Rail

23. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Parkinson: I last met the chairman of British Rail on 13 February when we discussed a number of matters of mutual interest.

29. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next plans to meet the chairman of British Rail, and what matters he plans to discuss.

42. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next plans to meet the chairman of British Rail; and what matters he plans to discuss.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend next plans to meet the chairman of British Rail on 15 March to discuss a variety of matters.

31. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman of British Rail on 13 February when they discussed a variety of railway issues.

51. Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the percentage change in train miles per member of staff of BR since 1983.

Mr. Portillo: Train miles per member of BR staff totalled 2,123 in 1988-89, an increase of 26 per cent. since 1983.

Air Transport Liberalisation

24. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made towards the liberalisation of European air routes.

Mr. McLoughlin: In September 1989 the European Commission published its proposals for a second stage of air transport liberalisation. EC Transport Ministers discussed them formally for the first time in December 1989, reaching agreement in principle on a number of key areas. Discussions are taking place on the detail of the proposals, with a deadline for agreement of 30 June.

35. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the second stage of the air transport liberalisation policy to be adopted.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Council of Ministers has decided that the second stage of liberalisation will be adopted by the end of June this year.

Road Safety

27. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much of the recently announced £5·7 billion additional expenditure on roads has been earmarked for road safety measures; and if he will make a statement.

28. Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much of the recently announced £5·7 billion additional expenditure on roads has been earmarked for road safety measures; and if he will make a statement.

52. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much of the recently announced £5·7 billion expenditure on roads has been earmarked for road safety measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Safety is a central objective and integral part of the trunk road programme. It is not an optional extra whose costs can be separately identified. Details of the contribution of the programme to road safety are contained in section 6 of the report "Trunk Roads, England—Into the 1990s".

Aviation Talks

30. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current position on the aviation bilateral discussions between the United Kingdom and the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: We met in Washington on 11 January. We discussed a variety of topics. Prominent were the prospects for liberalising the United Kingdom-United States aviation market, and arrangements for new United States airline services to regional airports. These discussions are now being carried forward. Indeed, I have spoken to Mr. Skinner in the past week.

Dial-a-Ride, London

33. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the funding figures for London dial-a-ride for 1985-86 and for 1991.

Mr. Portillo: Under the GLC, funding for the London dial-a-ride service in 1985-86 was £4·2 million. In 1990-91 the Government will provide £8·27 million. This is a real increase of 50 per cent., and underlines the Government's commitment to the success of the London dial-a-ride service.

Commuters

34. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to encourage commuters to travel by rail rather than by road.

Mr. Portillo: Each mode of transport should perform the role to which it is best suited as efficiently as possible. Rail offers the best means of moving large numbers of commuters into central London each day. A total of £1·2 billion is to be invested in Network SouthEast over the next three years to improve existing services and to cater for growth in demand. Over the same period, £1·7 billion is to be invested in London Underground to modernise the system, increase capacity and improve quality. The job of the Government is to balance the needs of each mode of transport and enable improvements to be made where they are necessary. It is for the commuter to choose how he or she wishes to travel to work.

Rail Europe

35. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he or his officials last met representatives of Rail Europe; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Portillo: Officials of my Department met proponents of this project last September and are due to do so again later this week.

Immersion Suits

37. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received concerning the carriage of immersion suits as items of essential life-saving equipment on United Kingdom-registered fishing vessels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: No recent representations about the carriage of immersion suits on fishing vessels have been received.

British Rail Property (Trespass)

38. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with the chairman of British Rail incidents of trespass by hunts on British Rail property.

Mr. Portillo: No. These are matters for British Rail and the British Transport police.

Roads Expenditure

39. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will match expenditure upon major trunk routes with that devoted to other roads in order to avoid the transfer of congestion from one to the other.

Mr. Atkins: Local highway authorities are responsible for expenditure on non-trunk roads. In 1990-91 the Government will be assisting with transport supplementary grant of £233 million, nearly 15 per cent. more than for the current year. But traffic growth is twice as fast on national roads as on local roads, and the most pressing problem is congestion on major trunk routes. Planned improvements to trunk roads will also help to relieve pressure on the local road network.

Network SouthEast

40. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss Network SouthEast.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend is next due to meet Sir Robert on 15 March. A variety of topics will be discussed.

53. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail to discuss recent developments on British Rail's Network SouthEast services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend has regular meetings with Sir Robert, at which a variety of matters are discussed.

Traffic Congestion, London

41. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what analysis he, or any other body, has made concerning the factors determining or influencing major incidents of traffic congestion in central London.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 11 December last (Official Report, column 487). The joint Metropolitan police traffic control systems unit working party is expected to report in the summer. It has been asked to consider whether it will be worth while to collect information about the causes of major incidents of traffic congestion in central London.

London Roads

44. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures his Department is taking to make roads in London more environmentally appropriate.

Mr. Atkins: The recent report, "Trunk Roads, England —Into the 1990s", detailed measures which this Government are taking to enhance the environment of trunk roads, including the allocation of extra resources for landscaping works and planting in urban schemes. A good example on an existing trunk road in London is to be found in my hon. Friend's constituency, where six miles of the A40 Western avenue is being landscaped and improved at a cost of over £640,000.

Another initiative to be launched shortly is the "Eastgate Project", the object of which is to raise funds from City institutions, docklands businesses and others for environmental improvements along the corridor of the A13 trunk road in Tower Hamlets. This largely privately funded project is designed to complement the borough council's own scheme of terrace refurbishments as well as the programme of road improvements to the A13 itself.

Road Construction

45. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many road schemes are included in his expanded road construction programme for the next three years.

Mr. Atkins: The national roads programme, announced recently in "Trunk Roads, England—Into the 1990s," includes 45 schemes under construction and over 500 in preparation.

54. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of motorway have had their construction started since 1981; and how many miles have been started since.

Mr. Atkins: A total of 235 miles of new or widened motorway have been completed since April 1981. Seventy-one miles are currently under construction.

A303

46. Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what year he intends to have the whole of the A303 road from London to Exeter dual carriageway.

Mr. Atkins: Most of the route will have been improved to dual carriageway standard by the end of the decade. Further improvement schemes may be identified by the study into the needs of the A30/A303 route which was announced in May 1989.

M1

47. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how long he expects the repairs on the M1 between junctions 8 and 9 to take to complete; when this section of the M1 was last subject to such major repairs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: These works commenced on 5 March and are expected to last eight weeks. This particular section of the M1 was last subject to major repairs in 1974. The works are being carried out under a lane rental contract in order to minimise the period of operation.

Air Congestion

48. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department is taking to relieve air congestion.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Civil Aviation Authority is responsible for the provision of air traffic control services in the United Kingdom. The Government have approved a substantial increase in the authority's investment programme for air traffic control systems; the authority plans to spend some £600 million over the next 10 years. In addition, the authority has increased the recruitment of air traffic controllers from 80 in 1988 to 200 last year; this figure is planned to rise to 240 a year from 1991 onwards.

Internationally, the Government have launched several initiatives to promote harmonisation and progressive integration of European air traffic control systems in order to increase airspace capacity.

Mersey Tunnel

49. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the level of Mersey tunnel tolls; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: None.

Road Casualties

50. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he is making towards reducing road casualties by one third by the year 2000.

Mr. Atkins: A copy of the report "Road Casualty Reduction", which records progress for 1988-89, is in the Library. Improving road safety is one of our top priorities. We are working with local authorities, the police and all others involved to tackle the key problems identified in the road safety review and, above all, to encourage a sensible and responsible attitude among all road users.

Toxic Cargoes (Loss at Sea)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has undertaken on the corrosive effects of seawater on metal containers applicable to the containment life of the container of lindane lost in the English Channel in 1989.

Mr. McLoughlin: The lindane was contained in plastic-lined fibreboard drums which were then stowed in a standard freight container. There is ample information on the errosive effects of seawater on metals. In the case of plastic-lined fibreboard drums and other packaging materials international research under the aegis of the IMO is currently being undertaken and interim results are expected by the end of the year.

Catalytic Converters

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has conducted a cost-benefit analysis of the fitting of catalytic converters to new and existing cars.

Mr. Atkins: New cars could cost 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. more though this will depend on manufacturers' design solutions. For the vast majority of existing cars on the road, fitting a catalyst is not a practicable proposition. Their fuelling systems would not be sufficiently accurate and there would be problems in finding space for the catalyst under the bonnet or floor.

Work to estimate the value of the environmental benefits from catalysts forms part of the Department of the Environment's 1990-91 research programme.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins: The table gives data for the permanent staff in the directorate of statistics in the Department of Transport on 12 March 1990 and current complement. Statistical posts filled by members of the statistician group are shown at the top of the table. Two of the grade 7 statisticians work part time. There are also two members of the group in statistical posts elsewhere in the Department. The directorate also employs casual staff including currently three with statistical qualifications working in statistician group posts.

The current bid for staffing in 1990-91 does not propose any change to the complement given in the table.

Urban Transport Systems (EC)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has regarding revenue subsidies provided for urban transport systems in EEC capital cities.

Mr. Portillo: I have no information of this nature: because different transport operators use different accounting techniques, there is no consistent basis on which to assess what subsidy is being paid and whether it is revenue or other subsidy.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of London Regional Transport to discuss the reliability of the docklands light railway; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The performance of the docklands light railway is a regular topic of discussion between the chairman of LRT, the chairman of the DLR and me.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in respect of the last period for which figures are available how many people on employment training completed their anticipated course.

Mr. Nicholls: To end of September 1989, the latest date for which information is available, 33 per cent. of those who left employment training had completed their planned training. People leave employment training for a variety of reasons. These include entering jobs, self-employment and other training or further education.

Social Charter

Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether it is the Government's intention to provide an annual report on the implementation of the social charter.

Mr. Eggar: No. The United Kingdom Government were unable to support the proposal for a charter of fundamental social rights of workers at the European Council meeting in December 1989 in Strasbourg, and there is therefore no requirement for the Government to provide reports on the application of the charter in the United Kingdom.

Wages Councils

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to abolish the wages councils.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on 6 March, Official Report, column 543.

Action Credit

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the five national sites being chosen for the launch of action credit as an employment service option for the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Nicholls: Research into the viability of extending action credit to long-term unemployed people is being carried out in five employment service areas—Inner London West; West Kent and East Sussex; Renfrew, Dumbarton and Argyll; Lancashire North; and Coventry and Warwickshire.

Benefit Claimants

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment at each appropriate quarterly date over the most recent three years, what was the flow of new quarterly attender claimants; and at the same dates, what was the stock of new quarterly attender claimants.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 25 October 1989, Official Report, column 500.

The figures for the last two quarters are as follows:

	Figures
October 1989	159,927
January 1990	144,090

Fast Food Industry

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average wage paid to young persons employed in the fast food industry; and what is the average number of hours worked by young persons in that industry.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available.

Government Training Programmes

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the numbers of people on Government training programmes in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) other European Community countries, (c) the United States of America and (d) Japan and on the costs of these programmes.

Mr. Nicholls: Comparable statistics on the numbers of people on training schemes and the cost of such schemes are not available for the countries listed. The Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development has published estimates of public spending on labour market programmes in chapter 3 of the OECD "Employment Outlook," September 1988, and note A of the OECD "Employment Outlook", July 1989.

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what arrangements exist to monitor those working in food-packaging premises for exposure to pesticides.

Mr. Nicholls: The Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986, the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988 and the general requirements of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 apply to exposure to pesticides in the food-packaging industry. Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive are responsible for enforcing this legislation at such premises.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make arrangements for the routine testing of farmers and farm workers for acetinecholine levels where they regularly use pesticides in the course of their work.

Mr. Nicholls: The Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations apply to pesticides including those which contain anticholinesterase compounds.

Under the regulations employers of workers who are exposed to such compounds regularly during the course of their work are required to arrange routine health surveillance where appropriate.

Labour Statistics

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed claimants since 9 October 1989 for each region and for Great Britain as a whole have been (a) issued with warning letters for not actively seeking work, (b) had their claims referred to an adjudication officer for not actively seeking work, (c) had their claims (i) allowed or (ii) disallowed and (d) have been referred to an adjudication officer for refusing suitable employment; and how many of those in (d) have had their benefit disqualified.

Mr. Eggar: The table shows the statistical information for the period 9 October 1989 to 26 January 1990 on questions of "actively seeking employment" and "refusal of employment":

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage, in the latest available year, of the working population of the United Kingdom was self-employed.

Mr. Nicholls: In September 1989, the latest date for which information is available, self-employed people represented 11·4 per cent. of the work force.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar: Expenditure on advertising and promotional material by the Department of Employment from 1979-80 to 1985-86 was as follows:

The information on the Department's publicity budget for 1990-91 will be found in table 6.31 on page 29 of chapter VI of the public expenditure White Paper published in January 1990. Detailed decisions on expenditure by media group have not yet been taken.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the figures for the spending by the Training Agency on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Detailed decisions on expenditure for 1990-91 as requested have not yet been taken.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91;

(2) what was the total expenditure by the Training Agency on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and the budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar: (a) The information requested is given in the table:

Year Actual	Expenditure (£'000)
1979-80	n/a
1980-81	n/a
1981-82	n/a

Figures for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are for DE information division only. Figures for TA are not available.

Figures for 1988-89 and 1989-90 represent total expenditure separately incurred by DE information division and TA information services branch; the two merged in November 1989.

(b) Expenditure levels for 1990-91 are in the process of being set.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Training Agency in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar: The only fees paid to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Training Agency (and in respect of its training functions carried out by its predecessors the Training Commission and the Manpower Services Commission) have been those in respect of the privatisation of the Skills Training Agency (STA). These are:

1988-89	132
1989-90	[1]287

These figures are exclusive of expenses plus VAT. The supply estimate 1990-91 to be published on Budget day will contain estimates for the privatisation of STA and the expenses involved in 1990-91.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the total fees paid out by the Training Agency to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Nicholls: Expenditure by the Training Agency (and its predecessors, the Training Commission, and the Manpower Services Commission) on management consultancy for the years 1984-85 to 1988-89 was as follows:

1984-85	128
1985-86	191
1986-87	403
1988-89	215

The estimated outturn for the current year, that is, 1989-90 is around £28,000. The budget for 1990-91 is £79,000. Information for the periods 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Offshore Working

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on (a) the numbers of people on employment training working offshore on the United Kingdom continental shelf, (b) the percentage of such people offered full-time employment by offshore contractors and (c) the average length of time spent by such people offshore; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available.

Skill Centres

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to ensure that Astra Training Services Limited will provide special facilities for the training of people with disabilities and learning difficulties throughout the 47 skill centres it has recently purchased.

Mr. Eggar: As a provider of Government-sponsored training programmes, Astra Training Services Limited will be required to promote equality of opportunity between all individuals in access to, treatment on and outcome from the training it offers.

Disabled Workers

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether his Department has details of the hours worked by disabled people who, because of their disability, are unable to work full time but do work part time.

Mr. Eggar: I regret that information on the hours worked by registered people with disabilities is not available. The study commissioned by my Department, of all people with disabilities in the labour market, will provide comprehensive information about their numbers and characteristics.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay in publishing his internal reviews on employment services for people with disabilities.

Mr. Eggar: The preparation of the consultative document which will give the results of the review is almost complete. It will be published as soon as account can be taken in it of the results of the survey of people with disabilities in the labour market which my Department has commissioned. We currently anticipate that this will be during the course of June 1990.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to his answers of 30 November 1989, Official Report, columns 381-82, and 14 February, Official Report, column 152, he will make a statement on the publication of his Department's survey of the employment of economically active people with vocational handicaps.

Mr. Eggar: The fieldwork has been completed on the survey of people with disabilities in the labour market which my Department has commissioned. The results are expected to be available shortly.

Sheltered Placements

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the number of places under the sheltered placement scheme will continue to be increased, as stated in chapter 7 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1989-90 to 1991-92"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many new places will be made available under the sheltered placement scheme during the 1990-91 financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Government have confirmed in chapter 6 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93" (Cm 1006), published in January 1990, their commitment to the sheltered placement scheme. In 1990-91 the Government are making available to the sheltered employment programme an additional £4·2 million to the money available in the current financial year.

I have decided to direct the additional funds available for next year towards meeting the costs incurred by sponsors rather than to increase the number of places on the programme.

It is intended to increase the annual grant ceiling per place for voluntary bodies by 6 per cent. to £3,480 and the grant to local authorities by 5 per cent. to £2,730. There will, therefore, be no new SPS places available during 1990-91, but previous patterns of turnover indicate that some 1,000 existing places nationally are likely to become vacant to allow new entrants to join the programme.

The employment service is notifying sponsors of these arrangements.

"Action for Jobs"

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much of the expenditure on "Action for Jobs" printed material in 1988-89 was spent through the Central Office of Information.

Mr. Eggar: All the expenditure on "Action for Jobs" printed material in 1988-89 was spent through the Central Office of Information.

Child Care

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make it his policy to make the provision of child care facilities one of the stringent criteria for an organisation to satisfy before securing approved training organisation status.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 5 March 1990]: No. To make the provision of child care facilities a separate criterion from the existing criteria would not be appropriate. The criteria for approved status for training providers cover general themes, such as equal opportunities, rather than prescribing particular actions to implement them.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Emergencies

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will identify the costs to his Department in 1989-90 to date allocated for 1990-91 of (a) maintaining the civil emergencies secretariat, (b) the employment of a civil emergency adviser and associated costs, (c) commissioned work by outside bodies relating to civil emergency planning and (d) other expenditure relating to civil emergency planning.

Mr. John Patten: The costs are as follows:

	1989-90 £	1990-91 £
Civil Emergencies Adviser and Secretariat	60,000	107,000
Travel and subsistence for Adviser and Secretariat	[1]3,500	16,500
Emergency Planning College Civil Emergencies Tutorial Group[2]	38,000	159,000

[2] Includes travel and subsistence.

No costs have been incurred for work undertaken by outside bodies. Other expenditure relating to civil emergency planning is incurred by the police staff college and the fire service college and other Home Office departments, but figures could not be broken down without disproportionate cost.

Civil Emergency Adviser (Meetings)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the itinerary of conferences and meetings with outside bodies which his Department's civil emergency adviser has attended, or agreed to attend, in 1990;

(2) if he will make it his policy to send his Department's civil emergency adviser, Mr. David Brook, to the conference for local authorities on disaster planning for the 1990s to be held on 15 March.

Mr. John Patten: The functions of the civil emergencies adviser were set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on 15 June 1989 at columns 514-15; it is for Mr. Brook as civil emergencies adviser to determine how best to fulfil that remit.

Housing, Greater Manchester

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many houses are in the ownership of his Department in each district in Greater Manchester; and what percentage of these are empty.

Mr. Waddington: The information is as follows:

District	Number of houses	Percentage empty
Bolton	—	—
Bury	—	—
Manchester	49	18
Oldham	—	—
Rochdale	4	0
Salford	—	—
Stockport	—	—
Tameside	—	—
Trafford	—	—
Wigan	27	89

Twenty-one surplus empty houses in Wigan and four in Manchester will shortly be placed on the open market for sale.

Arson

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in regard to the investigations into the arson campaign in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable of North Wales police that a special squad was set up at Bangor in March 1988 to investigate these offences. Effective liaison has been established between all the forces concerned and police inquiries are continuing as a matter of priority.

Pop Concerts

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications have been made to local authorities during each of the past five years for which records are available for licences to hold pop concerts; and how many and what percentage have been refused.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Crowd Safety

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with what agencies he is, or his officials are, in consultation concerning what further guidance should be issued to local authorities about crowd safety at public musical entertainments; when such consultations will be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office is consulting the Health and Safety Executive, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of District Councils about this issue. The recent announcement from the Health and Safety Commission explained that work has been commissioned to produce new guidance on safety at pop concerts, but it is too early to predict when this will be available, bearing in mind the many factors involved.

Non-English Speaking Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department on informing inmates in prisons in England and Wales who do not speak or understand English as to the rules existing in prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: All prisoners, when they are first received into prisons, are provided with an information booklet which they are allowed to keep in their possession during their sentence. There are versions of this booklet in English and 12 other languages.

If a prisoner cannot for any reason understand this written information, the governor will arrange for an oral explanation using interpreting facilities where necessary.

Incitement to Murder

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any plans to strengthen present legislation on incitement to murder; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many prosecutions have taken place in the last 12 months for incitement to murder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 15 February 1990]: We have no present plans to change the law on incitement to murder, but we keep it under review.

In 1988 there were 30 prosecutions under section 4 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and section 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977: together, these provisions make it an offence to solicit or propose to another to commit murder or to conspire to do so. Figures are not kept separately for each provision. There were also 1,030 prosecutions under section 16 of the 1861 Act, which makes it an offence to make threats to kill with intention that the recipient of those threats should fear that they will be carried out. Information for 1989 will not be available until autumn 1990.

Security Service Tribunal

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been received by the Security Service Tribunal since 18 December 1989; and how many have been rejected because they referred to events prior to that date.

Mr. Waddington: The Security Service Tribunal operates independently under the provisions of the Security Service Act 1989. I do not propose to make available details of its work. It will be for the Security Service Commissioner to decide in consultation with the tribunal what information might be included about the tribunal in his annual report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Electricity Tariffs

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about electricity tariffs in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have decided to end the tariff subsidy arrangement whereby electricity tariffs in Northern Ireland are linked to the highest in England and Wales. This decision, which will have effect from 1 April, follows a detailed review of existing tariff policy. The review concluded that, on the basis of oil price projections, the tariff link arrangements are no longer appropriate. The review recommended that NIE should, therefore, return to setting its tariffs on the basis of its own costs rather than by reference to the tariffs of area boards in England and Wales. It is clear, moreover, that the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales and the decision to privatise NIE also have made the link less appropriate.

For the future, NIE's tariffs will have to be based on the economic price of producing and delivering electricity in Northern Ireland. In the year beginning 1 April 1990, a tariff increase of around 8 per cent. on average would, in the Government's view, be consistent with that objective.

I expect to receive within the next week or so NIE's detailed proposals for the different categories of consumer. When agreement is reached on these, NIE will make a full announcement.

Civil Service

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the Government establishments in (a) the Coleraine council area, (b) the Magherafelt council area, (c) the Larne council area, (d) the Carrickfergus council area and (e) the Strabane council area, in which civil servants are employed at present, five years and 10 years ago, together with his projections for the next three years of the number of such employees in each establishment;

(2) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the Government establishments in the (a) Omagh council area, (b) Moyle council area, (c) Ballymoney council area, (d) Fermanagh council area and (e) Craigavon council area, in which civil servants are employed at present, five years and 10 years ago, together with his projections for the next three years of the number of such employees in each establishment;

(5) if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the Government establishments in (a) the Londonerry council area, (b) the Newtonabbey council area, (c) the Cookstown district council area, (d) the North Down district council area, (e) the Limavady council area and (f) the Newry and Mourne council area in which civil servants are employed at present, five years and 10 years ago, together with his projections for the next three years of the number of such employees in each establishment at each period.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 27 February 1990]: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. However, the table lists the total number of Northern Ireland civil servants employed in each district council area in Northern Ireland at present and five years ago. Given the extent of change, firm projections of numbers in district council areas cannot be provided for the next three years.

ENERGY

Severn Barrage

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the Government's position, from energy, environmental and financial aspects, on the Severn tidal barrage.

Mr. Wakeham: A Severn tidal barrage is by far the largest single renewable energy project which could be built in the United Kingdom. Its average annual output would be some 17 Twh, which constitutes 7 per cent. of present electrical energy consumption in England and Wales. Before a Severn tidal barrage could go ahead, a full environmental impact assessment would need to be completed.

Over the next two years some further work on the Severn barrage will be undertaken. This will include some site specific environmental work and a study of the financing issues for a barrage. The Department is presently funding generic tidal R and D in support of site specific work on the Severn, Mersey and other estuaries. The total cost of generic environmental studies completed since 1986 and currently under way amounts to £1 million.

British Gas

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the organisations which advised his Department on any aspect of the privatisation of British Gas giving in each case the dates of their involvement and in each case the aspect on which they advised.

Mr. Wakeham: The lead organisations and the role they played during privatisation of British Gas plc are listed in the table. The dates of their involvement are not readily available.

WALES

Flooding

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has anything to add to his announcement on 1 March about Government help for the victims of the recent flooding in the area of Towyn.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. I am pleased to say that the Government have decided to increase the donation to £150,000. As I made clear on 1 March, parliamentary approval for this expenditure will be sought by means of a summer supplementary estimate. Pending this approval, the contribution will be met by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

Cancers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the information available to him on trends during the past six years in the incidence of leukaemia, lung cancer, colon cancer and stomach cancer (a) in Wales generally and (b) in each district in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The most recently available information on the incidence rates for these illnesses is presented in the Welsh Office publication "Cancer Registration in Wales, 1974-84"; a copy of which is in the Library.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will respond to the Welsh Affairs Committee report "The Channel Tunnel: Implications for Wales" published on 21 June 1989.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to the reply, 22 February 1990, c. 861.]: I am pleased to announce that the response has been published today.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Bluecoat School, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he now expects to make a decision on the application by Bluecoat school, Liverpool 15, to increase its entry from three forms to four forms.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend still has the matter under active consideration and will come to a decision as quickly as is compatible with a full and careful consideration of all the issues involved.

Capital Allocation, Buckinghamshire

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be able to provide Buckinghamshire county council with a detailed breakdown of the capital allocation for Buckinghamshire for 1989-90 and 1990-91, showing the amounts attributed to each project as agreed at his meeting with the chairman of Buckinghamshire county council on 5 February.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I shall be writing to the chairman of Buckinghamshire county council shortly about allocations made to Buckinghamshire LEA. I shall send a copy to my hon. Friend.

Fun Eating at School Today

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local education authorities in the seven counties of south-west England have joined in FEAST—fun eating at school today.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested is as follows:

Avon	Gloucestershire
Cornwall	Somerset
Devon	Wiltshire

Local Management (Ealing)

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he plans to respond to the proposals from the London borough of Ealing for local management of schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: The scheme for local management of schools submitted by the London borough of Ealing was approved by my right hon. Friend, with certain modifications, on 1 March.

University of Wales

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what, over the last five years for which figures are available, have been the proportions of University Grants Committee-Universities Funding Council grants to universities in the United Kingdom allocated to the university of Wales.

Mr. Jackson [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1990, c. 396]: Total University Grants Committee-Universities Funding Council grants received by the university of Wales were as follows:

Academic year	Wales (£ million)	All Great Britain (£ million)	Wales as a percentage of total
1984-85	76·45	1,258·0	6.08
1985-86	76.57	1,312·0	5·84
1986-87	80·61	1,367·0	5·90
1987-88	91·99	1,482·3	6·21
1988-89	93·07	1,619·6	5·75

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gibraltar

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any proposals to give Gibraltar total independence.

Mr. Maude: No.

UNESCO

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the decision on whether to rejoin UNESCO.

Mr. Maude: We are currently looking at the question of United Kingdom membership of UNESCO. As part of the process we have consulted a large number of bodies with an interest in UNESCO activities. We are now assessing their replies. Before reaching a final decision we will also take account of the forthcoming report by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Chad

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chadian Government concerning human rights in Chad.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have not yet made any representation to the Chadian Government on human rights abuses. The Amnesty International report of 7 March has just been received and will be given careful consideration.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the implications of the decision of the Soviet Union to move its nuclear warhead-testing site to Novaya Zemlya for Her Majesty's Government's policy on a verifiable nuclear test ban.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the United Kingdom to sign the third United Nations conference on the law of the sea treaty; and what reasons the Government have for delaying their signature.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom has not signed the United Nations law of the sea convention because the deep sea bed mining regime for which it provides is unacceptable to us. Nevertheless, we participate in the preparatory commission in the hope that within the long period before mining can start a regime acceptable to all can be achieved. We see many of the other parts of UNLOSC as valuable and as reflecting current state practice.

Namibia

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Britain's help with military training for Namibia.

Mr. Waldegrave: In response to a request from the president-elect, we sent a fact-finding team to Namibia in January to assess the requirements for establishing and training an army after independence. I am glad to tell the House that, following discussions with the future Government of Namibia, we have agreed to help with military training for the new Namibian defence force under the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme. We shall be assisting in the establishment of a Defence Ministry and the creation of a Namibian defence force able to carry out the tasks placed on it and sustainable in resource terms. The advance party of our military training team arrived in Namibia today, 13 March, and will start work immediately. The main body of the training team is due to arrive shortly after independence. I believe that this assistance and other help, which we as friends of Namibia are providing, are important in helping Namibia to establish itself successfully as an independent country and as the newest member of the Commonwealth.

TRANSPORT

Railway Inspectorate

86. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received calling for the railway inspectorate to become the responsibility of the Health and Safety Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I am aware of only two representations since the beginning of this year, one in favour and one against such a move.

As my right hon. Friend said in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 27 February, Official Report, column 143, the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission has agreed to discussions on the possible transfer of the railway inspectorate to the Health and Safety Executive.

Jubilee Line

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how much British Gas is expected to contribute to the cost of constructing the Jubilee line extension;

(2) how much British Urban Developments plc is expected to contribute to the construction of the Jubilee line extension.

Mr. Portillo: Agreement has been reached with British Gas on behalf of its joint development on the Greenwich peninsula. It will contribute towards the cost of the Jubilee line extension cash and benefits in kind that have been evaluated by the Department and its advisers as having a present value of more than £25 million in September 1989 prices.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much the construction of the Jubilee line extension is expected to cost if built at current Underground gauge; and how much it would cost if built to BR gauge.

Mr. Portillo: The cost of building the Jubilee line extension via Greenwich is estimated at about £1,030 million at September 1989 prices. This assumes the building and equipment of the extension to current LUL gauge and specifications. No estimate has been made of the additional costs if the extension were built to BR gauge and specifications, but they would certainly be considerably greater.

Debris on Railway Land

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will discuss with the chairman of British Rail at their next meeting the amount of debris on railway land to the west of the M1/A406 junction.

Mr. Portillo: The condition of railway land is a matter for the British Railways Board, so I would recommend my hon. Friend to pursue the matter directly with the chairman, who, I am sure, will wish to investigate the complaint.

Railway Staff (Fatalities)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by region and by year for the last 10 years the number of railway staff who have been killed during their work.

Mr. Portillo: The following details, which cover all railways, are for the period 1979-88; figures for 1989 are not available. I am unable to provide a regional breakdown for the years before 1984.

Vehicle Insurance

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the number of vehicles being driven without third party insurance cover.

Mr. Atkins: In 1988, the most recent year for which figures are available, there were 208,568 findings of guilt by magistrates courts in England and Wales for using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks. I am not aware of any reliable estimate of the number of vehicles actually being used without insurance.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the present number of heavy goods vehicles taxed at the 38-tonne limit; and what was the number of such vehicles registered in the past five years.

Mr. Atkins: The number of heavy goods vehicles licensed at the maximum gross vehicle weight was 58,094 as at the end of December 1989. Figures for the previous five years are as follows:

	Number
1988	50,453
1987	39,928
1986	32,967
1985	26,309
1984	19,071

Crash Barriers

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make the crash barriers along Britain's motorways of sufficient height to eliminate the glare from oncoming cars at night.

Mr. Atkins: The purpose of central reserve safety fences is to mitigate the risks and consequences of errant cars crossing into the opposite carriageway. Their ability to reduce or eliminate glare on most of the motorway network is incidental.

A trial involving the provision of an anti-dazzle screen on top of the safety fence has been carried out on 19 km of the M6 between junctions 2 and 4. The evaluation showed that while it further reduced or eliminated glare there was no significant effect on accidents. Nonetheless, where glare has been or is identified as a serious problem because of the alignment of a particular stretch of motorway, the Department erects such a screen if it is justified on safety and financial grounds.

Railway Tracks (Chemicals)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he plans to take to limit the use of the chemical Atrazine by British Rail on railway tracks.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that the use of herbicides containing Atrazine is an effective way of preventing weed growth on the railway tracks. British Rail regularly review the methods used by other railway organisations and conduct trials with other methods, but has not found any other as effective.

Regional Expenditure

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the regional distribution of spending by his Department over the three most recent financial years.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Two thirds of the Department of Transport's own expenditure on transport is spent on the national roads system; that expenditure can be broken down between the Department's own administrative regions, as shown in table 1·20 of "Transport Statistics Great Britain". Transport supplementary grant, though paid to local authorities rather than regions, can be broken down according to the geographical location of those authorities in DTp regions. Statistics for the three most recent available financial years are shown in the table.

The balance of central Government expenditure, as shown in table 7·1 chapter 7 of the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93" (CM 1007) is neither planned nor controlled on a regional basis, so a comparable breakdown cannot be made.

Regional expenditure on motorway and trunk roads by DTp region

	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million
Northern	24·0	24·5	53·1

Notes:
1. Figures include some estimates.
2. Sum of figures, for England, differ from those voted in the Supply Estimates because of differences in sources.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Department has a current complement, within its information division, of 16 posts for press and public relations, with no vacancies. The proposed complement for 1990-91 is 16.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The total expenditure on the Department's press and public relations office since 1984-85 is as follows:

1984-85	339,426
1985-86	354,393
1986-87	363,446
1987-88	389,473

[1]1989-90	451,214
[2]1990-91	480,000

[2] budget

These figures cover the overall costs of running the press office, calculated using HM Treasury simplified ready reckoner for staff and other costs. Before 1984-85 the information division was a common service of the Departments of Transport and of the Environment and the Property Services Agency.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

The sums involved are as follows:

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The spending by my Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year is as follows:

	Television £'000s	Radio £'000s	Newspaper £'000s	Other £'000s
1979-80	4,141	62	105	1,532

1989-90	1,930	113	332	3,189

Detailed decisions have not yet been taken on expenditure by media for 1990-91, but the overall figure is expected to be £6·6 million.

A2

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the likely timetable for implementation of the proposal to dual the A2 road between Lydden and Dover.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: It is too early to forecast the timing of construction of the A2 Lydden (B2060)-Dover improvement scheme which has only just entered the national trunk road programme. Detailed programmes have not yet been prepared. Meanwhile the roads report, "Trunk Roads, England—Into The 1990s", shows "Preferred Route" as the next key preparation stage, with a target date of 1993. This would be followed by detailed design work, leading to publication of formal draft order proposals under the Highways Act.

The first step will be the appointment of design agents to work up options.

M1

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 1 March, Official Report, columns 279-80, what are the peak hours on the M1 between junctions 6 and 12.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Peak hours are 0700 to 1000 southbound and 1630 to 1900 hours northbound on most weekdays, Friday afternoons in both directions and Sunday evenings southbound.

Palmer Report

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the leaflet explaining the role of the traffic commissioners and the traffic area offices promised following the Palmer report will be available; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Palmer report recommended that the Bus and Coach Council should be asked to draw up a code of practice on complaints from passengers, covering in particular the provision of suitable notices notifying passengers where complaints should be addressed. The Bus and Coach Council has agreed to undertake this task, in association with my Department, and work is due to begin on it shortly. I will place a copy of the code of practice in the Library when it is ready.

Kleinwort Benson

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions and for what purpose his Department has commissioned work from Kleinwort Benson since July 1988.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: None.

Badgers

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration is given to resident badger populations when (a) designing and (b) constructing new roads.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: We aim, where possible, to design trunk roads to avoid interfering with badgers. Where setts or runs may be affected, advice is obtained from the Nature Conservancy Council and local wildlife trusts about steps to be taken to move the badgers or maintain their runs. Badger-proof fencing alongside the road and badger tunnels under the carriageway are provided where appropriate. There are examples on the M3, M25 and M40.

Badgers in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are the responsibility of the respective Secretary of State.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners (Incomes)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures of average mean household income in Britain for retired people; what are the latest comparable figures for each European Community state; and whether he will launch a survey to calculate costs facing pensioners as against those in full employment.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Analysis of data in the 1987 family expenditure survey shows that the average pensioners' total net income in 1987 was £99·90 a week[1]. There are no comparable figures available for other European Community states. We do not see a need for a survey along the lines proposed.

Footnote: Family Expenditure Survey.
[1]This refers to pensioner tax units.

Pensions

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the cost of paying full retirement pension regardless of contribution record to persons who were excepted from liability to pay non-employed contributions to the original national insurance scheme;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of men and women who are excepted from liability to pay non-employed contributions to the national insurance scheme from 1948, who, as a result of this are now receiving a reduced retirement pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Child Benefit

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the rate of child benefit at the present time if it had been uprated with inflation since 1987.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The rate would be £8.

Unclaimed Benefit

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the amount saved by his Department in respect of unclaimed benefit in the last financial year.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 7 December 1989 at column 342. Information is available only for income-related benefits.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the advantages that will accrue to people with disabilities in 1992 on completion of the single market in relation to any benefits, goods or services they receive in respect of their disabilities; if he will list them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The United Kingdom is currently included in the European Communities' second action programme in favour of disabled people called HELIOS. A major component is the development of "Handynet", a multilingual, multinational computerised database of information for people with disabilities. The first module "Handyaids" is expected to have beneficial effects by stimulating consumption production and competition. This should give rise to economies of scale, leading to a reduction in the price of products and improving their quality.

As for social security, the completion of the internal market will not in itself have any effect on the situation of people with disabilities in the United Kingdom.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are in receipt of invalidity benefit; and how many of those are also in receipt of income support.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: At April 1988, the latest date for which information is available, there were 1,047,500 people in receipt of invalidity benefit. Information for income support is not available for precisely the same period, but in May 1988 there were 101,705 people in receipt of both benefits.

Disability Allowance

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that, following the introduction of the disability allowance, children under two years with attendance needs will qualify for attendance allowance after a three-month waiting period.

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Family Credit

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the uptake of family credit in (a) the Liverpool area and (b) other areas in the north-west.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available information about the families receiving family credit who, at the time their award was made, were living in the areas concerned is as follows:

(a) In the areas covered by the local social security offices in Liverpool—5,600;
(b) In the areas covered by all the local social security offices in the Department of Social Security's North Western Region—56,000.

Information about the total number of families eligible for family credit can be obtained only for Great Britain, and only retrospectively, from the family expenditure survey data.

National Insurance

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of national insurance contributors are currently benefiting from the existence of the ceiling on contributions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is estimated that approximately 16 per cent. of contributors have earnings in excess of the upper earnings limit for class 1 primary national insurance contributions.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many employers have been tried and found guilty of fraud in respect of national insurance contributions over the last 10 years; and what was the sentence in each case.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 8 March 1990]: In the last five years, the number of employers against whom either civil or criminal proceedings have been taken by DSS in respect of non-payment of national insurance contributions is as follows:

Year	Number of cases
1984-85	2,896
1985-86	1,272
1986-87	1,523
1987-88	1,264
1988-89	1,528

Information for earlier years is not available. It is not possible to identify the number of these cases involving fraud.

PRIME MINISTER

Conservation

Q24. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received relating to Government action to conserve biodiversity.

The Prime Minister: I receive many representations on a wide range of subjects concerned with the environment. These include the need to conserve biodiversity, particularly in tropical forests. The further £100 million which we have allocated over the next three years to tropical forestry activities will contribute to the maintenance of biological diversity. In my speech to the United Nations General Assembly last November I indicated my support for a global convention on the environment which would help to conserve biodiversity.

Demersal Fisheries

Q135. Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have received regarding proposals to reduce fishing effort in the North sea demersal fisheries from 1 March 1990.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland have consulted representatives of the fishing industry about the measures necessary to reduce fishing for North sea haddock in 1990 by 30 per cent. and they have taken careful account of the representations that they have received. The decision on the necessary measures was announced on 8 March at column 855.

Exchange Rate Mechanism

Q182. Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister what progress is being made towards fulfilling the Government's conditions for joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: There has been significant progress on capital liberalisation, in competition policy and liberalisation of financial services, but further important decisions have yet to be taken. Further progress is needed to get inflation down.

London Assessment Studies

Q218. Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister what has been the number of letters sent to her by London residents (a) supporting and (b) opposing the London assessment studies; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received several letters from residents of various parts of London. I have passed them on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who will consider them alongside the other comments he has received.

Polish Borders

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister what is her policy on the use of Her Majesty's Government's armed services to guarantee the existing borders of Poland.

The Prime Minister: We have no such policy. We are committed to fulfil Britain's collective defence obligations arising from the North Atlantic and modified Brussels treaties within the areas covered by these treaties. We are also committed to the principles set out in the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, including the inviolability of frontiers. The question of Poland's borders needs to be finally settled by a binding treaty instrument. We welcome the Federal German Government's intention to reaffirm the inviolability of Poland's borders.

South Africa

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations she has received from British investors in South Africa supporting the lifting of sanctions.

The Prime Minister: A number.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received any communications from President de Klerk following the release of Nelson Mandela.

The Prime Minister: We are in frequent contact with the South African Government at all levels on a wide range of issues, both here and through Her Majesty's ambassador.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if she will seek to persuade the South African Government to allow the free flow of funds from outside South Africa to the United Democratic Front.

The Prime Minister: I understand that there are no impediments to the flow of funds from outside South Africa to the United Democratic Front.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what methods it is her policy to use to facilitate the abolition of apartheid in South Africa; and if she will make a further statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on 7 March at column 692.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what representations the Government has made to South Africa about its activities in Mozambique; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The South African Government have publicly declared that neither they nor the South African defence force are providing support for Renamo and that South Africa is committed to a policy of non-interference in the internal affairs of other states. The South African Government are in no doubt of our views about the territorial integrity of neighbouring states.

Engagements

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 March.

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an Audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

SCOTLAND

Loch Lomond

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to confer on the Loch Lomond area the status of a national park.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There no such plans at present. The designation of the area as a regional park was confirmed by the Secretary of State in April 1988 and it would therefore be appropriate to allow this new arrangement to be developed.

The Government will however carefully consider any proposals from the Countryside Commission for Scotland following its review of the management of popular mountain areas.

Community Charge

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of people in Scotland who have had their property confiscated as a result of not paying the community charge.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information as to the number of poindings and warrant sales undertaken in respect of community charge arrears is not held centrally.

Student Finance

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many students will be grant or loan funded by the Scottish Office in 1990-91 as against 1989-90.

Mr. Lang: For session 1990-91, the estimated number of students who will be assisted by the Scottish Education Department is 66,000. The latest available figure for session 1989-90 is 66,024. The number of eligible students who will take advantage of the loans facility in session 1990-91 is estimated at 52,600.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the expenditure by the Scottish Office in 1990-91 (a) on student grants and (b) on student loans.

Mr. Lang: The information is as follows:
(a) £163·6 million
(b) £15·7 million

Self-governing Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been allocated in the Scottish Office budget for 1990-91 to meet the cost of balloting parents and preparing proposals for self-governing status in schools, and for transitional and special purpose grants to any schools which become self-governing in 1990-91.

Mr. Lang: Forecast expenditure of £300,000 has been included in financial plans for 1990-91. Actual provision will be published in the supply estimates for 1990-91 to be laid before the House shortly.

Assisted Places

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the cost of the assisted places scheme in 1990-91; and what it was in 1989-90.

Mr. Lang: The estimated cost of the scheme in the current school year is £6·8 million. Planned expenditure in the 1990-91 school year is £7·8 million.

Red Deer Commission

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning the funding of the Red Deer Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The report of the Agriculture Committee on land use and forestry recommended that the commission should be given the powers and resources necessary to achieve a programmed reduction in the open hill population of red deer. The Government's response to the Committee's report is currently being considered.

My right hon. and learned Friend has also recently received the Red Deer Commission's annual report for 1988, which comments on the resources available to the commission. The annual budget for the commission's work is determined within the normal public expenditure procedures.

Heart Disease

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received the report of the management consultants who were appointed to review health education in Scotland; and if he will make a statement on the position of coronary heart disease prevention in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Touche Ross Management Consultants submitted their report on health education in Scotland on 21 December. A copy of their report has been placed in the Library.

The consultants have produced a comprehensive study and detailed recommendations which will require careful consideration. In the light of their proposals, the Government intend to take the following steps:

A national policy statement on health education in Scotland with a positive orientation towards health promotion will be prepared and, following consultation, will be widely disseminated;

The statement will provide guidance on approaches to health education appropriate to Scottish needs and circumstances; and it will provide guidance on the relationship between a general positive life styles approach and more specifically targeted approaches;

Powers will be sought in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill, enabling a new national health education organisation to be established. It is envisaged that the new organisation, which will replace the Scottish Health Education Group, will come into operation on 1 April 1991;

The new health education organisation will operate within the framework of the national policy statement and on the basis of policy guidance from the Scottish Home and Health Department;

The organisation will take steps to improve the publication and supply of health education material to health boards and other interested groups;

Health boards will be required to develop a strategy for health education within guidelines set by the national policy statement;

Liaison between the national organisation and health boards will be improved by the establishment of a formal liaison group;

The national organisation will commission research to establish the cost-effectiveness of health education/promotion programmes.

The Scottish Health Education Group will continue its activities in the meantime and provide the main staffing and expertise of the new organisation.

A study on coronary heart disease in Scotland undertaken by a working group of the Scottish Health Service Planning Council on Prevention and Health Promotion has also been completed and a copy of the group's report has been placed in the Library.

The group has confirmed the serious incidence of coronary heart disease in Scotland and advised that the general positive life styles approach, already adopted in Scotland, is the most effective means of preventing coronary heart disease. It recommends, however, that this general approach should be presented more aggressively than at present and should be reinforced by an approach which targets health education at individuals most at risk, principally through the primary care sector.

The prevention of coronary heart disease will be one of the specific subjects that will be addressed in the Government's national policy statement and in the remit given to the new health education body. The details of the proposed individual approach will be carefully examined and taken into account in the continuing development of our approach to coronary heart disease prevention.

The Government acknowledge the capable work of Touche Ross Management Consultants and the Scottish Health Service Planning Council Working Group on Prevention and Health Promotion and believe that the strategy outlined in this answer, which is based on their conclusions, will enable health education generally, and coronary heart disease in particular, to be tackled more effectively in Scotland.

City Technology Academies

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was or is planned to be spent on city technology academies in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 12 March 1990]: There was no expenditure on technology academies in 1988-89. In the current financial year, following the appointment of a project director in March 1989, around £100,000 has so far been spent, on salary costs, professional fees for site assessments and so on, and travel and office costs. Planned expenditure for 1990-91 is £3·3 million.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Negligence

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what circumstances the Treasury indemnifies private undertakings for their negligence; and if he will list the undertakings so protected.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As a general rule the Government do not indemnify private undertakings for their negligence.

However, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales have, with the agreement of the Treasury, issued to certain water undertakers (i) statutory indemnities under section 172 of the Water Act 1989 and (ii) non-statutory indemnities in accordance with minutes laid before Parliament on 23 November 1989. These indemnities cover liabilities incurred by the water undertakers concerned in connection with the addition of fluoride to the water they supply. The indemnities specifically exclude any liabilities, costs, expenses or expenditure incurred in respect of any criminal proceedings.

European Investment Bank

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what interest rate and for what amount the loan was given by the European Investment Bank in respect of the Channel tunnel; and when it will be fully paid back.

Mr. Ryder: The European Investment Bank approved a loan of £1 billion in 1987 in respect of the Channel tunnel. The loan will primarily be at fixed interest rates and for a range of maturities of up to 25 years. The terms will reflect prevailing market conditions. Because the loan will be drawn down through a series of finance contracts phased over seven years, and not all the loan has been drawn yet, it is impossible to say at this stage when the loan will be fully paid back.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have underwritten or offered guarantees on the European Investment Bank's loans to the Channel tunnel promoters.

Mr. Ryder: No.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will name the United Kingdom representative directors on the European Investment Bank board and the number of meetings each has attended in each of the years they have been directors.

Mr. Ryder: The United Kingdom has three full-time representative directors on the European Investment Bank board—Mr. H. P. Evans from Her Majesty's Treasury, Miss E. Llewellyn-Smith from the Department of Trade and Industry and Mr. A. J. O. Ritchie from the Union Discount Co. plc. The number of meetings each has attended in each of the years they have been directors is:

	Years	Attendance
Mr. H. P. Evans	1989	2 meetings
Appointed in October 1989	1990	1 meeting
Miss E. Llewellyn-Smith	1987	4 meetings

	Years	Attendance
Appointed in May 1987	1988	9 meetings
	1989	8 meetings
	1990	2 meetings
Mr. A. J. Ritchie	1986	1 meeting
Appointed October 1986	1987	7 meetings
	1988	9 meetings
	1989	7 meetings
	1990	2 meetings

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what loans or guarantees were given to United Kingdom projects by the European Investment Bank since 1979, with the amount in each case.

Mr. Ryder: The total amount of loans given by the European Investment Bank to United Kingdom projects in each year since 1979 is as follows:

	£ million
1979	553·3
1980	417·3
1981	139·5
1982	273·8
1983	410·7
1984	547·0
1985	660·1
1986	873·8
1987	801·3
1988	790·2
1989	1,084·3

The European Investment Bank only rarely guarantees loans within the Community. As a general rule the guarantees on the bank's loans are provided by member states' Governments, public authorities or first-class financial institutions.

Corporation Tax

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will express the current level of corporation tax in the United Kingdom as a percentage of gross domestic product and provide comparable figures for other European Community countries and the United States of America.

Mr. Lilley: On the first part of the question I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 1 March 1990, Official Report, column 265. The most recent comparable figures for European Community countries and the United States of America are given in table 12 of "Revenue Statistics of OECD Member Countries 1964-1988" which is available in the Library.

Employee Share Ownership

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies have taken up the employee share ownership plan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 6 March 1990, Official Report, column 593.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the increase in the yield of stamp duty from house purchase by regions and valuation districts for the last five years; and if he will tabulate this against property value averages and stamp duty thresholds.

Mr. Lilley: The table gives the estimated yield from stamp duty on residential property, broken down by regions, for each of the years 1985-86 to 1988-89. The estimates for Scotland and Northern Ireland are very tentative since the available information does not distinguish receipts from residential property in those regions. Estimates of stamp duty on residential property broken down by valuation districts are not available.

The table also sets out average regional house prices for the same years, at mortgage completion stage. This information is derived from "Housing Finance" published by the Council of Mortgage Lenders.

The latest estimate of stamp duty receipts in 1989-90 attributable to residential property was given in the reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 7 February 1990, Official Report, column 643. A regional breakdown of this figure and average regional prices for 1989-90 are not yet available.

The stamp duty threshold of £30,000 was set in 1984.

Rented Property

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new lettings have been made available as a result of the introduction of the business expansion scheme in (a) inner London, (b) Greater London, (c) other metropolitan areas and (d) the United Kingdom as a whole, expressed both as a figure and as a percentage of (i) all privately rented property and (ii) all rented property.

Mr. Lilley: Provisional estimates for new lettings from investments under the business expansion scheme in 1988-89 are as follows. Separate figures for inner and Greater London and other metropolitan areas could be provided only at disproportionate costs.

New lettings

	Total	As a percentage of: all privately rented property	all rented property
South East England	2,250	0·4	0·1
United Kingdom	6,500	0·4	0·1

Information for 1989-90 is not yet available.

Budget Statement

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whom it is his practice to consult in the preparation of his Budget statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor consults a number of people and interest groups in preparation for the Budget statement. He also receives a large number of written representations.

Council House Sales

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much additional lending has been injected into the economy since 1979 as a result of council house sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Council house sales increase personal sector borrowing and reduce public sector borrowing. No estimates of the net effect on borrowing are available.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what inflationary impact the sale of council houses has had on the economy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Council house sales have contributed to the improvement in the supply side of the economy and so should help the Government in their objective of reducing inflation.

Inflation

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the current rate of inflation if mortgage interest payments were excluded from the calculation of the retail price index.

Mr. Ryder: It would be 6·1 per cent. in the year to January.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which European Community countries (a) include and (b) exclude mortgage interest payments in the assessment of consumer inflation.

Mr. Ryder: Of EC countries, only the United Kingdom and Ireland include mortgage interest payments in their calculation of the consumer price index. Three other countries, Germany, Netherlands and Spain include some other indicator of owner-occupiers' costs. The remaining seven make no such allowance.

Mortgages

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in tabular form, and at constant prices the amounts which would be payable each month (a) at 15 per cent. and (b) at 9·8 per cent., on a standard repayment mortgage repayable over 25 years, of each of the regional average mortgages listed in his answer of 19 February, Official Report, column 518, to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The monthly interest payments, after deduction of basic rate tax relief, for part (a) are given in the table. For part (b), I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 26 February 1990, Official Report, column 12.

Composite Rate Tax

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will update the answer given to the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) on 13 February 1989, Official Report, column 80, on composite rate tax on investment income;

(2) if he will update the answer on interest taxation given to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 10 January 1989, Official Report, column 630;

(3) if he will update the answer on taxation given to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) on 13 February 1989, Official Report, column 84.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The latest information is as follows. Estimates for 1986-87 are now final.

There were some 64 million accounts subject to composite rate and which earned over £1 interest in 1986-87, some of which were held by clubs or other non-individuals. Of these accounts, it is estimated that 49 million were held by investors whose composite rate interest would be wholly liable to tax in the absence of composite rate system, and 13 million by investors none of whose composite rate interest would be liable. The balance of about 2 million accounts was held by investors part of whose interest would be liable to tax if there were no composite rate system.

In 1988-89, the latest year for which information is available, about £450 million of the composite rate tax accounted for by building societies, banks and other deposit takers was due in respect of interest that would not have been liable to tax in the hands of its recipients in the absence of a composite rate scheme, and about £3,050 million was due in respect of interest that would have been liable to tax.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will give figures to show the tax revenue written off in respect of the business expansion scheme for (a) nursing homes and clinics and (b) hospitals opened for each year since 1983;

(2) if he will give the total number of schemes involving (a) nursing homes and clinics and (b) hospitals which have taken advantage of the business expansion scheme; and if he will give the total bed numbers involved in each scheme.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 March 1990]: I regret that the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Central Office of Information; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Central Office of Information does not have statistical divisions or staff in statistical posts; nor are any proposed for in 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

[2] At the senior levels of the service, where management forms a major component of most jobs, there are service-wide common pay and grading arrangements. These unified grades 1 to 7 are known as the Open structure and cover grades from Permanent Secretary level to Grade 7 level. Within the unified grades there are no formal barriers to movement between the former occupational groups, e.g. scientists, administrators, statisticians; each post should be filled by the person best equipped in terms of skills, ability and experience.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Central Office of Information; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The press office of the Central Office of Information is staffed by one information officer. No increase is proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The number of press and public relations staff employed in Her Majesty's Treasury on 1 February 1990 was 10 and the budgeted provision was 10; the budgeted provision for 1990-91 is 10.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Central Office of Information in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: No fees have been paid by the Central Office of Information in the furtherance of privatisation. However, the Central Office of Information has been involved in the following privatisation publicity campaigns:

Date	Campaign
December 1986	British Gas

The costs of these campaigns have been included in answers provided by the Government Department concerned.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Figures for the Central Office of Information on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 to 1985-86 were given in the answer at columns 240-42 on 25 November 1986. The figures for 1986-87 and subsequent years are now shown on the basis of invoices issued to client departments in the financial year in question. This is a different basis from that used previously. The figures for TV and radio advertising also now include production costs. Privatisations are included. All figures are VAT exclusive.

Detailed decisions on estimated expenditure on advertising through the Central Office of Information on behalf of other Government Departments for 1990-91 are for departmental Ministers.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total fees paid out by the Central Office of Information to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Fees paid by the Central Office of Information to management consultants are as follows:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

South Africa

85. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate how many people's employment in the United Kingdom is dependent upon trade with South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Our estimate is that about 50,000 full-time job equivalents may be involved in the export of goods to South Africa. No information is available on the level of exports of services. This is a broad estimate based on the level of visible trade with that country together with an assumption about the relationship between output and employment.

Business Development

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the take-up in Lancashire of his various programmes of assistance to encourage business development.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The following information details the take-up in Lancashire of current Department of Trade and Industry programmes of assistance. All figures are from the date in brackets to the end of January 1990:

Enterprise Initiative (January 1988): 1,031 business reviews have been carried out. Of these 857 have been referred for consultancy advice, and 333 of these projects have been completed.

Regional Selective Assistance (November 1984): In the Blackburn, Accrington and Rossendale travel-to-work area and the West Lancashire part of the Liverpool travel-to-work area, 248 offers have been made totalling £27,057,463.

Small Firms Merit Award for Research and Technology (SMART) (October 1988): Two offers have been made totalling £74,350.

Company Audits

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce procedures under which his Department will monitor the audit qualification appearing in the accounts of large companies with a view to taking early action to deal with the reasons for such qualifications.

Mr. Redwood: No. My Department will, however, continue to respond to specific complaints about non-compliance with statutory requirements relating to company accounts. In addition, the review panel to be established under the new Financial Reporting Council will consider instances of material departures by large companies from accounting standards.

Insider Dealing

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to increase the resources available for the investigation of insider dealing; and if he proposes any structural changes within his Department to increase its effectiveness in this area.

Mr. Redwood: Inspectors appointed under section 177 of the Financial Services Act 1986 to investigate possible insider dealing offences have normally been from outside my Department. However, members of the companies investigations branches of the Department have been appointed in two recent cases, and my right hon. Friend will continue to make such appointments in appropriate cases. Responsibility within the investigations division of my Department for appointment of and liaison with section 177 inspectors has recently been brought under the inspector of companies. I shall continue to keep the organisation of the work under review with a view to ensuring efficient operation.

The Companies Act 1989 contains provisions enabling the Secretary of State to consent to the bringing of prosecutions, for example by the stock exchange, for insider dealing offences; and also to enable him to investigate on behalf of overseas regulators. These provisions came into force on 21 February.

Stamps

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will discuss with the chairman of the Post Office (a) matters relating to the possible forgery and fraudulent use of the 20p commemorative penny black stamp and (b) the question of the illegal reuse of stamps made possible because of unsatisfactory franking ink; what investigation has been undertaken into possible fraud by such means; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Post Office naturally keeps such issues under constant review. It does not consider stamp forgery to be a major problem or that the penny black anniversary issue is any more vulnerable than other stamps. It believes that the information obtained from a major fraud investigation last year has enabled it to tighten measures to prevent fraud.

Mailing List Brokers

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce statutory regulation of the activities of mailing list brokers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have no plans to do so. Those who own and supply mailing lists which are processed electronically will be subject to the relevant provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984.

The Advertising Association also operates a code of practice on the use of personal data for advertising and direct marketing purposes.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received any representations about the activities of mailing list brokers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have received no specific representations, although my Department receives some letters from members of the public who dislike receiving unsolicited mail from sources with which they have had no previous dealings.

Package Travel

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with his European counterparts with regard to the application of the European directive on package travel to business travel packages; whether agreement has been reached on its application to business trips the elements of which are booked separately; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The common position on the draft package travel directive reached by EC Ministers at the 21 and 22 December Council was formally agreed on 22 February this year. The directive will normally apply to a pre-arranged package for business purposes. However, a statement in the minutes records the agreement of the Council and the Commission that when a business trip involves separate bookings of transport and accommodation which do not constitute elements of a pre-arranged package, this will not constitute a package for the purposes of the directive. This is the position even though they are invoiced simultaneously by the travel agent.

Credit Cards

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in seeking undertakings from credit card companies on restrictions on merchant acquisition and the no-discrimination rule following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on credit card services.

Mr. Redwood: On 22 August 1989 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published the MMC report on credit card services. The MMC made two recommendations applicable to both the Visa and Mastercard organisations:

- the "No Discrimination" rule, under which traders are required to charge the same price for purchases made with credit cards as those paid for by cash or other means, should not apply within the UK;
- certain rules restricting the freedom of issuers of Visa and Mastercard cards to act as merchant acquirers should not apply in the UK.

He announced last year that he had accepted the recommendations and decided then that the Director General of Fair Trading should seek voluntary undertakings from the companies concerned to implement these recommendations.

On 27 November 1989 Visa was granted leave to apply for judicial review of certain aspects of the MMC report, and certain of the subsequent actions of both the Secretary of State and the Director General of Fair Trading. Visa has subsequently confirmed that it is unwilling to enter into voluntary undertakings on merchant acquisition until after the outcome of the judicial review is known.

In view of this and the delays in implementing the recommendations of the MMC which might result, the Secretary of State has decided to ask the Director General of Fair Trading not to proceed with the negotiation of undertakings.

Instead the Secretary of State will begin the process of statutory consultation preliminary to the making of orders under section 56 of the Fair Trading Act. No decision has yet been taken on when these orders should come into force.

The Secretary of State announced in December that credit card companies will have to provide the Director General of Fair Trading with information on their charges to retailers and on interchange fees, and to publish certain information. We are now considering representations made to us before initiating the statutory consultation procedure preliminary to the enactment of an order.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: There are 39 posts in the Department's press office; two are currently vacant. The total includes 15 clerical and support posts. The complement for 1990-91 will be broadly similar.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Separate figures for expenditure on press and public relations before 1987-88 are not readily available. Expenditure in that year and subsequently was:

	£ thousands
1987-88	1,155
1988-89	1,633
[1]1989-90	1,847

[1]estimated.

The figures include regional press officer and other support services. I expect expenditure in 1990-91 to be broadly the same as in the current year.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The answer given in reply to a similar question last year on 13 March 1989, Official Report, columns 102-03, gave actual figures for expenditure on expenses associated with privatisations to 1987-88. The following table, based on published information, shows gross expenditure incurred in connection with the sale of shares in British Steel, British Telecom, Rolls-Royce, and Rover Group plc since then, together with an estimate of expenditure in 1990-91. The figures exclude subscriptions for new shares and injections of funds for restructuring, but include commission and some items (such as stamp duty) which were not paid as fees to outside organisations. The Department also incurred expenses in 1988-89 and 1989-90 under individual contracts for advice to the Department in connection with the sales by the Post Office of Girobank plc and by British Shipbuilders of individual businesses and assets: figures for these are excluded on the grounds of commercial confidentiality.

Estimated costs for residual expenditure associated with the sale of shares in Rolls-Royce, British Steel and British Telecom in 1990-91 are £15,000.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Expenditure from the Department's central publicity budget was as follows:

£ 000[1]

	Television advertising	Radio advertising	Press advertising	Other promotional materials[2]
1979-80	—	5	249	599

1989-90[3]	5,400	500	3,700	4,600

[1] Figures include expenditure through the Central Office of Information and, where appropriate, expenditure by the former Departments of Industry and Trade.
[2] Publications, audio-visual materials and posters.
[3] Estimated.
Media allocations for 1990-91 have not yet been made, but I expect expenditure to be within the present year's total.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the fees paid by the Department of Trade and Industry for general consultancies from 1984-85 to 1988-89 and the latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91 are given in the table. The apparent decrease from 1986-87 indicates a shift of consultancy expenditure from general to programme-related consultancies for which separate consolidated records are not kept. The allocation for 1990-91 will be set shortly in the light of the Department's annual activity and resource management review.

HEALTH

Children (Illegal Employment)

81. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has of the number of illegally employed children in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

82. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the official estimate of the number of children illegally employed in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

83. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any estimate available of children employed illegally; and if he will make a statement.

84. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the number of children illegally employed in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave the hon. Members for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie) and for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 9 March at columns 893-94.

Mental Patients

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will update the information given in the answer to the question from the hon. Member for Dagenham on 21 January 1987, Official Report, columns 614-16.

Mr. Freeman: The figures for 1986 are given in the table and exclude deaths. Figures on duration of stay at discharge are not centrally collected at unit level after 1986.

NHS (Competitive Tendering)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 22 February to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), Official Report, column 874, if he will make a statement on his decision not to promote any further central initiatives for additional specific NHS services to be subject to mandatory competitive tendering.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: NHS accounts show that more than 40 per cent. of support services in the NHS, other than those involved in direct provision of patient care, are already routinely subject to competitive tendering or other forms of regular market testing. The White Paper

"Working for Patients" provides a framework within which health authorities can widen the scope for competition across an even wider range of support services in future to ensure value for money and release of resources for improved patient care. The selection and grouping of services for testing, and the specification of requirements are matters best left to local decision.

Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic Hospital

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many orthopaedic patients from the Crewe and Nantwich constituency are receiving continuing care from the Agnes Hunt orthopaedic hospital;

(2) how many patients received specialist care from the Agnes Hunt orthopaedic hospital in 1989-90; and how many were from outside the Shropshire area.

Mr. Freeman: In the year ending 31 March 1989 there were 5,956 completed patient stays on wards in the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt orthopaedic hospital. Data for 1989-90 are not yet available. Information about the districts of residence of those patients is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of Shropshire health authority, who may be able to provide more detailed information.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what talks he is having with the relevant health authorities in relation to the future of the Agnes Hunt orthopaedic hospital, in order to ensure continuing access to its specialist skills for patients.

Mr. Freeman: None.

Immunisation

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide an up-to-date table of immunisation rates, district by district for each vaccination, completed course by two years; and how many districts still fall below the target set by the European region of the World Health Organisation.

Mr. Freeman: The two-year uptake for diphtheria, tetanus, pertussis, polio and measles in England, for the financial year 1988-89, is given in the table.

Vaccination and Immunisation 2 year uptakes 1988-89

	Number
Diphtheria	87
Tetanus	87
Pertussis	75
Polio	87
Measles	80

A summary of district uptake levels has been placed in the Library. The World Health Organisation's European region target is 90 per cent. by 1990, and our aim is to reach that target in the year 1990-91. In 1988-89 no district had yet reached the target for pertussis, but 20 had done so for measles and 85 for diphtheria.

Medical Errors

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by regional health authority and by year for the last five years, the amounts of money that have been paid in damages for medical errors.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not available in the form requested.

The information held centrally is given in the table which shows compensation payments made by health authorities as recorded in their annual accounts. However, this information does not distinguish between compensation payments in respect of medical accidents and other compensation payments, for example, those in respect of damage to property or for unfair dismissal.

Nurses and Midwives (Training)

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision has been made for the training of nurses and midwives since 1978-79.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 20 February at column 701.

NHS and Community Care Bill

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent so far in Greater Manchester by (i) his Department, (ii) district health authorities and (iii) family practitioner committees to prepare for the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 19 February at column 543.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the arrangements in the Hartlepool health authority area for the detection, monitoring, and follow-up procedures in respect of cervical cancer.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The main strategy for dealing with cervical cancer is through a programme of early detection based on population screening programmes. In Hartlepool, a computerised call and recall system was implemented on schedule to meet the Department's target date of 31 March 1988. I understand that the district is meeting the Department's target for reporting results of cervical smears to the smear-taker within one month. The district recalls women on a three-yearly basis and has implemented a failsafe system to ensure that women with abnormalities are followed up. In addition, the necessary surgical and pathological facilities are in place to facilitate the further investigation and treatment of such women. The Northern region is making good progress on quality assurance in the laboratories.

Health Standards

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the recommendations he has received but not implemented from (a) the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy and (b) the National Advisory Committee on Nutritional Education concerning the improvement of health standards by dietary influence.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1987 the chief medical officer's Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy (COMA) has published five reports, four of which contained recommendations:

"The Use of Very Low Calorie Diets in Obesity"—1987
"Present Day Practice in Infant Feeding—Third Report"—1988
"Third Report of the Sub-committee on Nutritional Surveillance"—1988
"The Diets Of British Schoolchildren"—1989 (no recommendations)
"Dietary Sugars and Human Disease"—1989

All the recommendations to this Department have either been implemented or are in the process of being implemented.

The National Advisory Committee on Nutrition Education (NACNE) has an ad hoc working group which, before its dissolution in 1983 produced a discussion document which did not contain specific recommendations for Government.

Inner City Health Practices

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the impact of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill on inner city health practices.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No representations solely concerning the effects of our proposals on inner city health practices have been identified.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities expect to be in deficit at the end of the current financial year.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. and learned Friend gave the hon. Members for Wigan (Mr. Stott), for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) and for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) on 23 January at columns 670-71.

Abortifacient Drugs

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those abortifacient drugs which are currently licensed for use in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

1. Cervagem Pessary 1 mg.
2. Prostin E2 Sterile Solution 1 mg/ml.
3. Prostin E2 Sterile Solution 10 mg/ml.

7. Sterile Solution Prostin/15 m (0·25 mg/ml).
8. Syntocinon Ampoules 2 I.V. per 2 ml (Parenteral Solution).
9. Syntocinon Ampoules 5 I.V. per 1 ml.
10. Syntocinon Ampoules 10 I.V. per 1 ml (Parenteral Solution).
11. Syntocinon Ampoules 50 I.V. per 5 ml (Parenteral Solution).
12. Syntometrine Ampoules.
13. Prostin E2 Sterile Solution.

Consultants

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the establishment of new consultants' posts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of consultants in hospital medicine in England increased by an average of 2·4 per cent. per annum over the five years 1983 to 1988.

Regional health authorities continue to plan for expansion of the consultant grade of 2 per cent. per annum. In addition to this, between 1988 and 1990 the Government funded the appointment of 100 new consultants under a pump-priming exercise. A further 100 consultants are to be appointed over the three years 1989-90 to 1991-92 under a scheme announced in the White Paper "Working for Patients". I announced the allocation of the last 65 of these posts on 27 February at columns 125-26.

Complementary Medicine

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he proposes to discuss with EEC representatives the different legal arrangements for United Kingdom practitioners of complementary medicine and those of Community countries which have legislated for treatment under Napoleonic laws; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No. Practitioners of complementary medicine are able to practice in the United Kingdom subject only to those provisions of statute and civil law which apply. Legislation enacted by other Community countries will not affect the right to practise complementary therapy in this country.

GPs (Training)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many applications were made for places on training courses for general practitioners in each year from 1984 to 1989.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many places have gone unfilled on general practitioner training courses during 1989-90; and in which areas of the United Kingdom courses were undersubscribed this year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally for England. Information relating to other parts of the United Kingdom is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Special Hospitals

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the recorded number of hours spent by women in seclusion at Rampton, Broadmoor and Moss Side special hospitals during the 12 months from December 1988 to December 1989.

Mr. Freeman: The Special Hospitals Service Authority has provided the information requested as follows:

	Number
Rampton Hospital	28,744
Broadmoor Hospital	27,846
Moss Side Hospital	10,031

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what is the recorded number of instances of self-mutilation or self harm by women in Rampton, Broadmoor and Moss Side special hospitals during the 12 months from December 1988 to December 1989.

Mr. Freeman: The Special Hospitals Service Authority reports that, during the period in question, 618 such instances were recorded at Moss Side hospital. There is no readily available central record at Rampton and Broadmoor hospitals.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he now intends to fulfil the commitment to consult voluntary organisations concerning the regulations to be made under section 1 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: This will depend on the outcome of the consultations taking place with the local authority associations on the cost and other implications of implementing section 1 and other remaining sections of the Act.

Health Service Contracts

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will designate a number to the paper "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Services" within the series of papers on implementing the White Paper, "Working for Patients".

Mr. Freeman: The series of numbered working papers, which were published shortly after the White Paper "Working for Patients", were largely concerned with taking forward detailed analysis of the policy proposals in the White Paper. Later guidance, such as "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Contracts", has not been numbered within this series as it is intended to be guidance to NHS managers in the practical implementation of those proposals. It has been distributed within the NHS under cover of an executive letter from the chief executive of the NHS Management Executive (in a numbered series), its reference being EL(90)MB/24.

However, the wider interest in this and other such guidance has been recognised by arranging for Her Majesty's Stationery Office to publish it, and by placing copies in the Library. We have made copies available through the Vote Office.

Malaria

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of malaria were reported in Britain for each of the last five years.

Mr. Freeman: The information is shown in the table.

Total notifications[1] of malaria
Great Britain: 1985-89

Year	Notifications

National Assistance Act 1948

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions in each of the last 10 years inquiries have been conducted under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948; what was the average length of time taken by an inquiry; on how many occasions the default powers under the section were used; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No inquiries have been set up under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 in the last 10 years. Nor has any order been made declaring an authority to be in default.

Correspondence

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letters sent to his Department on 15 December by the Chesterfield and District branch of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship under the heading "Mental Illness Services in North Derbyshire".

Mr. Freeman: The Department has no record of having received the letters to which the hon. Member refers. If he would care to let me have copies of them, I will ensure that they are dealt with promptly.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Department of Health's budget for communications and publicity includes provision for nurse recruitment, blood donor recruitment and drug misuse campaigns.

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

	£ million
Expenditure for 1988-89 is as follows:
Television	1·662
Radio	0·205
Newspaper	1·196
Other Material	7·736
Estimated expenditure for 1989-90 is as follows:
Television	2·682
Radio	0·127
Newspaper	3·122
Other Material	9·945

The budget for communications and publicity has not yet been agreed for 1990-91.

ENVIRONMENT

English House Condition Survey

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give from the English house condition survey 1986, the number of homes (a) affected by excessive draughts, (b) with penetrating damp, (c) with rising damp, (d) affected by slight mould growth and (e) affected by serious mould growth, together with their incidence in each room surveyed, by tenure.

Mr. Chope: The numbers, estimated from information provided by the English house condition survey 1986, have today been placed in the Library.

County Structure Plans

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to limit the number of county structure plans which may be prepared by any authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend issued a draft planning policy guidance note on structure plans and regional guidance in November 1989 which encouraged county planning authorities with more than one structure plan to make an early start on preparing a single replacement plan. Our proposals for legislation, set out in the White Paper "The Future of Development Plans" (Cm. 569), envisaged a single statement of planning policies for each county and for each national park.

Water Authority Land (Access)

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is considering any changes to the access arrangements to water authority land which were made at the time of privatisation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Water Act 1989 imposes general environmental and recreational duties, enforceable by the Secretary of State, on the new water companies. In particular they are required to have regard to the desirability of preserving freedom of access to areas of natural beauty and to sites of architectural or historic interest, and to ensure that their water and land is made available for recreational purposes in the best manner.

A code of practice approved by Ministers gives practical guidance to and promotes desirable practices by the companies and other relevant bodies on the performance of these duties. A copy of the code is available in the Library of the House.

There are no plans to amend these statutory duties or the code of practice. However, a Standing Committee is to be set up shortly comprising representatives of the water industry and of the main conservation and recreation interests, to monitor the relevance and effectiveness of the code.

Housing Associations

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the percentage increase in housing associations' rent for 1989-90 attributable to the new financial arrangements imposed for market rents on housing associations.

Mr. Chope: This information is not available. But under the tenants' guarantee, housing associations are expected to set and maintain rents at levels which are within the reach of those in low-paid employment.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he will take to reverse the downward trend in rehabilitation of older property by housing associations since passage of the Housing Act 1988.

Mr. Chope: Housing assocations can provide accommodation for low-income households in a variety of ways, including building new homes, acquiring satisfactory dwellings, and rehabilitation and conversion of older property. The new funding arrangements under the Housing Act 1988 are designed to sharpen the incentives to associations to give value for money, but not otherwise to affect their choice of scheme type. I shall shortly be considering with the Housing Corporation whether any adjustments are needed to the current pattern of grant rates for different types of scheme to ensure this.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Bournemouth borough council and Dorset county council will receive from the unified business rate for 1990-91; how much they received from the commercial rate in 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The expected income from business rates for the Bournemouth area (taking account of the demands of both the district and county councils) for 1989-90 was £27·389 million. The amount the area will receive in distributed business rate in 1990-91 is £34·652 million.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will transfer the cost of fire and police from local authorities to central Government; and if he will estimate the average savings per full community charge payer.

Mr. Chope: The Government have no plans to make such a transfer.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the cost of calculating transitional relief per individual as against the current practice.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 8 March to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East, if he will reimburse any charging authority the expenditure it is involved in when sending out revised community charge bills following any decision he may make to cap precepting authorities.

Mr. Chope: No. In such circumstances it would be for the charging authority to recover its administrative costs from the precepting authority under section 36 of the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any local authorities known to him which have announced their intention to levy a standard community charge at less than twice the personal community charge.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 8 March 1990]: No information is available at present to the Department about standard community charge multipliers set by charging authorities for properties in their areas. Charging authorities have until 31 March to determine multipliers for the coming year.

Hedgerows

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the depletion of hedgerows in England and Wales in the last decade.

Mr. Trippier: Various estimates have been made for past periods. However, none covers the whole of the last decade.

A survey of landscape change in England and Wales carried out for my Department and the Countryside Commission by Hunting Surveys and Consultants Ltd. showed annual losses of some 2,900 miles of hedgerow between 1969 and 1980 and 4,000 miles between 1980 and 1985. A survey of environmental topics on farms carried out by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, however, showed annual losses of 500 miles between 1980 and 1985. The two surveys used different methodologies and neither can be regarded as definitive.

Work is continuing to improve information both on the rate of removal and on the extent of new planting.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the organisations which advised his Department on any aspect of the privatisation of the water industry giving, in each case, the dates of their involvement and in each case the aspect on which they advised.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information is listed in the table:

Sewage Dumping

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on licences allowing dumping of sewage on the Fylde coast.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The applications made by the North West water authority for the Secretary of State's consent to discharge sewage to the Fylde coast have not yet been determined. It would therefore not be proper for me to comment upon them.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers he has to control the dumping of sewage at sea, where such dumping falls under his Department's responsibility.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The regulation of the dumping of sewage at sea is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, using his powers under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

The Secretary of State's powers under the Water Act 1989 relate principally to discharges from land-based sources.

Atmospheric Pollution

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information his Department has about atmospheric carbon monoxide and lead levels in cities during peak traffic flow; and if his Department has commissioned studies as to how these levels are anticipated to change in the next decade;

(2) what information his Department has about atmospheric carbon monoxide and lead levels in city centres during rush hour traffic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Urban concentrations of both pollutants are monitored on behalf of my Department by Warren Spring laboratory.

Between November 1989 and March 1990, and depending upon the prevailing weather conditions, weekly average levels of carbon monoxide in central London varied between 0·9 and 8·1 parts per million at 0800 hours, and between 1·1 and 5·6 parts per million at 1800 hours.

Direct monitoring data for lead are not collected for the short time intervals required by the question. However, estimates from other data suggest that peak lead concentrations in central London would be of the order of 4 microgrammes per cubic metre (μgm^{-3}), with an annual average of 0·6 µgm. For comparison these figures are well below the EC lead in air limit value of 2·0 µgm.

My Department has a substantial programme of research into the modelling and assessment of air pollution which takes into account the effects of pollution abatement measures on ambient concentrations. The increased sales of unleaded petrol and the strict exhaust emission standards set by the EC vehicles directive are expected to reduce urban concentrations of these pollutants markedly well before the year 2000.

North Sea

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the five countries that contribute the highest amounts of phosphorous and nitrogen via direct inputs to the North sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The 1990 interim quality status report on the North sea combines information on river and direct inputs to the North sea from all North sea states. These figures are not directly comparable but show the highest inputs from the Netherlands, followed by the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom, Norway and Belgium.

Definitive information on direct inputs will not be available until the 1990 Paris commission survey using standardised measuring techniques.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take urgent steps to reduce by at least 50 per cent. discharges via pipes and rivers into the North sea of all chemicals that are (a) persistent, (b) toxic and (c) liable to bioaccumulate.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The commitment to reduce dangerous substances (defined as persistent, toxic and liable to bioaccumulate) inputs substantially, by the order of 50 per cent., by 1995, was made by the second North sea conference in London in November 1987. Progress in achieving this was among the topics considered by the third conference in the Hague on 7 and 8 March. The United Kingdom has reported the progress it has already achieved and envisages in the national action plan on reducing discharges to rivers, estuaries and coastal waters published on 5 March. At the third conference it was agreed that action should be taken on a list of 36 dangerous substances, most of which are already on the United Kingdom's red list or covered by the national action plan.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the third North sea conference and measures agreed to halt pollution.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 12 March 1990 by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on the outcome of the third North sea conference.

Secure Car Service

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the £34,404 cost of providing a secure car service for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the past 12 months according to (a) running costs and (b) wages and overtime.

Mr. Chope: The breakdown requested is:

(a) running costs £13,101.
(b) wages and overtime £21,303.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost of providing a secure car service for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in each of the financial years (a) 1987-88, (b) 1988-89 and (c) 1989-90 to date.

Mr. Chope: The costs of providing a secure car service to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster were:

(a) 1987-88	31,460
(b) 1988-89	32,472
(c) 1989-90 (to 9 March 1990)	32,634

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any contribution has been made by or requested for any non-governmental body in respect of official car usage by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Chope: No contribution has been made by or requested from any non-governmental body in respect of official car usage by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Competition (Local Government)

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made in relation to the enforcement of the competition provisions of the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend has today issued a direction under section 14 of the Local Government Act 1988 prohibiting the London borough of Hillingdon from carrying out its vehicle maintenance through its own staff as from 1 September 1990. He has taken this action because he was not satisfied with its response to the notice issued under section 13. That notice set out his belief that it had acted contrary to the requirement of section 7(7) of the Act which is that, in awarding a contract it must not in that it awarded its vehicle maintenance work to its own direct services organisation when it had received a bid which was over £109,000 lower over a four-year period after taking redundancy costs into account.

"act in a manner having the effect or intended or likely to have the effect of restricting, distorting or preventing competition"

This makes it absolutely clear that we shall not hesitate to take action when we believe that authorities are distorting the competition process. We have strong powers of enforcement under the Act, and we shall use them where necessary to ensure that charge payers get the full benefits that competition, fairly administered, can bring.

Empty Properties

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of properties owned by his Department and suitable for residential accommodation has been empty for (a) up to a year and (b) over a year; and where these properties are located, by region or local authority area.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 27 February 1990]: As at 6 March 1990, six (1·5 per cent.) of the 408 residential properties owned by the Department of the Environment had been empty for less than a year and 10 (2·4 per cent.) for more than a year. Of these, 10 (63 per cent.) are in the process of disposal on the open market. These properties are located in the following regions of the United Kingdom and local authority areas:

Scotland
Argyll, City of Glasgow
North East
Hambleton, Langbaurgh
Eastern
Suffolk Coastal London
Westminster Southern Milton Keynes
South West
Cotswold, Sedgemoor
South East
Medway, South Wight

Property Services Agency

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek a value for money report from the National Audit Office on the guarantees given by the Property Services Agency to the Crown Suppliers of continued work following privatisation.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Where Departments are considering entering into commercial agreements with the Crown Suppliers, or any other supplier, whether or not they contain undertakings about future business levels for a period, it is for Departments to satisfy themselves that they provide value for money, and for the National Audit Office to decide whether to investigate.

Waste Recycling

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the individuals in each local authority, by name and authority, to whom he has written with a questionnaire concerning best practice in recycling household waste.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The questionnaire is being sent to the chief executives of all district and county councils in England.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has made an assessment or study of the volume of domestic refuse, in terms of percentage, that can be recycled into refuse-derived products, and what percentage remains for landfill; and what is his Department's policy towards the expansion of this capability.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Government consider that there is considerable potential for the recycling of waste into refuse-derived products, including fuel, and for reducing the proportion of waste that is committed to landfill. This issue is currently being studied by expert working groups under the aegis of the recycling forum, chaired by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department will encourage local authorities to explore joint venture agreements with private sector companies in the field of recycling; and if his Department has made any assessment of the number of private sector companies that would be able to take part in such schemes.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Yes; it is important for the private sector to be involved in recycling ventures by local authorities at every stage of recycling—this can include the collection and sorting of waste and its disposal to contractors or direct to manufacturers. Together with the Department of Trade and Industry, we intend to explore the potential for further joint ventures in this field.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on joint ventures currently in existence between local authorities and the private sector to recycle domestic refuse; and if he will list those authorities and companies currently operating such arrangements in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Comprehensive information about such joint ventures is not currently available, but is being sought through a detailed questionnaire on recycling which is being sent to local authorities.

Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91;

(2) what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Information relating to the financial years between 1979-80 and 1984-85 inclusive is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. Final decisions have not yet been made about cost to be incurred in 1990-91.

Following is the information relating to the remaining financial years in respect of paid publicity and associated staff costs for my Department including PSA:

	£ million
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	4·2
1987-88	4·8
1988-89	6·9
[1]1989-90	15·0

[1] Forecast outturn.

Expenditure is not broken down between different publicity media.

The increase in expenditure in 1989-90 is mainly due to specific information campaigns on new legislation on local government finance and housing and to encourage the use of lead-free petrol. Publicity expenditure arising in the course of the flotation of the 10 water plcs is not included and will be notified to Parliament in the usual way.

Parliamentary Creche

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made in identifying suitable premises for the provision of a creche for hon. Members' and employees' families; and whether he has any plans to make provisions for children accompanying parents on visits and lobbies.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 12 March 1990]: I have not been requested by the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services), to convert accommodation for any of the facilities mentioned by the hon. Lady.

Inner City Programmes

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which are the inner city programmes his Department is carrying out; what non-Government organisations are taking part in such programmes; where each of these programmes is operating; and on what date each one was started.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Details of the Department of the Environment programmes which are directed towards inner city regeneration are set out in the annual report for 1988-89 "Renewing the Cities" which was published on 28 February. The Department took over responsibility for city action teams in December 1989. Information on CATs is set out in the report "People in Cities" also published on 28 February. Copies of both reports have been placed in the Library. They describe the important part which organisations in the business and voluntary sectors are playing, together with central Government, local authorities and the urban development corporations, in bringing about the revival of inner city areas. They also show where the programmes are operating. The dates when programmes, or organisations, were first established were as follows:

Urban Development Corporations	March 1981
City Grant	May 1988
The Urban Programme	1968-69
Derelict Land Grant	1950
Enterprise Zones	June 1981
Estate Action	1985-86
City Action Teams	April 1985

Inner city revival is also promoted by DOE main programmes, such as the local authority housing investment programme and grants to housing associations through the Housing Corporation, and through other initiatives, such as simplified planning zones and land registers.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Quota

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for allocating the additional 1 per cent. of milk quota now available.

Mr. Gummer: We have been advised that the European Community Commission has formally approved our proposals for allocating the additional 1 per cent. of milk quota now available. These provide for quota to be allocated to the following categories of producer.

The first comprises those with tribunal awards which have not yet been granted in full. Small developers will have their allocations made up to the full amount awarded initially subject only to abatement for the cuts totalling approximately 4 per cent. imposed on all producers since the tribunal awards were made. This will benefit producers in Scotland and Northern Ireland; small developers in England and Wales have already been granted their full award. Unfulfilled exceptional hardship awards, which now remain only in Northern Ireland, will be dealt with on the same basis as small developers. Other development awards throughout the United Kingdom will be made up to a common level of around 77 per cent. of the initial allocation (after applying the abatement for across-the-board cuts) except in the minority of cases where a higher percentage of the award has already been granted. In the case of both development and exceptional hardship awards, quota will be allocated only to producers who have actually delivered milk during the period 1 April 1989 to 28 February 1990. This condition will help to ensure that quota goes to those milk producers who are most in need of it.

The second category of producers comprises those who occupy a family-type holding and for whom milk production constitutes a significant activity. My intention here is to give extra help to the family farms that are significantly smaller than average. The best practicable way of targeting this group is by allocating quota to all producers holding under 200,000 litres of wholesale and direct sales quota. As with the developers and exceptional hardship cases, we shall exclude those who did not deliver milk in the first 11 months of this quota year. Also, since we are aiming at producers for whom milk production is a significant activity, those with under 20,000 litres of quota will be excluded. Within these limits producers will be given an addition of just over 3 per cent. to their current wholesale allocation, including temporarily suspended quota subject to an overall ceiling of 200,000 litres.

Allocations to family-type farms and to producers with outstanding tribunal awards will account for about 120 million of the 148·87 million litres available for distribution. In addition we intend to allocate a small share of the total to producers in the remoter parts of the less-favoured areas, that is, Arran, Bute, Coll, Gigha, Great Cumbrae, Islay, the Isles of Scilly, Kintyre south of Tarbert, Little Cumbrae, Orkney and Shetland. They will each receive an increase representing about 5 per cent. of their current wholesale quota.

Finally, I have earmarked 22·5 million litres for new entrants. The intention would be to allocate quota on loan. Eventually quota used in this way would be recycled to assist further new entrants. The Commission has, however, raised legal objections to the idea of loaning quota and the matter has not yet been resolved. This will not delay the laying of a statutory instrument before Parliament within the next few days to enable the majority of the quota to be allocated before the end of the present quota year.

Salmonella

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Government will respond to the progress report of the Agriculture Committee on salmonella in eggs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have today presented to Parliament their response to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee's progress report on salmonella in eggs. The response welcomes the Agriculture Committee's review of the measures adopted to combat the salmonella problem and notes that the Committee has not recommended any change to the steps taken to protect public health other than in relation to imported eggs.

Copies of the Government's response have been placed in the House Libraries.

Compound Feedstuffs

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps have to be taken prior to animal feed manufacturers being permitted to sell proprietary compounds for feeding to farm animals like sheep and poultry.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 5 March 1990]: Manufacturers of medicated animal feedingstuffs are required to register with the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and abide by a code of practice. The medicinal additives they incorporate must be licensed under medicines legislation.

Additionally all feedingstuffs manufacturers must take steps to ensure that compound feeds sold to farmers comply with the requirements of the Feedingstuffs Regulations 1988.

Green Currency

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the green currency discrepancy for each EC member nation at the most recent available date.

Mr. Curry: The table shows the real monetary gap (RMG) for the main commodities in each member state as at 12 March 1990. This represents the percentage difference between the green and market rate of exchange used for agriculture.

Wheat and Sheepmeat

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the green pound discrepancy in (a) percentage, (b) cash per unit at the beginning of each marketing year since 1980 for (i) wheat and (ii) sheepmeat;

(2) what it the United Kingdom intervention price for wheat and the guide price for sheepmeat for each marketing year since 1980 in (a) cash terms and (b) at 1990 prices.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is supplied in the table:

Horticulture

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made to the European Commission on gas aid to horticultural growers in EC member countries.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission has recently decided to initiate legal proceedings against the Netherlands in respect of subsidised gas prices for Dutch glasshouse growers. We are giving the Commission full support in its efforts to ensure fair competition in the Community.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about gas aid to horticultural growers in EC member states.

Mr. Curry: Some representations have been received at official level. I am continuing to keep this area under careful review.

Organic Production

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made to achieve common standards with other EEC countries for organic production systems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: In December last year the European Commission issued a proposal for a Council regulation on organic production. Discussions in the relevant Council working group commenced in January. In the view of Her Majesty's Government, the original draft was unsatisfactory in that it would not have provided adequate protection for consumers and contained features which were operationally impractical. There has, however, been some progress in the discussions and my Department is seeking to ensure that the regulation is compatible with the more fully developed standards set by the United Kingdom register of organic food standards (UKROFS).

Agrochemicals

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements exist to ensure adequate training for those handling agrochemicals in agricultural production; if such training assumes a minimum level of literacy and scientific knowledge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Formal training in the handling and use of pesticides is available both from the agricultural training board and from the county agricultural and horticultural colleges. For safety reasons, trainees are expected to be able to read and interpret the product label, but no specific scientific knowledge is required.

Organic Farming

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial and other support he is making available for organic farming; what estimate he has made of the increased employment resulting from organic farming methods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) on 16 January 1990, Official Report, columns 215-16, in which I set out the wide range of support for organic farming currently available or being planned. It is too early to estimate the increased level of employment likely to result from these initiatives and from the increase in market demand. However, we are anxious that the agricultural industry should respond to the market and ensure that a growing share of that market is met by United Kingdom production.

Waste Incineration

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of waste will be incinerated at sea in 1990; whether the Government intend to curtail such incineration for all materials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) on 5 March, Official Report, column 489.

The amount of waste to be incinerated in 1990 is expected to be less than 6,000 tonnes.

North Sea Dumping

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations have been made regarding the proposed dumping of 50,000 tonnes of acid and other wastes into the sea off the north-east coast from other countries and United Kingdom organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Department has received a number of representations from some of the other contracting parties to the Oslo commission and from United Kingdom organisations about proposals to issue licences for the dumping of industrial wastes into the North sea.

In accordance with the requirements of the internationally agreed procedures in respect of the dumping of such wastes after 1989, we have submitted detailed information to the Oslo commission about the nature of the wastes concerned, the methods of dumping proposed, the tests carried out to confirm that such dumping would not pose any risk of harm to the marine environment and the work undertaken into alternative disposal methods. An Oslo commission working group on 14 February 1989 expressed its appreciation of the United Kingdom's efforts to phase out this dumping. As a result of these efforts to establish environmentally acceptable land-based methods for dealing with these wastes I was able on 2 February to announce my intention to terminate the licences for their disposal at sea by the end of 1992. Two licences would be extended into 1993 only if absolutely necessary and for the shortest possible part of that year.

Turkeys

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to answer the letter from the hon. Member for Caerphilly of 15 January concerning the welfare of turkeys at slaughter.

Mr. Curry: An answer to the hon. Member's letter of 15 January was dispatched on 12 March 1990.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department has carried out to see whether calves' brains can be contaminated by bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Curry: In studies carried out in relation to natural scrapie in sheep and goats, infectivity could not be detected anywhere, including the brain, in animals under 10 months of age. The probable cause of bovine spongiform encephalopathy was the feeding of ruminant-based protein, which included material from sheep with scrapie. Calves would not have been fed this material, since the practice was banned in July 1988. In addition, there is no evidence at present of cattle-to-cattle transmission, although we are conducting experiments to see whether this could occur. Field and experimental studies on BSE are in hand and include the assessment of the infectivity of different tissues.

Farmers and Farm Workers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the reasons for the decline in the number of farmers and farm workers in Britain in 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The decline in the numbers of farmers and farm workers in 1989 reflects a continuation of a long-standing trend resulting from a range of factors—for example, continuing increases in labour productivity and technological development, the increased success of the European Community in tackling the problems of the CAP and, more recently, the need for tight financial disciplines throughout the economy as a whole. We shall, however, have to await the results of the June 1990 census before it will be possible to assess fully the extent of the decline in 1989.

DEFENCE

SSBN 005

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding the progress of the Intercept sonar for SSBN 005.

Mr. Neubert: Development of the Intercept sonar sub-system is largely complete, and it is expected that integration with the sonar suite will be accomplished on schedule.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when production units of the inboard sonar suite for SSBN 005 were delivered.

Mr. Neubert: Delivery of the SSBN 005 onboard sonar suite is not yet required under the shipbuilding programme. The equipment is available and the programme date will be met.

Heat Injury

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) boards of inquiry, (b) disciplinary inquiries and (c) courts martial have taken place following the occurrence of heat-induced injuries or fatalities; and in how many cases disciplinary action was taken.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As regards boards of inquiry and disciplinary inquiries, the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost and effort. As regards courts martial, I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on 15 January 1990, Official Report, column 121. Since then one court martial has taken place following a case of heat induced injury.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will detail the action taken by him in the past two years to reduce the number of casualties from heat injury in the forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Two defence council instructions have been issued: the first in December 1988, as a reminder of the risks of heat stress, heat exhaustion, heat stroke and similar conditions; and the second last month, to provide detailed guidance on the prediction, prevention and treatment of such conditions. These have been disseminated throughout the three services and are an important means of maintaining and improving awareness of the risks of heat injury. In addition, as far as training is concerned, the content of courses is kept under review and, where appropriate, revised. Thus, for example, changes to the Army's combat fitness test instructions to enable commanding officers to exercise discretion over dress requirements in certain climatic conditions, as well as the planned increase in the time allowed for completion of the test, should reduce the risk of heat stress and other injuries.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the figures relating to episodes of injury or death attributable to excessive heat or insulation within the services for 1989.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not yet available for 1989. It will be included in the services annual health tables which are published each summer.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will initiate an independent review of the heat-related injuries and deaths that occurred between 1978 and 1988 with a view to preventing such injuries in the future.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. All deaths from other than natural causes are investigated as a matter of course to consider whether such incidents could have been avoided.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the changes made in naval training following the heat-related injury to Lieutenant Simon Rowland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Following the injury to Lieutenant Simon Rowland, a number of new safety measures for the RN aircrew survival course have been introduced. Cellphones and radios have been purchased for use by staff on the course, and casualty evacuation procedures have been reviewed. First aid training is now being given to all instructors and the medical fitness category for the course has been reviewed. The format of the "forced march" or "battle run" element of the aircrew survival course has also been reviewed and the length of this element has been shortened.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to order an automatic court martial or disciplinary inquiry with a published report into every case of heat-related injury or death.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. In any such case it is the responsibility of the relevant service authority to determine what action would be appropriate, which will depend on the particular circumstances of the case.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will place in the Library (a) the defence council instruction issued on 23 December 1988 regarding the prevention of heat stroke and exhaustion and (b) the single service instructions that are referred to in the defence council instruction;

(2) if he will place in the Library the existing regulations referred to in the letter of 6 November 1989 from the Under-Secretary of State to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South regarding the prediction, prevention and treatment of heat injury; whether these regulations are given to all training instructors; and whether they were given to Lieutenant Gordon Smith late of the RN survival equipment school;

(3) if he will place in the Library the separate instructions issued to commanding officers requiring them to take appropriate preventive measures that are referred to in the letter of 29 June 1988 about heat injuries from the Under-Secretary of State to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Although defence council instructions are internal management documents not normally intended for publication outside the Ministry of Defence and the services, I am arranging, exceptionally, for the instruction referred to by the right hon. Member to be placed in the Library. However, I do not consider the public interest would be served by the more general publication of internal instructions and regulations.

The practice regarding giving copies of regulations to individual instructors varies, the main consideration being that they should be readily available in a suitable form and that they should be read and understood by all concerned. All instructors in the Royal Navy have been given copies of the defence council instructions issued in December 1988, including Lieutenant Gordon Smith while he was an instructor at the RN survival equipment school.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report details of the clothing worn by Lieutenant Simon Rowland and his fellow trainees during the training exercise in the New Forest; and what was the temperature during each day of the exercise.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: For the practical phase of the survival course Lt Rowland and his fellow trainees were wearing flying overalls, underpants, socks and boots. No headgear was worn.

The temperature each day in the area during the practical phase of the course carried out in the New Forest is shown in the chart:

Ambient air temperatures for period 22-25 July 1989—local times

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set up a study of the distribution of the 663 heat injuries between 1978 and 1988 to see if there are any instances of commanding officers having a number of injuries to men training under their command significantly greater than that likely to have occurred by chance.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. The information necessary to conduct such a study is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what independent medical advice he has received on the avoidability of heat injury or death.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to him on 15 January 1990, Official Report, column 121.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when it was decided to prepare the more detailed defence council instruction, referred to in the letter of 6 November 1989 from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South; what external independent advice has been sought on the content; when it will be finalised; to whom it will be circulated; if he will place a copy in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It was decided in May 1989 to issue a defence council instruction (DCI) which was to bring together the guidance already available in various instructions and publications. The new DCI covers all aspects of the prediction, prevention and treatment of heat injury. External advice was not sought as there was sufficient informed opinion within the services.

The DCI was issued on 23 February 1990 and will be seen by all service personnel and appropriate civilian organisations within the MOD.

Although DCIs are internal management documents I am arranging, exceptionally, for this instruction to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether a training instructor in the armed forces has ever been charged for failing in his duty to observe a defence council instruction relating to the prediction, prevention and treatment of heat injury;

(2) whether a training instructor in the armed forces has ever been charged for failing in his duty to observe the training regulations relating to the prediction, prevention and treatment of heat injury.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Not over the last 10 years for which records are available.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the other branches of the forces intend to modify their training programmes to match the changes made by the Royal Navy following the heat-related injury to Lieutenant Simon Rowland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Relevant training practices in the other services are being examined to establish whether any of the changes being introduced by the Royal Navy are applicable.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether training instructors have a duty to observe the training regulations relating to the prediction, prevention and treatment of heat injury; and if it is an offence to disregard them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: If a training regulation imposes a duty on a training instructor which he fails to carry out or carries out negligently, he can be charged with an offence under the relevant service discipline Act.

Training Injuries

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many men died or were seriously injured while taking part in SAS, SBS or Royal Marine training courses during 1989.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to comment on matters relating to special forces. During 1989 three men died and one serious injury was sustained as a result of participation in Royal Marine training courses or exercises.

Training Instructors

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to require training instructors to dress in the same clothes and carry the same equipment as those they are training.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. This would not always be practicable, especially in cases where such a requirement would undermine the effectiveness of the supervision provided by instructors, which is important for safety and other reasons.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether training instructors have a duty to observe defence council instructions; and if it is an offence to disregard them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Defence council instructions are not usually expressed as direct orders and non-compliance with any given instruction is therefore not automatically an offence. However, if a defence council instruction imposes a duty on a training instructor which he fails to carry out or carries out negligently, he can be charged with an offence under the relevant service discipline Act.

Hazardous Training

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any obligatory medical checks on members of the forces before they take part in potentially hazardous training.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The PULHHEEMS system is the standard assessment of each individual's medical fitness for all aspects of service with Her Majesty's forces. Additional medical examinations are provided in specialised occupations such as pilots and divers.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there is any limitation on the discretion of commanding officers regarding the hazardous nature of training courses for which they have responsibility.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Commanding officers are responsible for the health and safety of those in their charge and, in conducting training, they are required to have full regard to this responsibility and to the framework of relevant instructions, guidance and advice (including medical advice), while ensuring that training is of military value.

Chemical and Biological Defence

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel are currently employed in research and development into pyrotechnic equipment for chemical and biological defence; and if he has any plans to increase the complement of staff or consultants working in this field.

Mr. Neubert [holding answer 1 March 1990]: The Ministry of Defence has no personnel currently employed in research and development into pyrotechnic equipment for chemical and biological defence, nor is there any intention to engage such personnel. The Department is, however, considering purchase of equipment developed in this field.

Forest Moor Base

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new building work has been commissioned at the Forest Moor base over the last five years; and at what cost.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1990]: Contracts for the following works at Forest Moor have been let in the past five years:

UK HF Ship-to-Shore Aerials
Patching Jack Field
COMMCEN Security Improvements
Conversions to Repair Laboratory
Crypto Workshop and Store Improvements
Galley/Drainage System Improvements
Provision for Refuse Compactor
Anti-Pollution Measures
CCTV System
COMMCEN Access Control Improvements
Road Drainage Improvements
Sports Field Drainage Improvements
Provision of Security Fences and Water Tower
COMMCEN Structural Alterations
Sewage Ejector Station Up-Grade
Demolition of Masts and Towers
Other Security Measures

The total value of these contracts was £421,096,000.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages Councils

2. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he takes to monitor the effectiveness of the wages councils.

Mr. Nicholls: The councils are empowered to set minimum rates of pay in certain industries. The extent of compliance with these rates is regularly assessed.

Labour Statistics

16. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much long-term unemployment among 18 to 24-year-olds has fallen in the past year.

Mr. Howard: In the year to January, long-term unemployment among 18 to 24-year-olds fell by almost 46,000 or 33 per cent.

22. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of 18 to 24-year-olds who were long-term unemployed in (a) the quarter to January 1986 and (b) the quarter to January 1990.

Mr. Howard: Between January 1986 and January 1990 the number of 18 to 24-year-olds who have been unemployed for 12 months or more fell by 243,000 or 73 per cent.

26. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the work force in employment in the United Kingdom has increased since March 1983.

Mr. Nicholls: Since 1983 the United Kingdom work force in employment has been on a rising trend. In September 1989, the latest date for which information is available, the work force in employment was 26,487,000. This represents an increase of 2,923,000 or 12·4 per cent. since March 1983 when the figure was 23,563,000.

30. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the percentage reduction in the total number of long-term unemployed people in the last two years.

Mr. Nicholls: Between January 1988 and January 1990 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for one year or more fell by about 48 per cent. The comparison is slightly affected by the changes in coverage of the count over the period specified.

32. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage change in unemployment in the Bury, North constituency during the period September 1986 to December 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: Between September 1986 and December 1989 the number of unemployed claimants in Bury, North parliamentary constituency fell by about 60 per cent. Direct comparisons are affected by the change in benefit regulations for under 18-year-olds in September 1988, and by seasonal influences.

44. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many full-time jobs have been created in the city of Sheffield in 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: This information is not available. The Department's statistics for local areas monitor only net changes in employment between census of employment dates and the most recent figures are for September 1987.

47. Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the total numbers in employment in the west midlands (a) currently and (b) one year ago.

Mr. Nicholls: In September 1989, the latest date for which figures are available, the civilian work force in employment in the west midlands region was 2,398,000. This represents an increase of 59,000 or 2·5 per cent. since September 1988 when the figure was 2,339,000.

50. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Nicholls: In January 1990, seasonally adjusted unemployment in the United Kingdom was 1,611,400, the lowest for more than nine years on a consistent basis.

56. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the unemployment rate among those aged under 25 years for (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Community.

67. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many European Community countries have a higher rate of unemployment among those aged under 25 years than the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nicholls: In December 1989, the latest available date, the unemployment rate in the United Kingdom among under 25-year-olds was 8·2 per cent., under half that of the EC average of 16·5 per cent. The rate for eight of our EC partners is higher than this. The rate for Greece is unavailable.

57. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of employed in each of the standard regions in (a) June 1989 and (b) June 1979.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is as follows:

Civilian workforce in employment (unadjusted for seasonal variation)

(Thousands)

60. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for how many months the unemployment total has been falling.

Mr. Nicholls: The unemployment total in the United Kingdom has now been falling continuously for 42 months on a consistent basis.

65. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of new jobs created in the last three years are of part-time character; and what proportion of the total number of employees are part-time.

Mr. Nicholls: There are no figures for new jobs created but only for net increases in employment. In the three years to September 1989, the latest date for which estimates are available, 27 per cent. of the net increase in employees in employment was in part-time jobs. Part-time employees in employment now represent 24 per cent. of the total number of the employees.

72. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the change in the percentage of the work force working outside the public sector over the last 10 years; and what is the overall trend allowing for the effect of privatisation.

Mr. Nicholls: Mid-year estimates of employment in the public sector are prepared by the Central Statistical Office. Estimates of the total work force are prepared by the Department of Employment. On this basis, the proportion working outside the public sector rose from 69·4 per cent. in 1979 to 74·4 per cent. in 1989. This increase includes the effects of privatisation. The data that would enable reliable estimates of the change in the proportion working outside the public sector allowing for the effects of privatisation are not available.

75. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the fall in the numbers of unemployed people aged 50 years and over over the last year.

Mr. Nicholls: Between January 1989 and January 1990 the number of unemployed claimants aged 50 years and over in the United Kingdom fell by about 113,000 or 26 per cent. This comparison is affected by the changes in the operation of the redundant mineworkers payments scheme in July 1989. These changes will particularly have affected older age groups.

Training

18. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any proposals to improve the level of training for new skills.

Mr. Howard: The Government are investing almost £3 billion this year in training, and in the introduction of training and enterprise councils across the country. Training and enterprise councils represent the most exciting training initiative this country has ever seen, and I am delighted by the progress they are making and the support they are receiving.

36. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he plans to meet his European Economic Community counterparts to discuss training and retraining schemes and the exchange of ideas between different systems in European countries.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. and learned Friend has already visited Bonn to discuss training issues with his counterparts there and also held bilateral discussions in Dublin before attending the informal meeting of Labour and Social Affairs Ministers on 1 to 2 March, which included a review of EC training initiatives. It is hoped that a number of bilaterals with colleagues in other member states will be arranged within the next six months.

27. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in annual expenditure by his Department on training since 1979 in (a) real terms and (b) cash terms.

Mr. Nicholls: Records are kept on the basis of the standard financial year for Government expenditure, which runs from 1 April to 31 March.

The increase in annual expenditure on training programmes from 1979-80 to 1989-90 in cash terms is £2,512 million. When expenditure is inflated to constant 1989-90 prices the increase is £1,966·4 million.

49. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the provision of training by employers.

Mr. Nicholls: The latest available figures show that in 1986-87 £18 billion was spent by employers on training. This represents a very considerable investment in the skills of the British work force.

51. Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has made of the proportion of gross domestic product represented by the overall cost of all training undertaken in Britain.

Mr. Nicholls: It has been estimated that in 1986-87 the total costs of training, including the implicit cost to trainees of earnings forgone while on training, was about 8 per cent. of gross domestic product.

59. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the overall cost of all training undertaken in Britain in 1986-87.

Mr. Nicholls: It has been estimated that the total costs of training, including the implicit cost to trainees of earnings forgone while on training, was about £33 billion in 1986-87.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what percentage of employment training places employers make additional contributions to the cost of training; and what is the average contribution.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any proposals to increase jobs in the manufacturing sector through training programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The overall aim of Government training programmes is to promote better arrangements for people to acquire and improve their skills and competence for work. Improved training arrangements will in turn lead to a more highly skilled and competent work force and a more competitive economy, thus promoting employment in manufacturing as elsewhere.

Low Pay

21. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to eradicate low pay.

Mr. Nicholls: The best way to help the lowest paid is through the development of a prosperous and growing economy which the Government's policies are helping to achieve.

Euro Information Centres

23. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future funding of Euro information centres.

Mr. Eggar: The first four centres in the United Kingdom were established in 1987; a further 16 for the United Kingdom were approved in October 1989 and will be operational by April this year.

The Commission provides pump-priming funds on a reducing basis in the first three years of operation.

Self-Employment

24. Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in the numbers of self-employed people since 1979.

Mr. Eggar: In September 1989, the latest date for which information is available, there were 3,276,000 self-employed people in the United Kingdom. This represents an increase of 1,370,000, or 72 per cent., since June 1979. Self-employed people now represent 12·2 per cent. of the work force in employment.

79. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the work force in employment is now self-employed.

Mr. Nicholls: In September 1989, the latest date for which information is available, self-employed people represented 12·2 per cent. of the work force in employment.

Training and Enterprise Councils

25. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many training and enterprise councils have been approved for pilot funding; how many applications are being processed; and how many areas of the country are still to make applications.

Mr. Howard: Sixty-four employer-led groups have been given development funding to establish training and enterprise councils (TECs). A further six applications are under consideration, and 12 more are expected later. This will give a complete network of TECs across England and Wales.

58. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on training and enterprise councils.

64. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of the training and enterprise council network.

Mr. Eggar: I have been very encouraged by the excellent response from employers throughout the country since we issued the invitation to form training and enterprise councils.

80. Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met the chairman of the Tynemouth training and enterprise council; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. and learned Friend met the chairman of the prospective training and enterprise council for Tyneside on 23 January. The development of a TEC for the area and the progress being made with their plans was discussed.

Job Clubs

28. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of job clubs.

Mr. Eggar: In recent months job clubs have been particularly successful in attracting entrants—20 per cent. more during the last quarter of 1989 than during the corresponding period in 1988.

The employment service is currently considering its plans for 1990-91. Provision will be made for a large and vigorous job club programme to continue.

I believe that job club is an excellent programme offering practical help with jobsearch to long-term unemployed people and others at a disadvantage in the labour market.

YTS

29. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of YTS leavers go into a job, further education or training.

Mr. Nicholls: Eighty-one per cent. of all young people who leave YTS courses go into either employment, further education or training.

35. Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of those who complete a YTS course achieve a qualification.

Mr. Nicholls: Sixty-seven per cent. of those young people who complete a YTS course achieve a qualification.

Overseas Teachers

31. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the number of work permits that have been given to overseas teachers to work in England and Wales during the past 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Figures are not available for England and Wales alone. The total number of work permits recorded as having been issued to employers wishing to employ overseas teachers in Great Britain between March 1989 and February 1990 was 323.

Hosiery Industry

33. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement regarding employment levels within the hosiery industry in Leicestershire.

Mr. Nicholls: The latest available employment estimates for the county are from the September 1987 census of employment. There were then 29,000 employees employed in the manufacture of hosiery and other weft knitted goods and fabrics (activity heading 4363 of the standard industrial classification 1980) in Leicestershire.

Employment Training

34. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total number of employment training referrals from the employment scheme to training agents in each of the months of November and December 1989 and the number of ET starts in each of those months.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is given in the following table.

Employment training Great Britain

Month	Employment service referrals to employment training	Starts with training managers
November	75,700	36,200
December	59,100	26,300

39. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce a compulsory element to employment training.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. and learned Friend has no current plans to change the basis on which employment training operates. Employment training is a highly successful programme with 209,000 voluntary participants in training.

46. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on employment training in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Nicholls: Employment training in Greater Manchester, as nationally, continues to make excellent progress. It is currently helping nearly 9,700 unemployed people to get the skills and experience they need to obtain jobs.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people on the Government employment training scheme have left the training course before the completion of their programme in the Yorkshire region in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available.

77. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to modify employment training.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) on 5 March 1990, Official Report, column 507.

Vocational Training

37. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will obtain for his Department's library the recently published reports into vocational training published by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research.

Mr. Eggar: The Library has purchased copies of the institute's recently published compilation of its reports on vocational training entitled "Productivity, Education and Training:—Britain and other Countries Compared."

Disabled People

38. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what additional measures he plans to introduce to enable disabled persons to participate fully in the work force.

41. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to take to encourage the disabled to participate fully in the workplace.

Mr. Eggar: The adequacy of current measures to enable people with disabilities to participate fully in the work force is being considered in the review of services for people with disabilities which my Department has been undertaking. A consultative document covering the conclusions reached in the review will be published as soon as possible.

55. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what guidelines are issued to his Department's staff regarding the distribution of quota exemption permits to employers.

Mr. Eggar: Instructions to disablement resettlement officers require them to consider the availability of suitable registered disabled people and the degree of commitment shown by employers towards meeting their obligations under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944.

Construction Industry Training Board

40. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he next plans to meet the chairman of the construction industry training board; and what he proposes to discuss.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to meet the chairman to discuss plans for taking forward training within the industry soon after the board is reconstituted.

Tourism

42. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps his Department has taken to promote tourism in Merseyside.

Mr. Nicholls: Through the English tourist board, my Department supports the work of the North-West tourist board in promoting tourism throughout the north-west. Specific Merseyside activities include the Liverpool strategic development initiative. My Department is also involved in the work of the Liverpool city action team, several of whose initiatives benefit tourism in the area.

43. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in the total of self-employment within the tourism industry since 1983.

Mr. Nicholls: The latest available estimate from the labour force survey indicates that there were 204,000 self-employed workers in tourism-related industries in spring 1988—44,000 more than in spring 1983.

52. Mr. Bevan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the value of spending in Britain by overseas visitors in 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: It is provisionally estimated that overseas residents spent £6,850 million in the United Kingdom during 1989—11 per cent. more than in 1988.

Health and Safety

45. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans there are for increasing the number of construction inspectors within the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive has achieved its objective of having 100 inspectors regularly engaged on the inspection of construction activities nationally by 1990. This number will be maintained. The HSE has no plans to increase the number in 1990, but the position will be kept under review.

54. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to extend health and safety protection at work.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government have increased financial provision for the Health and Safety Commission and Executive over previously agreed levels again for 1990-91. The additional provision is £7 million, excluding money transferred from the Department of Energy for nuclear safety research.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State expects shortly to receive for his approval details of the commission's plans for 1990-91 and beyond. The commission hopes to publish its plan of work in May.

71. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce legislation allowing for heavier fines for cases brought by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Nicholls: The introduction of legislation allowing for heavier fines, including those for cases brought by the Health and Safety Executive, is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

73. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Health and Safety Executive is taking to comply with European Community directives on the workplace, the use of workplace equipment and the use of personal protective equipment.

Mr. Eggar: The Health and Safety Executive is assessing what changes to existing legislation need to be made in the light of the directives, and will make recommendations to the Health and Safety Commission in due course. The commission hopes to publish proposals in the form of a consultative document by about the end of this year.

Benefit Fraud

48. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have withdrawn their claims to benefit as a result of employment service fraud investigations since 1987.

Mr. Eggar: The latest available figures show that since June 1987 204,500 people have withdrawn their claims to benefit following fraud investigations.

68. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the total savings to the taxpayer achieved by employment service fraud investigations in 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The total saving to the taxpayer in 1989 was £53·16 million.

TVEI

53. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of the technical and vocational education initiative.

Mr. Nicholls: The technical and vocational education initiative (TVEI) is making excellent progress. Over half a million students are currently involved. Significant achievements are being recorded in the 81 education authorities currently extending TVEI to all their schools and colleges:

(i) The proportion of students taking balanced science courses has virtually doubled from 36 per cent. to 64 per cent.
(ii) Students taking design and technology courses has virtually doubled from 30 per cent. to 55 per cent.
(iii) 71 per cent. of teachers report TVEI has increased students ability to solve problems.
(iv) 70 per cent. of employers feel that what TVEI teaches is relevant to their needs.

As the initiative expands, all students will be getting a period of work experience, an individual action plan and a record of achievement. I am confident that TVEI is making a significant contribution to improving the quality of the nation's work force.

Stonehenge

61. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has met the chairman of English Heritage to discuss the tourism potential of Stonehenge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Since my appointment as Secretary of State for Employment, I have not yet had the opportunity of meeting the chairman of English Heritage.

Job Creation

62. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will now meet representatives of the local authority associations to discuss the role of local government in job creation.

Mr. Eggar: I have no plans for such a meeting. Local authorities are aware that they can help to create jobs by attracting industrial and commercial investment. The Government have assisted the authorities which can benefit most from investment by, among other things, the creation of enterprise zones such as Wakefield.

Restart

63. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many restart interviews were conducted between April 1988 and December 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The number of restart interviews conducted between April 1988 and December 1989 was 3,758,000.

Employment Rights

66. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to extend employment rights to all those in work.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on 7 December 1989, Official Report, column 205.

Age Discrimination

69. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further steps his Department is taking to discourage the practice of age discrimination among employers.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government believe that older workers are a valuable resource. Age discrimination is unfair to individuals and not in an employer's own interest. We continue to put this message across to employers through various media, particularly in the context of publicity about demographic change. In addition, instructions to jobcentre staff have been strengthened to ensure all upper age limits on vacancies notified by employers are challenged. There are encouraging signs that employers are heeding this message. We will continue our efforts to ensure this progress continues.

EC Employment Ministers

70. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met his opposite numbers in (a) France, (b) Germany and (c) Italy; and what was discussed.

Mr. Howard: I met my European Community counterparts at an informal meeting of Labour and Social Affairs Ministers in Dublin on 1 and 2 March when we discussed help for the long-term unemployed and training assistance for eastern European countries.

I was also able to secure agreement that the Commission would in future present regular reports to the Council of Ministers on member states' records in implementing European legislation. This will show that the United Kingdom has an extremely good record on implementation and will help to ensure that Community legislation is effectively and fairly implemented throughout the Community.

It will also make member states think more carefully about implementation before agreeing to new directives.

Industrial Action

74. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the annual average of working days lost due to industrial action in each of the last two decades.

Mr. Nicholls: The annual average of working days lost due to industrial disputes in the 1970s was 12·9 million. The provisional estimate for the 1980s is 7·2 million.

Women Workers

76. Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to encourage women back into the workplace after having children.

Mr. Nicholls: It is not Government policy specifically to encourage women with dependent children back to work. It must be a matter of personal choice for the woman concerned. For details of the steps being taken by the Government to help those women who wish to do so to return to the labour market, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) on 16 January, Official Report, columns 234-35.

Small Businesses

78. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the average weekly increase in the number of small businesses created over the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Eggar: In 1988, the latest year for which figures have been published by my Department, the net increase in the number of VAT-registered businesses averaged just over 1,200 per week. This compares with 800 a week in 1987 and 500 a week in 1986. Early indications from data collected by HM Customs and Excise are that there was a net increase in 1989 of 1,500 a week on average.

Work Trial Placements

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the latest figures for the number of work trial placements completed under the job interview guarantee scheme for each of the sites of the pilot scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The number of work trial placements completed is as follows:

Pilot area	Number of work trials	Number found employment
Lower Don Valley	1	1
Leeds	2	2
Sunderland	1	1
Cardiff	1	—

The job interview guarantee involves an employer guaranteeing to interview long-term unemployed people from inner cities who are submitted from one or more of the following: matching-screening service, a job preparation course, a job club adopted by an employer, a work trial and a customised training course. It was formally launched in 20 pilot areas in November 1989. The latest available information is that 1,556 individuals, which includes those still participating, and 403 employers have participated in the initiative. The progress of the pilots has been encouraging. So far, 587 people have been placed in jobs including 60 per cent. of participants in the job preparation courses.

Training Agency

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the funding paid to each area covered by the Training Agency for 1989-90 and the estimated funding for each of the following three years.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Expenditure for field-delivered training programmes for April to December 1989 by Training Agency regions is set out in the table. The Government's plans for overall expenditure by the Training Agency over the next three years are set out in chapter 6 of the public expenditure White Paper (CM 1006).

Note: Expenditure excludes training allowances and other costs administered centrally.

Asbestos

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his proposals for reducing asbestos-related hazards.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government have already introduced a comprehensive range of legislation to reduce the risks from exposure to asbestos in both the work place and the environment and I have no plans at present for further legislation.

Departmental Staff

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the numbers of people employed in his Department in 1979 and 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The number employed by this Department in 1979 was 53,657 and in 1989 it was 56,376.

Skills Training Agency

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a further statement about the sale of the Skills Training Agency.

Mr. Eggar: Further to the statement that my right hon. and learned Friend made to the House on 13 February 1990, Offical Report, column 141, about the sale of the Skills Training Agency (STA), I can announce that terms of sale have now been agreed with the Training Business for the business located at Lambeth skill centre.

The offer from the Training Business was considered against the Government's objectives for the sale, which were placed in the Vote Office on 13 February, and will involve a payment of some £0·8 million from the Government to the Training Business: this reflects the need for restructuring and reforming the business at the skill centre. There will be no loss to the Government from the transaction compared with the alternative of closing the skill centre.

This brings the total number of skill centres businesses which will be sold up to 52. There will be no more sales of training businesses.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Training Agency; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91;

(2) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administration posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The numbers of staff, by grade, employed as at 31 January 1990 in statistical divisions in the Department of Employment headquarters, the Training Agency, the employment service and the Health and Safety Executive are as in the table. The permanent staff included within these numbers are close to the current complement and to that proposed for 1990-91. More casual administrative staff than are included in these numbers will be employed as necessary to process the 1989 census of employment and the 1990 earnings surveys. The table excludes the 35 staff previously in the Department and transferred to the new Central Statistical Office on 31 July 1989.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Training Agency; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91;

(2) what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department; and what is the proposed complement for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The Department's information division, which includes the press and public relations offices, presently employs 120 people with six posts vacant. The division merged with the Training Agency's information services branch in November 1989. The proposed complement for 1990-91 is 126.

HSE (Information Leaks)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the practice followed by the Health and Safety Executive in inquiring into the source of leaks of information; and how many such inquiries have taken place in this calendar year and in 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive would carry out inquiries into the sources of leaks of information in the same manner as all other Civil Service departments. The procedures are centrally determined. There were no such inquiries during 1989.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Open University

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the cost of Open university foundation courses in constant prices over the past 21 years.

Mr. Jackson: Information is not available at this stage in the form requested. The table provides information at constant 1989 prices (using the GDP deflator) on the average total cost of a full credit course, broken down by the cost to the Exchequer from grant, and the cost to the student from the undergraduate tuition fee and the summer school fee.

Columns b and c show the increase/decrease in intakes, as compared with the previous year's figures.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on University college, Swansea's recruitment for its 1990-91 teacher training course.

Mr. Alan Howarth: These data will not be available until after the beginning of the academic year 1990-91.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his best estimate of the additional costs which will fall on local education authorities in (a) England and (b) Devon in the financial year 1990-91 arising from his Department's circular 22/89 concering children with special educational needs; and on what date such additional costs were first calculated and passed to the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The purpose of circular 22/89 is to review, and advise local education authorities (LEAs) and others on, the implementation of the provisions in the Education Act 1981 on the making of assessments and statements of special educational needs, in the light of subsequent experience and events. The circular does not of itself impose substantial new burdens on LEAs; and, as paragraph 2 of the circular states, the new elements it contains are not intended to require additional expenditure.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rates

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the percentage increase in the district rates for each of the 26 councils in Northern Ireland for the years 1990-91 and 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is set out in the table:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the research carried out into the possible introduction of the poll tax in Northern Ireland, and the conclusions reached.

Mr. Cope: The arrangements for local government finance in Northern Ireland are significantly different from those in the rest of the United Kingdom. Since 1973, the services provided by local government account for only some 10 per cent. of total spending in Northern Ireland on services similar to those provided by local authorities in Great Britain. The remaining 90 per cent. is administered by central Government or their agencies subject to the scrutiny of Parliament. The circumstances in Northern Ireland are, therefore, different from those in Great Britain and there are no plans at present to replace the existing rating system in Northern Ireland.

Suicides

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many suicides in Northern Ireland occurred during 1989 at (a) prison establishments, (b) remand establishments and (c) young offenders centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: During 1989 there was one suicide in a Northern Ireland prison establishment. There was none at young offenders centres and there are no remand establishments.

Suicide prevention in the Northern Ireland prison service establishments is being examined by a working group and as a result of the group's deliberations a comprehensive suicide prevention manual is in the course of preparation and will be issued shortly.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what grade is his Department's equal opportunities officer.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The equal opportunities unit of the Northern Ireland Civil Service is headed by a grade 7. The Home civil service group of the Northern Ireland Office also has an equal opportunities unit, headed by a grade 7.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many internal auditors are employed in his office and the departments for which he is responsible and at what cost; how many internal audit reports were produced in 1989; how many of these were drawn to the attention of a Minister in his Department; and what internal audit work is subcontracted to private firms and at what cost.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 7 March 1990]: The following information covers the Northern Ireland Office and the Police Authority (NI) as well as the six Northern Ireland Civil Service departmental internal audit groups. The full staffing complement at 1 March 1990 was 90. Departmental running costs for 1989-90 are £1,315,000.

There were 190 internal audit reports produced in 1989, of which one was brought to the attention of a Minister.

No internal audit work has been subcontracted to the private sector. However, one department has made extensive use of consultants in an advisory capacity at a cost of £54,000 in 1989.

Gaelic Athletic Association

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what level of grant in financial terms has been provided for the Gaelic Athletic Association in each of the last three years.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 7 March 1990]: Grants paid by the Department of Education and Sports Council for Northern Ireland to the Gaelic Athletic Association and its affiliated clubs were as follows:

	Financial year
	1986-87 (£)	1987-88 (£)	1988-89 (£)
Department of Education capital grant to affiliated GAA clubs	59,642	48,650	35,337
Sports Council for Northern Ireland
Club equipment grants	6,428	4,600	4,467
Administration coaching grants	13,979	21,966	18,995

Labour Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average length of time a person is unemployed in Northern Ireland; and how many are at present unemployed for less than (1) one year, (2) two years, (3) three years, (4) four years, (5) five years and (6) more than five years; and, in each group, how many are (a) male and (b) female.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The estimated average durations of unemployment for those unemployed at 11 January 1990 were as follows:

	Average duration in weeks[1]
Male	76
Female	34
Overall average	60

[1] Average duration is taken as the median duration i.e. the spell of unemployment which divides the unemployed into two halves; one half with durations greater than the median and the other half with durations less than the median.

Unemployment by sex and duration at 11 January 1990:

Duration of unemployment	Male	Female	Total
One year or less	32,066	15,225	47,291
Two years or less[2]	42,397	18,758	61,155
Three years or less[2]	48,706	20,404	69,110
Four years or less[2]	53,599	21,555	75,154
Five years or less[2]	57,759	22,432	80,191
Over five years	17,808	2,414	20,222

[2] These figures are not mutually exclusive. For example, the numbers unemployed three years or less are included in the numbers unemployed four years or less.

TRANSPORT

Transport Supplementary Grant

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report for each county highway authority the total net present value of those road projects qualifying for transport supplementary grants in the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins: The table below lists all county council highway schemes supported by transport supplementary grant (TSG) in 1989-90 and 1990-91 for which a net present value is available. It is not possible to produce an aggregate total for each authority because the costs and benefits are often based on, and discounted to, different years. A number of other schemes for which economic costs and benefits are not available is also supported with TSG.

Rail Travel Improvements

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the progress made on the plans to improve rail travel outlined in his answer of 16 November 1989, Official Report, column 398, in respect of the Westminster area.

Mr. Portillo: The LRT has now deposited a Bill in respect of the extension of the Jubilee line from Green Park to dockands and Stratford. The Bill provides for a Jubilee line station to be constructed at Westminster with a new ticket hall and interchange links to the existing District and Circle Lines. Detailed discussions are in progress with all relevant authorities and interested parties on this proposal and the impact of the construction works on the surrounding area.

My right hon. Friend recently gave the go-ahead for a contract worth over £50 million to refurbish 101 trains on London's Underground including all 44 on the Victoria line. London Underground also has an enormous programme of improvements which will increase the capacity and improve the environment of many of its stations, including Victoria.

Departmental Property

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many houses are in the ownership of his Department in each district in Greater Manchester; and what percentage of them are empty.

Mr. Atkins: The information is as follows:

District	Number of houses	Percentage empty
Wigan	9	44
Stockport	56	9
Manchester	43	2
Rochdale	53	5
Tameside	38	10
Oldham	108	16

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the additional expenditure schemes earmarked for Channel tunnel related roads in the county of Kent.

Mr. Atkins: Following are local road schemes, proposed by Kent county council in the context of the Channel tunnel, which my Department is supporting under the transport supplementary grant system with grant over and above that attracted by the county council's ordinary road building programme:

A2070 Ashford South Orbital
A2070 Beaver Road Diversion
A2070 Hamstreet Bypass
A2070 South Ashford to Hamstreet
A2070 Stockbridge to Brenzett
A256 Whitfield Bypass
A256 Whitfield to Eastry
A256 Eastry Bypass
A260 Denton/Selsted Bypass
A260 Densole/Hawkinge Bypass

Our very substantial trunk road programme in Kent, valued at about £678 million (November 1987 prices) would be necessary with or without a Channel tunnel.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the Channel tunnel working group's forecasts and report on traffic data and the effects of the Channel tunnel on traffic demand, together with the assumptions upon which they are based.

Mr. Atkins: I am making arrangements for copies of the Channel tunnel traffic working group's report, dated June 1986, to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies are being undertaken in his Department on estimating road traffic growth following the Channel tunnel opening in summer 1993.

Mr. Atkins: The net extra traffic resulting from the completion of the Channel tunnel is not expected to be significant compared with forecast traffic growth generally. Therefore, no specific studies relating to the opening of the tunnel are planned. However, my Department has established the cross-Channel traffic group to produce an up-to-date estimate of all cross-Channel traffic in 1993 and beyond on the main road network in the south-east. General traffic growth will continue to be monitored in the normal way.

Traffic Counts

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidelines his Department issues for the inclusion of cyclists in traffic counts.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 13 March 1990]: For the purposes of the national traffic census the Department's standard rules on traffic counting are those published in statistics bulletin (88)32 "Description of Vehicles for Traffic Counting Purposes"—a copy is in the Library. Pedal cycles and motor cycles are included as separate categories of vehicle.

The same guidelines are used in the Department's traffic appraisal manual, though for most cost-benefit analyses prepared for the Department data on cycle and motor cycle traffic are not required and, therefore, may not be collected.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department undertakes traffic counts at weekends.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Yes. In particular, regular weekend counts classified by type of vehicle are carried out at 163 sites throughout Great Britain for the national traffic census. A number of other sites are monitored at weekends by automatic traffic data counting systems which collect unclassified data on the total flow of vehicles.

THE ARTS

Art Treasures

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will give details of items currently included on the decided list of art treasures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 12 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on 28 February 1990, Official Report, column 200.

CIVIL SERVICE

Disabled Employees

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many Government Departments ensure that at least 3 per cent. of their employees are registered disabled people.

Mr. Luce: All Government Departments aim to employ at least a 3 per cent. quota of people who are registered as disabled. On 1 June 1989 five Departments had met this target. A further four Departments employed over 2·5 per cent. of people registered as disabled. Figures showing the proportion of staff who are registered as disabled in each Department are presented annually in the civil service magazine Independent, copies of which I am placing in the Libraries of the House.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Property Law

Mr. French: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the effects of section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has received four representations from practitioners and an academic about the effect of section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989. In general terms these raised the following matters: (1) options (2) security documents (3) equitable charges (4) contracts by exchange of correspondence. The Lord Chancellor is satisfied that no amendment to section 2 is required in the light of these representations.

Mr. French: To ask the Attorney-General if he will bring forward amendments to section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 so that it does not apply to the exercise of an option on property granted after 27 September 1989.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has no plans to bring forward amendments to section 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Atrazine

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he will take to limit the use of the chemical atrazine.

Mr. Maclean: The use of atrazine is already restricted under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986. The Advisory Committee on Pesticides is at present reviewing atrazine and could if necessary recommend to Ministers that these conditions should be amended.

Poultry Flocks

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his Department will be issuing details of the regulations for registration by poultry flocks; and what is the date by which registration is required.

Mr. Maclean: The Poultry Laying Flocks (Testing and Registration etc.) Order 1989 and the Poultry Breeding Flocks and Hatcheries (Registration and Testing) Order 1989 came into operation on 26 October 1989 apart from the registration requirement which applies from 2 April. Details of the arrangements were circulated on a wide scale in October, registration application forms have been circulated and a reminder about registration will be issued shortly.

Mineral Water

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the accuracy of the description of Perrier water as a naturally carbonated mineral water.

Mr. Maclean: The conditions which have to be met by water labelled as naturally carbonated natural mineral water are laid down in annex I, part III, of Council directive 80/777/EEC. Information which came to light during the recent Perrier contamination incident raises a number of questions on the labelling of this natural mineral water and I have asked my officials to write to the European Commission seeking clarification.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the provision in the European Communities directive which permits bottled water not to have the full chemical analysis printed on the label.

Mr. Maclean: Article 7(2) of directive 80/777/EEC requires labels on natural mineral waters either to bear a declaration of the water's analytical composition or to state that the composition is in accordance with the results of the official analysis. A proposal to require the mandatory declaration of information on the analytical composition has already been made and the United Kingdom Government will press for such a proposal as being more informative to consumers.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will raise with the European Communities Commission the question of mineral water purity and labelling.

Mr. Maclean: The European Commission has already indicated that it intends to review Council directive 80/777/EEC and has asked member states for comments. Purity and labelling issues will likely be part of the review.

Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether describing the practice of the removal of carbon dioxide from water, its cleaning and then reinjection under pressure as naturally carbonated complies with the labelling rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Council directive 80/777/EEC defines naturally carbonated natural mineral water as "water whose content of carbon dioxide from the spring after decanting, if any, and bottling is the same as at source, taking into account where appropriate the reintroduction of a quantity of carbon dioxide from the same water table or deposit equivalent to that released in the course of those operations and subject to the usual technical tolerances".

I have asked my officials to write to the European Commission to seek clarification on exactly how this provision operates when gas and water are extracted separately at the source and subsequently mixed during bottling.

Rabies

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any contingency plans for the use of vaccinations of wild animals acting as vectors of rabies in the event of an outbreak in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Oral vaccination of wildlife is not appropriate in a rabies-free country. In the unlikely event of an outbreak in wildlife in the United Kingdom control measures would concentrate on the destruction of foxes in the infected area.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he proposes to report on his review of maneb, mancozeb and zineb.

Mr. Maclean: The report on immediate concerns was published on 31 January. The report of the ongoing review of remaining areas will be published as soon as possible.

Animal Waste

Mr. Hind: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes have been made in the temperature levels defined as appropriate for the heat treatment of animal waste since 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have strict controls which apply to animal protein processors' handling of animal waste, principally to minimise the risk of salmonella contamination, but it has never laid down specific heat treatment requirements.

Commercial technological developments led to a move away from batch processing to continuous rendering. Both batch and continuous systems operate at a range of temperatures; batch between 100 and 150 deg. C, and continuous between 100 and 145 deg. C.

Livestock (Transit Care)

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the trade in horsemeat betwen the United Kingdom and Europe in respect of the care of horses and other livestock in transit, and on any breaches of standards of care of animals; and if he has any proposals under consideration to bring this trade to an end.

Mr. Maclean: In 1989 the United Kingdom exported 1,932 tonnes of meat derived from horses and other equines, valued at £2·85 million. There is no reason to end this trade. In Community negotiations we shall, however, press to retain existing controls designed to prevent the export of live horses and ponies for slaughter.

Artificial Flavourings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 28 February, Official Report, column 242, if he will introduce legislation to replace the legal term "flavour" with the term "artificial flavour" to assist consumers seeking to avoid the use of artificial flavourings.

Mr. Maclean: No. I believe that the term "artificial flavour" instead of "flavour" would not necessarily help consumers and might be misleading. While the term "strawberry flavour," for example, indicates that the flavour does not come wholly or mainly from strawberries, some of it may come from strawberries and the rest might come from other natural flavourings. The European Commission is, however, expected to make proposals on the labelling of flavourings in food and I shall be pressing for terminology which enables consumers to make an informed choice.

Fish and Cetaceans (Disease)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if there is any evidence of a change in the levels of disease suffered by fish or cetaceans in British coastal waters.

Mr. Curry: Disease levels in marine fish populations have been found to fluctuate from year to year and in some cases seasonally, but there is no clear evidence of a long-term trend of changing levels of disease in fish. There has been no comprehensive collection of data on the incidence of disease in cetaceans, but I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is considering new research projects on cetaceans and marine mammals, including post-mortem analysis for stranded cetaceans and other marine animals found on our shores.

Salmonella

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many laying breeding flocks in Britain have now been found to have been carrying salmonella enteritidis, and in what regions of the United Kingdom these flocks were found.

Mr. Maclean: Salmonella enteritidis has been isolated from one layer breeder flock located in south-west England.

Eggs

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the production and sale by month over the last 12 months of British eggs; and what was the level of importation and sale month by month of eggs from overseas during the same period.

Mr. Curry: The latest monthly data for throughput at packing stations in Great Britain (that is excluding Northern Ireland) and in the United Kingdom and for imports into the United Kingdom are as follows. Figures are not collected on sales of eggs.

WALES

Cancer Treatment

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many responses in total have been submitted to date on the review of the provision of cancer treatment services for the people of north Wales; and how many favour option 4.

Mr. Grist: Of the 18 responses to consultation received by 9 March, eight have specified a preference for a radiotherapy unit in north Wales (option 4).

Roads

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received from the local highway authority and others concerning the provision of a pedestrian crossing on the A487(T) at Tremadog; and what response he has made.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Three. The request for a pedestrian crossing was refused but Gwynedd county council has been asked to prepare a scheme to improve pedestrian safety by widening the footpath and reducing the width of the carriageway thus making crossing easier.

Special Educational Needs

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children received a statement of special educational needs in each year from 1984 to 1989 in each local education authority in Wales; and what is each figure as a percentage of all pupils in maintained schools in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Data for 1989 are not yet available. Prior to 1986 information in the form requested was not collected centrally. Information for 1986, 1987 and 1988 is shown in the table:

Children who received a statement of special educational need[1]

West Glamorgan	274	0·5	234	0·4	304	0·5

[1] The figures shown indicate the number of children, in each calendar year, for whom statements of special education need were made for the first time.

Storm Damage

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional finance he will give to borough councils, additional to the Bellwin formula, in north Clwyd consequent upon the February storms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Bellwin scheme represents an entirely appropriate and adequate Government response to the additional costs incurred by local authorities in dealing with emergencies. In view of the scale of the emergency, and the very high expenditure being incurred by the local councils directly affected by the recent flooding in north Wales, I am pleased to say that the rate of grant payable has, exceptionally, been increased to 85 per cent. of eligible expenditure. I have, in addition, announced a Government contribution of £150,000 to the appeal funds launched locally.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide help to farmers in north Wales whose land has been affected by sea water.

Mr. Peter Walker: It is too early to assess the full extent of the damage to farms in the affected areas. However, it is clear that immediate steps must be taken to counter the damaging effects of prolonged sea water flooding of agricultural land by the application of gypsum. In these wholly exceptional circumstances my Department will meet the costs of this measure and ADAS will provide free advice. Farmers will also be advised of the assistance available under existing grant schemes to help meet the costs of other work that may be necessary.

Parliamentary approval to this exceptional measure will be sought in a revised estimate for the agricultural services, support for the fishing industry, regional and industrial development, Wales vote 2 (class XVI vote 2, 1990-91).

Cash Limits

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes making any further cash limits changes.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. Provision for regional enterprise grants on class XVII, vote 2, is being reduced by £500,000 and the cash limit reduced from £86,448,000 to £85,948,000. This reduction will provide the necessary public expenditure cover for a temporary borrowing facility required by the Development Board for Rural Wales to meet its expenditure commitments during the remainder of the current financial year. The facility will not add to the board's overall resources but will ease its cash flow position pending the settlement of a substantial claim for repayment of VAT from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise not now expected until the next financial year.

Community Charge

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if women's refuges in Wales are exempted from collective community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment on 8 March, Official Report, column 799.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from companies about the additional burden of cost and administration to be placed on them under the terms of the Community Charges (Administration and Enforcement Regulations) 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received no such representations.

Community Care

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all working papers, implementation documents, consultative documents, departmental circulars, and other publications, whether in draft or final form, that have been issued to date in respect of Wales regarding (a) National Health Service matters and (b) care in the community matters arising from the National Health Service and Community Care Bill, the Government's White Papers on these topics, and associated Government initiatives.

Health Service

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy that all working papers, implementation documents, consultative documents, departmental circulars and other publications in regard to the implementation of (a) the National Health Service aspects and (b) the care in the community aspects of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill and the associated White Papers in Wales shall be numbered sequentially and shall be available in the Vote Office and the Library, together with a comprehensive list of all such publications which is brought up to date from time to time.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 6 March 1990]: The Department's policy of providing the Vote Office and Library with copies of all major consultation documents, circulars, and other papers on National Health Service and community care issues will continue. Lists of such documents together with any other associated publications will be available in the Library and updated quarterly. The documents are not produced in a single series, so sequential numbering would not be appropriate.

Acute Myeloid Leukaemia

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has made an assessment of the incidence of acute myeloid leukaemia among telegraph, radio and radar operators; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: A limited review undertaken in 1988 suggests that there may be a small increase in relative risk of acute myeloid leukaemia for telegraph, radio and radar operators. I am not aware of any current studies on this topic.

Gateshead Garden Festival

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assistance his Department is making available to NGF(90)Ltd., organisers of the Gateshead garden festival, for the employment and training of unemployed people during the festival; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I am making arrangements so that the organisers may employ and train up to 1,140 unemployed people during the festival from public funds. Parliamentary approval to this provision will be sought in a supplementary estimate for the Department of Employment's training and enterprise programmes vote (class VI vote 1). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £2·7 million will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many nationalised industries and public authorities ensure that at least 3 per cent. of their employees are registered disabled people.

Mr. Eggar: The figures showing the quota position of a range of individual public sector employers are published with their agreement in the Employment Gazette. In June 1989, the latest date for which figures are available, 26 of these firms employed 3 per cent. or more registered people with disabilities.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions there have been in the last 15 years against employers who fail to fulfil their obligations under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There have been three prosecutions in the last 15 years against employers who have failed to fulfil their obligations under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944. The policy of successive Governments has been to use education and persuasion to secure and improve the policies and practices of all employers in relation to the employment of people with disabilities and to bring prosecutions only as a last resort.

Wages Councils

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the statistics on wages council employment and compliance with wages council rates in 1989, in the same format as in the reply given on 1 March 1989, Official Report, columns 201-06.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is given in the following tables:

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will update the information given in his answer of 1 March 1989, Official Report, columns 201-02, with the levels of employment in each wages council for 1988 and 1989; and if he will explain the methodology behind the collation of these statistics.

Mr. Nicholls: No new estimates have been made. The figures given in the answer of 1 March 1989, as in earlier answers, were based essentially on data collected by wages inspectors in the course of inspections, supplemented where appropriate by other information obtained from employers in the trades concerned and such published material as is relevant.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the number of employees, broken down into full-timers and part-timers who are (a) under 18 years, (b) 18 years and over and (c) 21 years old and over in the following standard industrial classifications (i) zero to nine, (ii) one to five, (iii) two to four, (iv) six to nine, (v) zero, (vi) 43, (vii) 45, (viii) 6, (ix) 64 and 65 and their subgroups, (x) 66 and its subgroups, (xi) eight, (xii) 91, (xiii) 92, (xiv) 93, (xv) 95, (xvi) 96, (xvii) 97 and (xviii) 98.

Mr. Nicholls: Preliminary results from the 1989 labour force survey, as requested, are shown in the table.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the January unemployment percentage figure in the Ashford travel-to-work area for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Nicholls: The information in the following table is available from the Library and is affected by seasonal influences, changes to the count, and a redefinition of travel-to-work areas.

"Narrow-based" unadjusted unemployment rates in Ashford travel-to-work area[1]: January each year

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 12 March 1990]: There were no fees paid to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Employment Department Group (excluding the Training Agency) in the financial period from 1979-80 to 1987-88 inclusive.

Fees to the value of £369,000 were incurred in 1988-89.

Costs incurred by the Employment Department Group in connection with the privatisation programme in 1989-90 and 1990-91 will be reported to Parliament in due course in the usual way.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Expenditure on management consultancy in the Employment Department Group (excluding the Training Agency) in each year from 1984-85 to 1988-89 was as follows:

	£ thousands
1984-85	237
1985-86	174
1986-87	629
1987-88	415
1988-89	783

The estimated outturn for the current year (1989-90) is £1,412,000 and the budget for 1990-91 is expected to be around £1·3 million.

SCOTLAND

Homelessness

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department has recently gathered regarding the total number of homeless people who (a) have no home or family to go back to, (b) have been forced to leave home by an adult member of the family, (c) left home after being abused or fearing abuse by another member of the family and (d) could safely return to their families; and what use he makes of this information in shaping his (1) housing and (2) social security policies.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The homelessness statistics collected by the Scottish Development Department relate to households which apply to local authorities under the provisions of part II of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. For each applicant, the returns record information including the reason given for becoming homeless. Information in the detail requested is not available. However, on the basis of the returns, in 1988-89, 37 per cent. of applicants gave as their reason for homelessness that friends or relatives were no longer willing or able to accommodate them; 14 per cent. said they had had a violent dispute with the spouse or co-habitee.

The Government take account of all relevant available information in formulating their policies. Social security matters are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Ticket Touts

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to increase the powers of the police to deal with ticket touting.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Ticket touting can in certain circumstances already lead to an offence in Scotland under section 55 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. The Government are currently considering whether existing powers under the 1982 Act are adequate.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to introduce legislation to make ticket touting illegal.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A review of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 is already under way and the Government are currently considering whether the existing powers under this Act relating to the activity of ticket touting are adequate.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission a study into ticket touting at major sporting events.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will discuss ticket touting at major sporting events when he next meets the chief constables of Strathclyde and of Midlothian and the Borders.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will discuss ticket touting when he next meets the chairman of the Scottish Sports Council.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so.

White Fish

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total value at first sale of the main species of white fish landed into Scotland by United Kingdom vessels in January 1990 and the corresponding figure for January 1989.

Mr. Lang: The provisional value of cod, haddock, whiting and saithe landed by United Kingdom vessels in Scotland in January 1990 was £7·4 million, compared with £7·1 million in January 1989. The value of these landings therefore increased by 4 per cent. despite the reduction of 26 per cent. in the volume landed. Unit prices increased by as much as 57 per cent. in the case of whiting and 53 per cent. in the case of haddock.

Surgery (Fatalities)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the death rate for ruptured aortic aneurysm operations in (a) the Inverclyde Royal hospital, Greenock, for each of the past eight years and (b) other hospitals in Scotland for the same years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The death rate for ruptured aortic aneurysm operations in both Inverclyde Royal hospital, Greenock and other hospitals in Scotland over the past eight years is shown in the table. In Scotland 66·2 per cent. of cases result in death, compared with 62·5 per cent. in the Inverclyde royal hospital at Greenock.

[1] Patients at Inverclyde Royal suffering from Aortic Aneurysm are not transferred to other facilities but elsewhere in Scotland they are. The records of transferred patients could only be correlated at disproportionate cost; therefore numbers of deaths have been compared in each case with the known outcomes of patients being discharged from or dying in the same unit.

Heart Disease

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the research projects on heart diseases carried out or sponsored by his Department for each year since 1975.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have made any representations to the Government of Iraq about the refusal to permit the editor of The Observer to attend the trial of Farzad Bazoft in Baghdad.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Deputy Secretaries

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the responsibilities of each of the deputy secretaries in his Department and the numbers and grades of staff reporting to each.

Mr. Maude: There are seven deputy secretaries in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, six in the diplomatic wing and one in the ODA. Broad areas of responsibility are as follows. A full range of diplomatic service grades (senior grade to DS10), specialist staff, secretaries and certain home civil service grades report to each diplomatic wing deputy secretary. Numbers of staff in London reporting to each are indicated in brackets.

(i) Europe and the United Nations (129);
(ii) Commercial and certain functional areas including scientific environmental departments (129);
(iii) Public related (e.g. consular, migration and visa) and administration departments (2,717);
(iv) Geographical departments covering the Americas, Asia and the Pacific (144);
(v) Geographical departments covering Africa and the Middle East (113);
(vi) Remaining political departments including areas such as security and defence (97).

A few specialist departments are not under the remit of a deputy secretary, for example legal advisers. Others are under the direct authority of the permanent under-secretary, for example research and economic advisers. Staff in these total 251.

The ODA's one deputy secretary is responsible for all expenditure, both bilateral and multilateral, under the aid programme. The ODA's operations are managed by 625 staff at home and 52 staff overseas across a full range of grades.

Guatemala

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary with the Foreign Minister of Guatemala.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met Mr. Rivera on Monday 19 February. They discussed bilateral relations, human rights and Belize.

West Bank and Gaza

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of Israel concerning the continued closure of six universities in the West Bank and Gaza strip; and what response he has received.

Mr. Waldegrave: We take every opportunity to urge the Israelis to allow all higher education institutions in the occupied territories to reopen. I reiterated our concern to the Israeli Minister without Portfolio, Mr. Olmert, on 5 March.

Katyn Massacre

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress on his Department's studies into the responsibility for the Katyn massacre.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are following developments closely. There is substantial circumstantial evidence pointing to Soviet responsibility for the Katyn massacre. We urge the Soviet authorities to help establish the facts quickly.

South Africa

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the British companies that have invested in South Africa for each of the past 10 years; and how much investment in pounds sterling that has amounted to.

Mr Redwood: I have been asked to reply.

Under the Statistics of Trade Act 1947, the names of United Kingdom companies which furnish such information are confidential. The most recent estimate (end of 1987) of the book value of United Kingdom direct investment in South Africa is £1,821 million.

ENVIRONMENT

Uniform Business Rate

106. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the impact of the unified business rate on small business growth in the midlands.

107. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the impact of the unified business rate on small business growth in the midlands.

Mr. Chope: The uniform business rate and the non-domestic revaluation do not come into effect until 1 April 1990, but when they do, average non-domestic rate bills will fall in real terms by 6 per cent. in the west midlands and 4 per cent. in the east midlands in 1990-91 and, once transition to the new system is complete, by 28 per cent. and 15 per cent. respectively. This will be a stimulus to business growth.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the new money recently announced for inner cities is to go to the London borough of Newham.

Mr. David Hunt: Spending on the programmes which come within the "Action for Cities" initiative is planned to increase by £500 million in 1990-91 to a total of around £4 billion. It is not possible to estimate the amount which will be spent in any individual local authority's area.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reform the community charge system in England to enable the amount of revenue support grant attributable to county and district councils respectively to be separately identified either on the basis that it is currently separately identified in Wales or on the basis that it is currently separately identified for regional and district councils in Scotland.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 12 March 1990]: No.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reproduce in the Official Report the full calculation underlying his reply to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling on 12 February, Official Report, column 58, that under the community charge system about 15 times as much will be contributed to the cost of local government by the top 10 per cent. of householders by income compared with the poorest 10 per cent.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 7 March 1990]: I will write to my right hon. Friend.

Council Rents

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Government have to alleviate the effects of recent increases in council rents.

Mr. Chope: It is for local authorities to determine their own rent levels. The Government allocate sufficient HRA subsidy to enable council rents to be set at reasonable levels. Rent rebates give assistance to those who need it.

Electromagnetic Fields

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce controls relating to exposure levels within electromagnetic fields.

Mr. Trippier: I have no plans at present to introduce specific controls relating to the exposure to electromagnetic fields.

USSR (Exposure Levels)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the permitted exposure levels to microwave and RF EM fields in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Trippier: I understand that the NRPB is currently assessing all the available biological and epidemiological evidence and will be publishing an assessment during the year.

Water Flotation (Cost)

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the full cost of the flotation of the water industry including (a) the total cost to public funds of advertising and (b) the total cost to public funds in fees to City advisers, will be available to Parliament.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Figures for overall costs to the Government are being compiled and will be reported shortly.

Acid Mist (Lincolnshire and Norfolk)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has investigated the causes of the acid mist that blighted acres of hawthorn trees in Lincolnshire and Norfolk on 9 September 1989.

Mr. Trippier: My Department commissioned the scientists who were working on the Halvergate marshes at the time to collect all available information and to report on the acid mist incident. The report is expected soon and I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

Energy Conservation

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures are being taken to alert builders erecting or converting homes of the need to conserve energy; and whether he intends to introduce any regulations to ensure that builders respond to such needs.

Mr. Chope: The Building Regulations 1985 already include requirements relating to energy conservation measures in new buildings and extensions. The Building Regulations (Amendment) Regulations 1989, which are due to come into force on 1 April, will make the existing requirements more stringent, and the changes have been widely publicised.

Disabled People

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which voluntary organisations he consulted on "Local Government and Housing Act 1989: Implementation of Part VIII, House Adaptations for Disabled People".

Mr. Chope: We made copies of a draft of a circular entitled "House Adaptations for Disabled People" generally available, and welcomed comments from any organisation or individual with an interest. We specifically sought the views of:

The British Council of Organisations of Disabled People
The Royal Association of Disability and Rehabilitation
"Panel of Four" c/o Royal National Institute for the Deaf
Royal National Institute for the Blind
Access Committee for England
The Centre on Environment for the Handicapped MIND MENCAP
The Disability Income Group
National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux Shelter
Age Concern

Sewage Disposal

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to prohibit the use of long sea outfalls for sewage disposal in the Bristol channel and set a date for this prohibition.

Mr. Trippier: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 5 March, the Government have decided that in general municipal sewage should receive secondary treatment, but that primary treatment would be more appropriate for discharges to coastal waters, where it can be shown that this does not adversely affect the environment, Official Report, volume 168, column 452.

It will be for the National Rivers Authority to implement this policy by using its powers to consent discharges.

Waste Recycling

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to conduct a survey, similar to the one initiated by his Department called "Survey of Local Authority Domestic Waste Recycling Activity", directed at the recycling industry, to assess its view of waste recycling capability and potential.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Yes.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his reply of 5 March, Official Report, column 448, how many display signs were purchased by the Leeds development corporation for the £26,500 referred to in that reply; and how many of those signs are still in place.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Leeds development corporation's expenditure on display signs of £26,500 since designation in June 1988 covers design work, materials and erection costs. Some 40 signs have been purchased and erected during that period, including 10 replacements. Thirty are currently in place, of which two have recently been blown down and two affected by storm damage. Work is in hand by the corporation to reinstate these signs.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the main items of expenditure by the Leeds development corporation under the budget heading of £320,000 in 1989-90 and £480,000 in 1990-91 for promotion and publicity.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The key objective of Leeds development corporation's promotion and publicity budget is to promote the economic regeneration of the Leeds urban development area. The main items of expenditure are the promotion and marketing of the urban development area and of Leeds in general; the promotion and marketing of specific sites; exhibition material; keeping the local community informed of the development corporation's activities, including a bi-annual newspaper; community sponsorship; and the production of an annual report.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those properties currently vested in the London residuary body for which he has refused consent to its sale to the relevant London borough under section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972; and if he will state the date and the reasons for refusal in each case.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: An application by the London residuary body for consent to the sale of 67-69 Cowcross street, London EC1 to the London borough of Islington was refused on 26 February 1990 for the reasons given in my letter of the same date to the hon. Member. No other properties currently vested in the London residuary body have been refused for disposal under section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Lakes

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what assessment has been made of the effects of agricultural uses of fertiliser on British lakes in increasing nitrogen and phosphate contents;

(2) what assessment has been made of the effects of eutrophication on species diversity in British lakes; and what steps are being taken to reduce eutrophication;

(3) what studies his Department has made into the eutrophication of British lakes; and what causes of eutrophication have been identified.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 13 March 1990]: A number of surveys have been carried out in recent years by the water authorities into the eutrophication of British waters. These have concluded that eutrophication is not increasing in the United Kingdom and is limited to a small number of areas, for example, the Norfolk Broads, Loch Leven and Lake Windermere. In nearly all cases it is phosphorus which is the cause of eutrophication. To reduce eutrophication action is best taken at local level because the sources contributing to excess nutrients vary from place to place. Phosphorus stripping at sewage works is nearly always an effective control option.

Coniferous Afforestation

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department has about the acidification of upland soils and waterways by coniferous afforestation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 13 March 1990]: A number of recent reviews and reports on the relationship between coniferous afforestation and possible acidification of upland soils and waterways have been placed in the Library of the House. They include;

(i) The United Kingdom Acid Waters Review Group Second Report "Acidity In United Kingdom Freshwaters" December 1988.

(ii) "Lake Acidification in the United Kingdom" prepared for the Department of the Environment by the Paleoecology Research Unit, University College of London.

(iii) "Acidification in Scotland" Symposium Proceedings, 8th November 1988, published by the Scottish Development Department, December 1989.

(iv) "Acid Waters in Wales" by Edwards, Stoner and Gee, Welsh National Rivers Authority, March 1990.

(v) "Forests and Surface Water Acidification", Forestry Commission Bulletin No. 86, March 1990.

Additional information on this issue is also available from a number of research projects being funded by the NERC, DOE and CEGB.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Productivity

108. Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the trends of manufacturing industry productivity over the last 12 months.

Mr. Lamont: Indices of United Kingdom manufacturing productivity can be found on the CSO databank, which is accessible through the House of Commons Library.

Interest Rates

109. Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of interest rates on manufacturing industry.

110. Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of interest rates on manufacturing industry.

111. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of interest rates on manufacturing industry.

114. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of interest rates on manufacturing industry.

116. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of interest rates on manufacturing industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Interest rates have been set at their current level to put downward pressure on inflation. Inflation is the greatest threat to the future prosperity of manufacturing industry.

113. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from small businesses on interest rates.

115. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations have been made to him concerning the effect of the present level of interest rates on the costs of manufacturing industry.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has received a number of such representations.

Exchange Rate

112. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from small businesses on the exchange rate.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations.

Balance of Trade

117. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the trade deficit.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend receives a few letters each month from members of the public concerning the trade deficit.

Imports

118. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest trends in imports.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the three months to January, import volumes (less oil and erratics) were 1 per cent. lower than in the previous three months, and only 2 per cent. higher than in the same period a year earlier. This is clear evidence that imports are responding to the tightening of policy.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 21 December 1989, Official Report, columns 368-69, on mortgage interest tax relief and investment income, whether he will provide for 1989-90 the numbers in each range of income with investment income of more than £200 and less than £500, and those with investment income of more than £500.

Mr. Lilley: The information requested is in the table. These estimates are provisional and subject to revision.

Range of total income (£)	Numbers with annual investment income of more than £200, but less than £500 (thousands)	more than £500 (thousands)

Estimates are based on the 1987 family expenditure survey and the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes projected to 1989-90.

Taxes and Benefits

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the table in the answer to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 10 January 1989, Official Report, columns 632-34, stating the effects at different income levels of alternative policies based on Exchequer expenditure equal to a 1p cut in income tax.

Mr. Lilley: The effects of the various changes to income tax and child benefit on a married man with two children are shown in the table. Each of the changes would cost £1·7 billion a year, that is the cost in a full year of a 1p cut in the basic rate of income tax. Estimates are based on projections of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes in line with forecasts in the Autumn Statement.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of manufacturing investment.

119. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of manufacturing investment.

120. Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of manufacturing investment.

121. Mr. Bell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of manufacturing investment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Manufacturing investment reached a record level in 1989 after six years of growth averaging 8 per cent.

Foreign-owned Companies

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what profits and other capital payments have been remitted back to the host country from Britain from foreign-owned concerns for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest available information on profits and capital flows remitted back to the host country by foreign-owned concerns in the United Kingdom is given in table 2·1 of Business Monitor MA4 "Overseas Transactions 1987". The relevant items in net earnings and net direct investment are:

(i) interest paid to, net of interest received from, overseas parent companies;
(ii) dividends paid to overseas parent companies;
(iii) net profits from United Kingdom branches;
(iv) disposals of United Kingdom companies' share and loan capital.

In addition, the categories "increase in amount due to overseas parent on inter-company account" and "increase in indebtedness to overseas parent companies on branch head office account" may include indistinguishably certain capital flows from United Kingdom subsidiaries, associates and branches to their overseas direct investors.

Inflation

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to align with the practice in other European Community countries in calculating inflation.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has no plans to do so at present. The practices followed in compiling consumer prices indices vary between Community countries. The United Kingdom regularly joins in discussions with other members with a view to understanding the differences in methodology. When changes in the retail prices index have been proposed they have always been considered by the RPI advisory committee and due account taken then of practice elsewhere.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers paid capital gains tax in 1987-88.

Mr. Lilley: The number of individuals and trusts who have a liability to pay capital gains tax from gains on disposals made in 1987-88 is provisionally estimated at 170,000.

Investment

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the business fixed investment figures in the United Kingdom for the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest annual data for business investment are:

	£ billion 1985 prices
1984	36·9
1985	39·7
1986	39·5
1987	43·7
1988	51·4

In the five years to 1988 (1983-88) business investment grew by over 50 per cent. in real terms.

Currency

Mr. Robert Sheldon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce a £100 note.

Mr. Major: The Bank of England is responsible for the note issue. It has no plans to introduce a £100 note.

Capital Investment

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures on capital investment by business.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Business investment was 12¼ per cent. higher in real terms in the first three quarters of 1989 than in the same period in 1988. In the two years to 1988 business investment grew by over 30 per cent.

Taxation

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (a) whether he will raise the income limits which govern the Inland Revenue's practice for remitting arrears of tax where information provided to the Revenue had not been used within a reasonable time and (b) what are the implications of independent taxation for the income limits.

Mr. Lilley: I am pleased to announce that limits are to be increased from today. From 6 April 1990 the income scale will apply separately to the incomes of husbands and wives.

(a) The Inland Revenue's practice of remitting tax in cases where the Department has not made timely use of information available is set out in a White Paper of July 1971 (first report from the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration: Session 1970-71: Cmnd 4729). The proportion of arrears collected varies according to the size of the taxpayer's gross income; the balance of the arrear is remitted.

The new scale of limits will apply to arrears of tax, the actual of likely amount of which is first notified to the taxpayer of his agent on or after today.

New scale Gross income £	Percentage of arrears remitted	Old scale Gross income £
0 to 12,000	All	0 to 8,500
12,001 to 14,500	0·75	8,501 to 10,500
14,501 to 18,500	0·50	10,501 to 13,500
18,501 to 22,000	0·25	13,501 to 16,000
22,001 to 32,000	0·10	16,001 to 23,000
Over 32,000	None	Over 23,000

For taxpayers aged 65 or over or who are in receipt of the national insurance retirement or widows' pension each of the bands is increased by the following:

Pensioners addition to each band
New scale £	Old scale £
3,300	2,500

If a taxpayer in this category has gross income of £15,300 or less the whole of the arrear will be remitted, whilst some remission will be allowed on gross income up to £35,300.

(b) At present income limits for the purposes of the concession apply equally to a single person or the joint incomes of a husband and wife. With the introduction of independent taxation the income scale will apply only to the spouse assessed.

This new rule will apply to arrears of tax, the actual or likely amount of which is notified to a taxpayer on or after 6 April 1990.

ECOFIN

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council.

Mr. Ryder: The ECOFIN Council met in Brussels on 12 March. Before the formal meeting of the Council, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer attended the lunch at which prospects for Germany monetary union were discussed. The Chancellor also stressed the importance of making good progress in establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and emphasised the attractions of London as its location.

During the formal Council, I represented the United Kingdom. A common position was established on the proposal to revise the financial perspective which sets out EC budgetary ceilings. A Council declaration identifying areas in which further measures against EC budget fraud are needed was also agreed. I stressed the importance of simplifying the relevant EC legislation, improving reporting by member states and agreeing on administrative sanctions. The Court of Auditors' annual report for 1988 formed the basis of an agreed opinion on the discharge of the 1988 budget.

Revised Council decisions on the promotion of economic convergence and co-operation between central banks during stage 1 of EMU were formally adopted, and the Council took note of reports on multilateral surveillance of member states' economies during stage 1 from the monetary committee, the economic policy committee and the committee of central bank governors. I also stressed the need for early proposals from the Commission and a discussion in the Council on technical VAT and statistics systems after 1992.

Consumer Spending

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the retail price index takes full account of the increase since 1979 in (i) imputed rent and (ii) mortgage interest given in the reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 19 February, Official Report, column 524-25, concerning consumer's expenditure detailed in table 1.6 of the Monthly Digest of Statistics.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 7 March 1990]: Imputed rents have not been used as a measure of owner-occupiers' housing costs in the retail prices index since 1975. They were then replaced by mortgage interest payments following a standardised formulation recommended by the Retail Prices Index Advisory Committee.

Female Earnings

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women in work, and how many of those with children under five, have earnings below £8,500.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 7 March 1990]: Information on the distribution of weekly earnings of women in employment is published in the 1989 new earnings survey report and information on dependent children of women in work is given in chapter 9 of the report on the 1987 general household survey. Further information is not available.

Public Sector Asset Creation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will extend the series of total public sector asset creation as given in table 21.2.15 of the public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 1021, as far back as possible both in cash and in 1988-89 prices.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 8 March 1990]: Information on total public sector asset creation is available for the years since 1978-79 and is given in table 21.2.16 of chapter 21 of the 1990 public expenditure White Paper in both cash and real terms (1988-89 prices).

Pay Figures

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide the pay figures for the financial year 1983-84, and as far back as is possible, on the same basis as those figures given in table 21.02.13 of Cm. 1021; if these figures, are available on a quarterly basis; and where both sets of data are published.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 9 March 1990]: Figures on a consistent basis with those given in table 21.2.13 are not readily available for earlier years. Calendar years figures for general government expenditure on wages and salaries and so on, consistent with table 9.4 of the 1989 edition of the "United Kingdom National Accounts" (the CSO Blue Book), are given in the table. These data are not on exactly the same basis as that provided in the public expenditure White Paper.

	£ million
1961	2,534
1962	2,722
1963	2,929
1964	3,161
1965	3,473
1966	3,778
1967	4,083
1968	4,382
1969	4,690
1970	5,402
1971	6,372
1972	7,460
1973	8,423
1974	10,556
1975	14,815
1976	16,907
1977	18,281
1978	20,377
1979	23,258
1980	29,469
1981	33,577
1982	35,773
1983	39,060
1984	41,271
1985	43,695
1986	46,896
1987	50,914
1988	55,219

The CSO figures are higher than those in the public expenditure White Paper mainly because the former include with wages and salaries and so on, the pension increase elements of pensions paid to members of the teachers' and NHS superannuation schemes and payments to community programme participants engaged by local authorities.

Quarterly figures on either basis are not available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The expenditure for 1988-89 is £548,264, the estimated expenditure for the current year is £550,525 and the budget provision for 1990-91 is £599,680. Comparable figures for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 are not available because of the machinery of Government changes, and could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising,

(c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The expenditure for 1988-89 is £49,310 and the estimated expenditure for 1989-90 is £52,486, none of which is on television or radio advertising; the 1990-91 budget is £49,313, none of which is likely to be on television or radio advertising.

Comparable figures for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 are not available because of the machinery of Government changes, and could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 12 March 1990]: For 1979-80 and each ensuing year up to and including 1987-88, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 17 March 1989, Official Report, column 383, by my right hon. Friend the then Paymaster General. The fees paid in 1988-89 were £2,334,613, the estimated fees for the current year are £2,757,110 and the budget provision for 1990-91 is £3,157,489.

National Income

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage, in the latest available year, of the national income of the United Kingdom was made up of interest, dividends and private rents.

Mr. Major [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Interest and dividends are redistributive transactions which have no net impact on national income. The share of rent in total domestic income is given in table 16.3 of the CSO publication "United Kingdom National Accounts", 1989 edition.

Income Tax

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of income tax payers are currently paying tax at the higher rate.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: About 7 per cent. of taxpaying single people and married couples are liable at the higher rate in 1989-90. The estimate is based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and is, therefore, provisional.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the name and status of the report of the working party which reported to the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Community, referred to by the Economic Secretary in his speech on 27 February, Official Report, column 243, the date of the Council meeting at which the report was considered, and the action then agreed; and if he will place a copy of the report in the Library.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

The working party referred to by my hon. Friend was an expert group chaired by the European Commission, whose report was sent to the Council of Ministers in June 1989. I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library. Subsequently the Council adopted regulation 3757/89 introducing compulsory physical stock checks in intervention stores. The Commission has also made regulations adjusting the flat-rate systems for financing storage and interest costs, and adopted other measures to improve the management of public storage.

HEALTH

Northern RHA (Statistics)

Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each district of the Northern regional health authority the number of (a) in-patients, (b) qualified nursing staff and (c) consultants for the latest available year; and if he will give figures for the five previous years.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the tables.

Contracts for consultants in non-teaching district health authorities are held by the regional health authorities. Districts where these staff work cannot be identified centrally, and are therefore included with the regional total.

Kidney Transplants

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the latest conveniently available figures for the shortage of kidneys to transplant.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 20 February at column 720.

Health Authorities (Land Sales)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what contribution he expects land sales to make to the revenue of health authorities in London during the coming financial year.

Mr. Freeman: In the coming financial year surplus property with an estimated value of £163 million will be available for disposal by the four Thames regional health authorities. However, the need to obtain planning permission, and the depressed and uncertain state of the property market, preclude a reliable forecast of what receipts will actually be received.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the representatives of community health councils; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has not met representatives of community health councils (CHCs). However, I met the chairman and officers of the Association of Community Health Councils for England and Wales on 23 November 1989 to discuss the role of CHCs. Questions arising from the meeting are still being considered.

Dental Staff

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to issue guidance on changes to disciplinary procedures for hospital and community medical and dental staff.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A circular containing guidance on new and revised disciplinary procedures for hospital doctors and dentists, and for community doctors, has been published today. This follows negotiations with the professions on the basis of recommendations from a joint working party. A copy of the circular, HC(90)(9), is being placed in the Library.

The circular amends the procedure for holding inquiries into doctors' alleged serious professional misconduct or incompetence—the HM(61)112 procedure—as well as the right of appeal against dismissal. Improvements include setting time limits to help reduce the cost and delay of these procedures.

Two new procedures are being introduced: professional review machinery, a peer group approach for reviewing the conduct of hospital consultants said to have failed repeatedly to honour their contractual commitments, and an intermediate procedure, which deals with allegations of professional misconduct or incompetence which are sufficiently serious to warrant disciplinary action but are unlikely to lead to dismissal.

These changes should result in a more comprehensive disciplinary framework for medical and dental staff and should make it easier for health authorities to take appropriate action where necessary.

NHS Reform

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner practices have registered their interest in becoming fund holders under the Government's proposed reforms for the National Health Service set out in "Working for Patients".

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I announced this morning that 850 GP practices have so far registered their interest in becoming fund-holding practices. The response so far is a clear endorsement of the attractiveness of the scheme. It shows that significant numbers of GPs recognise the advantage of being able to choose to take control of some NHS funds to finance a range of local services for their patients and to having more influence over the quality of hospital services.

South Western RHA

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the position of the chairman of the South Western regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Sir Vernon Seccombe's appointment as chairman of South Western regional health authority ends on 31 July. After seven years as regional health authority chairman, Sir Vernon has told me that he would like to continue in the National Health Service but in a position which is much nearer to his home. I have therefore asked if he would be willing to take over the chairmanship of Plymouth health authority after the current chairman retires on 31 March. I am pleased to say that Sir Vernon has accepted. I am grateful to him for all that he has achieved during his successful period of office as regional health authority chairman and glad that he will continue as a district health authority chairman. The precise date for Sir Vernon to take up his new responsibilities will be announced shortly. Sir Vernon's successor as regional health authority chairman will also be announced shortly.

Salmonella

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of salmonella infection in human beings have been proved absolutely to have arisen from the consumption of eggs; and in how many cases it was impossible to trace back to an egg or to an egg farm such infection and assumptions made that it originated in this manner.

Mr. Freeman: The evidence linking eggs and salmonella infection in man is based on many different kinds of information. It is not often possible to prove absolutely the cause and effect in individual cases—any more than individual cases of cancer of the lung can be proven as due to cigarettes.

Since the beginning of 1988, the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre (CDSC) has investigated 11 outbreaks (involving at least 759 people) of salmonella infection in which a statistical association with eggs was found. In five of these (involving at least 341 people) there was supporting microbiological evidence. Most of these investigations have been published in the medical literature.

In 1988 and 1989, public health professionals reported to CDSC 76 outbreaks (involving at least 1,257 people) which they attributed to eggs or foods which contained egg.

Egg packaging is required to show certain information, for example, the packaging station number which will assist investigations to trace back eggs implicated in food poisoning outbreaks. However, the packaging may not always be available and, when it is, it is not always possible to identify a producer particularly in those cases where a packing station is handling eggs from more than one source.

Storm Damage

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what insurance cover is provided to district health authorities for the protection of hospitals and other buildings against storm damage; what estimates he has received of the damage inflicted by storms in January and February on property belonging to district and regional health authorities; and what funds will be made available to repair the damage caused.

Mr. Freeman: NHS property is not covered by commercial insurance. Authorities are therefore expected to make some provision within their allocations to meet such contingencies. Information is not held centrally on the total damage to NHS property in January and February. Initial provisional estimates from regions which suffered damage arising from the storm on 25 January amount to about £12 million.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dogs (Hunting)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to prohibit hare coursing and deer hunting with dogs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government believe that participation in field sports is a matter for the conscience of the individual and have no plans for legislation to prohibit or restrict such activities.

Grants to Local Government

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the main purposes for which grants under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 are paid to local authorities.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to the reply, 7 December 1989, c. 395]: I have today published my proposals for the improved administration of section 11 grant in the form of a draft circular to local authorities on which I am inviting comments. Copies have been placed in the Library.

The new arrangements are the outcome of the Government's consideration of the scrutiny report into the workings of the grant. Some £89 million section 11 grant was paid out in 1988-89 (the latest year for which figures are available); provision of £110 million has been secured for 1990-91.

Our ethnic minorities make a substantial contribution to this country. The Government are committed to equality of opportunity and good community relations. Barriers which prevent ethnic minorities from making their full contribution to the life of the country must be broken down. The reforms that we propose are designed to enable section 11 to make a major contribution to this objective. The grant has an important role in enabling people from the ethnic minorities to participate fully in the mainstream of British life. This is the Government's prime objective in the reforms proposed for the policy and administration of the grant in the light of the scrutiny report.

The scrutiny report shows that new legislation will be needed for any fundamental reform of section 11.

The Government agree that it is desirable to make the existing legislation more relevant to current needs, but believe that much can be done, in advance of any possible legislative change, to improve the way in which section 11 funding is administered. The main changes in funding arrangements set out in the draft circular are:

- the emphasis of the grant in future will be put on practical projects working to identified needs, such as a lack of English language or low achievement in schools and local authorities will in future bid for funding for projects to be judged against such specific criteria;
- all projects will have to be regularly monitored and reviewed against recognisable performance targets;
- in advance of formal legislative change arrangements are being made for some section 11 funding to be redirected to innovative projects that tackle ethnic minority need, to be sponsored by the new training and enterprise councils (TECs), with task forces and city action teams in support;
- local authorities will be strongly encouraged to work with voluntary organisations and to identify a proportion of projects for the voluntary sector;
- new administrative arrangements would come into effect on 1 October 1991. Bids for funding will be invited on an annual basis to a fixed timetable.

The new arrangements will allow for wider and more innovative proposals, but existing projects will still be able to continue if they are brought within the new criteria. To increase effectiveness, all projects, whether local authority or voluntary sector-based, will need to set clear objectives for achievement. For example, specific objectives for section 11 funding in education are:

- to give school age children whose mother tongue is not English a command of English and to help them achieve at the same level as others in their age group in all areas of the curriculum;
- to strengthen ties between schools and the parents of ethnic minority pupils, where those ties are hard to establish because of parents' lack of English or because of cultural factors;
- to give ethnic minority adults, who have an inadequate command of English or who lack numeracy or literacy skills, sufficient knowledge and skills to compete for jobs and participate fully in the mainstream of national life.

Some specific objectives in the area of employment, training and enterprise are:

- to increase the awareness and take-up of the range of educational and employment opportunities by young people from ethnic minorities and to advise employers and community groups on the potential and training needs of such people;
- to secure better take-up by ethnic minorities of small business support services to promote the creation and growth of small firms and self-employment.

The grant can help ethnic minorities in need in a number of ways by providing or aiding the provision of:

- Services that cater for the particular problems faced by ethnic minority women and their children, for example, family and women's refuges and maternity social workers.
- Social workers able to give help to ethnic minorities who are isolated, speak and write little or no English and experience cultural barriers to full use of services of the elderly; advice on fostering and adoption and help in the case of mental and physical illness.

The proposals in the circular will encourage the widest take-up in grant while at the same time ensuring that grant-seekers do not become wholly dependent on funding.

Community Care Grants

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many refusals of community care grants one of the grounds for refusal has been insufficient funds.

Mr. Scott: In the period April 1989 to January 1990 43,000 community care grants were refused on the grounds that they were of insufficient priority for an award to be made.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all the application forms and leaflets on benefits produced in the Welsh language with their reference numbers; and if his Department has any plans to produce any other leaflets or application forms in the Welsh language between the present date and the beginning of April.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Social fund claim forms SF100 (maternity payments) and SF200 (funeral payments) have been translated and are in use.

We have no plans to produce any more leaflets in Welsh before April 1990. However, recommendations of a working party for additional Welsh language material have been made and will be implemented as soon as practicable.

Claimants, Scotland

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people in Scotland depend entirely on state benefits for their income;

(2) how many people in the area covered by his Department's office in Cumbernauld depend entirely on state benefits for their income.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information on the number of people depending entirely on state benefits is not available. However, in November 1989 there were 505,052 people in Scotland claiming income support, 9,179 of whom are claiming income support from Cumbernauld local social security office.

Note:
Data is derived from a 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which includes a number where benefit payment has ceased but other action is continuing.

DEFENCE

Lieutenant Commander Taylor Scott

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he asked British Aerospace to provide for the official inquiry into the causes of the accident involving Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott on 22 October 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following the accident the director of quality assurance of the Ministry of Defence took possession, under the terms of the Ministry of Defence's contract with British Aerospace, of all documents known to be of relevance and these were presented to the board of inquiry. The board was also able to have access to additional documents which subsequently appeared relevant in the light of its inquiries.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what statutory powers he had to obtain evidence for his inquiry into the causes of the accident involving Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott on 22 October 1987;

(2) what was the statutory basis of his inquiry into the causes of the accident involving Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott on 22 October 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is the standard practice of the Ministry of Defence to hold formal boards of inquiry into the causes of all serious accidents involving military aircraft in the United Kingdom but these boards have a basis in statute, and statutory powers to obtain evidence, only when the pilot is a serving member of Her Majesty's armed forces. Since Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott had retired from the Royal Navy and was employed by British Aerospace the board of inquiry did not have a basis in statute or statutory powers to obtain evidence.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to seek further evidence from British Aerospace into the causes of the accident involving Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott on 22 October 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. The British Aerospace memorandum which has recently been reported in the press was not available to the board of inquiry that investigated the accident but has now been examined thoroughly by Ministry of Defence experts. It contains two main points, the first of which is that British Aerospace had identified a problem whereby a foul between the aircraft structure and seat linkage caused an automatic eject of the top portion of the personal equipment connector when the seat was raised and lowered. Ministry of Defence experts have found that a modification needed to overcome this problem was carried out on Lt. Cdr. Taylor Scott's aircraft, Harrier GR5 ZD325, some five weeks before the accident occurred. This particular problem could not have caused the accident on 22 October 1987. The second main point in the British Aerospace memorandum is that documentation was inadequate. The board of inquiry independently expressed a number of concerns over British Aerospace's documentation and certification of work and recommended corrective action. This action has since been taken.

In the light of these findings, I am satisfied that there is no need to seek further evidence from British Aerospace.

AWACS

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in the Boeing/AWACS offset arrangements.

Mr. Alan Clark: Boeing has to date submitted five progress reports listing contracts placed with United Kingdom companies to the value of $1,176 million, of which we have so far agreed some $672 million to count for offset credit purposes.

NATO Weapons Systems

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy in respect of the redistribution to other NATO Governments of weapon systems removed by NATO nations as the result of a CFE treaty.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We need to ensure that, while complying fully with a CFE treaty to reduce certain categories of equipment holdings in both alliances, NATO retains an effective defence capability. NATO is consequently examining the scope for reallocating equipment between allies so that the less efficient items currently in service would be destroyed first. Any such reallocations would have to be fully compliant with CFE treaty obligations.

Harrier GR5

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the nature of the contractual arrangements for development of the Harrier GR5.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Ministry of Defence placed a target cost incentive contract with a maximum price on British Aerospace for the development and initial production of the Harrier GR5.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Steel

18. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his assessment of the United Kingdom's need for high-integrity founding plants such as that at the Atlas steel works at Armadale, West Lothian.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: High integrity castings are of crucial importance to customer industries which depend upon a high quality and high performance product. British foundries can expect to achieve a share of that market if they can satisfy customers on price, delivery and quality.

Post Office

19. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Post Office; and what will be discussed.

71. Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Post Office; and what will be discussed.

79. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Post Office; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to meet the chairman of the Post Office, Sir Bryan Nicholson, on 27 March. They will discuss various matters on mutual interest.

Exporters

20. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any new plans to help British exporters.

62. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any new plans to help British exporters.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) earlier today.

Recycling

21. Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the Recycling Advisory Group to report on its consideration of recycling of domestic and industrial waste.

Mr. Forth: The group is expected to complete the current phase of its work before the end of May.

Product Liability

22. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last discussed product liability with (a) consumers' associations, (b) the Confederation of British Industry, (c) trading standards officers and (d) the European Commission.

96. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last discussed product liability with (a) consumers' associations, (b) the Confederation of British Industry, (c) trading standards officers and (d) the European Commission.

Mr. Forth: The European product liability directive was implemented in part I of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 and came into force on 1 March 1988. The consumers' associations, the Confederation of British Industry and the Local Authority Co-ordinating Body on Trading Standards were included in the consultation exercise.

I have had no meetings with these organisations or the European Commission on this subject in the last 12 months.

East Germany

23. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the United Kingdom's trade deficit with East Germany in 1989.

Mr. Redwood: In 1989 the crude deficit in United Kingdom visible trade with East Germany was £63 million.

Balance of Trade

25. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will consider direct action by his Department to improve the United Kingdom's trade deficit figures with other advanced economies.

Mr. Redwood: Exports from the United Kingdom are running at record levels. The present deficit has been caused mainly by excessive growth in domestic demand in relation to domestic industrial capacity. It is therefore a macro-economic problem which will be resolved by the sound macro-economic policies which the Government are pursuing. The Government administer a number of schemes to help promote exports.

61. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the east and west European countries with which the United Kingdom has a trade surplus in manufactures.

67. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the east and west European countries with which the United Kingdom has a trade surplus in manufactures.

Mr. Redwood: The European countries with which the United Kingdom in 1989 had a crude surplus in trade in manufactured goods are, in decreasing size of surplus:

Irish Republic
Spain
Soviet Union
Greece
Malta
Gibraltar
Bulgaria
Turkey
Hungary
Iceland
Yugoslavia
Andorra
Faroe Islands
Vatican City
Albania

28. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the United Kingdom's balance of trade with the EEC (a) in 1972 and (b) currently, in (i) the manufacturing sector and (ii) the financial services sector.

Mr. Redwood: In 1972 United Kingdom exports of manufactures to the countries currently comprising the EC exceeded imports by £168 million. The same comparison for 1989 shows that exports were exceeded by imports by £14·4 billion. Corresponding information on trade in financial services is not available.

Interest Rates

26. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further representations he has made to retail outlets on the rates of interest being charged to customers for credit.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has made no such representations. In a competitive market each retailer decides what credit terms to offer and consumers have a choice between alternative sources of credit.

49. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further representations he has made to retail outlets on the rates of interest being charged to customers for credit.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further representations he has made to retail outlets on the rates of interest being charged to customers for credit.

Mr. Forth: I have made no such representations. In a competitive market each retailer decides what credit terms to offer and consumers have a choice between alternative sources of credit.

Information Technology

27. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's policy on the training of senior staff in the application of information technology.

80. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's policy on the training of senior staff in the application of information technology.

Mr. Forth: The Department's policy is to ensure that sufficient training on the application of information technology is available to meet departmental needs. To this end, a great deal of training on and about IT is available for all departmental staff, incuding senior members.

50. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the information technology sector on the subject of skill shortages.

Mr. Forth: There have been representations from the information technology sector in the past with regard to IT skills shortages. My Department supports a number of programmes aimed at increasing skills in this sector.

33. Mr. Buchan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the information technology sector on the subject of skill shortages.

Mr. Forth: There have been representations from the information technology sector in the past with regard to IT skills shortages. In recognising this, my Department announced support of up to £440,000 over three years for the recently launched Women into Information Technology (WIT) campaign, where this support is appropriately matched by industry. My Department supports a programme aimed at stimulating the production of distance learning video courses on subjects directly relating to skills in micro-electronics, information technology, and their applications. Support is also being given to an industry-further education collaborative programme aimed at producing interactive video courses relating in the main to IT skills.

My Department also has an Information Technology Advisory Board (ITAB) with representatives from industry commerce, and academia. One of ITAB's support committees advises specifically on education and training and comments on IT skills issues.

Regional Assistance

29. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of regional development grant and regional selective assistance (a) between May 1978 and May 1979 and (b) in the last financial year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In the period 1 May 1978 to 30 April 1979 expenditure in Great Britain on regional development grants and regional selective assistance was £422·2 million and £112·9 million respectively while in 1988-89 expenditure was £297·3 million and £216 million respectively.

95. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of regional development grants and regional selective assistance in (a) 1978-79 and (b) the last financial year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In 1978-79 expenditure in Great Britain on regional development grants and regional selective assistance was £416·9 million and £104·5 million respectively while in 1988-89 expenditure was £297·3 million and £216 million respectively.

Internal Market Council

30. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the most recent meeting of the EEC Internal Market Council.

39. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the most recent meeting of the EEC Internal Market Council.

Mr. Redwood: The most recent meeting of the Internal Market Council was held on 22 February 1990. The Council reached a satisfactory agreement on the main agenda item: a directive on public procurement in the water, transport, telecommunications and energy sectors. This represents an important step towards the liberalisation of public procurement in the Community. The Council also received a progress report from the Commission on further work in this area.

The Council also agreed a timetable for future work towards liberalisation of the insurance market in the Community, and discussed amendments to the fourth and seventh company law directives.

This was a satisfactory first Council under the Irish presidency, which maintains the momentum on the single market.

European Commission

31. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met his counterparts in the European Commission; and what topics were discussed.

41. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met his counterparts in the European Commission; and what topics were discussed.

101. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met his counterparts in the Europan Commission; and what topics were discussed.

Mr. Redwood: I keep in close contact with the European Commission on a whole range of issues.

Stock Exchange

32. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the stock exchange; and what will be discussed.

52. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the stock exchange; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Redwood: Ministers meet the chairman of the stock exchange whenever appropriate to discuss topics of mutual interest.

Competition Policy

34. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review his policy on competition.

93. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review his policy on competition.

103. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review his policy on competition.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Product Safety

35. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further measures his Department is taking to improve the safety of retail goods.

38. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further measures his Department is taking to improve the safety of retail goods.

74. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further measures his Department is taking to improve the safety of retail goods.

Mr. Forth: Safety of retail goods will continue to be a high priority for my Department. Arrangements exist for the collection and analysis of accident statistics and for the promotion of effective safety campaigns. The Consumer Protection Act 1987 makes it a criminal offence to supply any consumer product that is not reasonably safe. This is supported by safety regulations, where necessary, and by the promotion of safety standards. This framework facilitates the promotion of reasonable standards of safety in the marketing of consumer goods.

GATT

36. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on current progress in the general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiations concerning clothing imports.

69. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on current negotiations concerning the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Redwood: The GATT negotiating group on textiles and clothing is discussing how best to return trade in textiles and clothing to GATT rules after the MFA expires next year. There is general agreement that a transitional period will be necessary, but its length has not yet been determined nor has the exact nature of the transitional arrangements. The Community continues to argue that integration of the sector into GATT rules must be paralleled by the strengthening of GATT rules and disciplines, particularly in relation to safeguards, intellectual property, unfair trade and access to raw materials coupled with a greater commitment to market opening, especially from the newly industrialised economies. The group is now meeting more frequently with the aim of making more rapid progress.

Investment

37. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has as to the amount of inward investment that has taken place in the north-west of England over the past five years; and what steps he is taking to encourage further such investment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: According to the latest figures readily available to the Invest in Britain Bureau, in the five years from 1985 to 1989, a total of 150 inward investment decisions were made to locate in the north-west of the United Kingdom. These included the establishment of a new business, expansion or acquisition of an existing business and involvement in joint venture. The projects were expected to create about 8,400 new jobs and to have safeguarded a further 11,900. The figures are based on information provided by the companies themselves at the time of the investment and do not take into account subsequent developments.

In addition to the activities of my Department's Invest in Britain bureau, which promotes the attractions of all parts of the United Kingdom, the Department is the major source of funds for Inward (the regional development body for the north-west). To assist Inward in its activities, I announced on 8 March that it would be offered grant of £840,000 in 1990-91. This is a very large uplift on the 1989-90 grant of £541,000 and will allow Inward to devote extra resources towards encouraging inward investment.

Departmental Expenditure

40. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the real value of his Department's total expenditure in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) 1991-92.

47. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the real value of his Department's total expenditure in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) 1991-92.

60. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the real value of his Department's total expenditure in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) 1991-92.

97. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the real value of his Department's total expenditure in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) 1991-92.

Mr. Forth: The estimated outturn for total Department of Trade and Industry expenditure in 1989-90 (including public corporations) is £1,363 million. Department of Trade and Industry expenditure plans for 1990-91 and 1991-92 total £1,247 million and £1,000 million respectively (the 1991-92 figure is rounded to the nearest £10 million). These planned levels of expenditure are equivalent to £1,187 million (1990-91) and £920 million (1991-92) at 1989-90 prices, based on the GDP deflator assumed for the public expenditure plans.

Japan

42. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will discuss with his EEC counterparts the possibility of introducing trade sanctions against Japan.

Mr. Redwood: No. Imposing trade sanctions against Japan would contravene the international obligations of both the United Kingdom and our Community partners under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. In 1989, United Kingdom exports to Japan increased by 30·1 per cent. to £2·3 billion compared with 1988, a growth rate over three times faster than Japan's exports to the United Kingdom.

63. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding access for British exporters to the Japanese market.

Mr. Redwood: The Government attach great importance to Britain's trade with Japan. Representations on market access are received from British companies from time to time and, where appropriate, we take them up vigorously with the Japanese authorities, both directly and through the European Commission.

In January our exports to Japan increased in value by 27·4 per cent. compared with the same month last year.

Regional Policy

43. Mr. James Lamond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his future plans for regional policy.

83. Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his future plans for regional policy.

85. Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his future plans for regional policy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Regional policy is kept under continuing review.

Insider Dealing

44. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last reviewed the regulations to deal with insider dealing.

Mr. Redwood: As I told the House on 8 December, the Government that day published a consultative document on proposals to change the law on insider dealing. A copy is in the Library. I am grateful to all those who responded; careful consideration is being given to their comments.

Biotechnology

45. Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current best estimate of the balance of trade in biotechnology products.

98. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current best estimate for the balance of trade in biotechnology products.

Mr. Redwood: Biotechnology is just emerging from the research phase. It will find expression in such sectors as chemicals, pharmaceuticals, diagnostics, food, agriculture and process equipment. Data on trade in biotechnology are not identified separately in statistics for these sectors.

Grants to Industry

46. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of grants in aid to industry on those enterprises which are not eligible.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The likely effects of grant on non-eligible businesses and also on non-recipients are considered in the appraisal of all applications under schemes where grant amounts might be substantial (for example, regional selective assistance). These effects are also studied as part of the evaluation of all industrial support schemes.

Exports

48. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his future plans for his Department's export programme.

Mr. Redwood: The British Overseas Trade Board's forward plan, published on 23 January, sets out the priorities for the use of the resources available for official export promotion—over £120 million a year—in 1990-91 and provides a basis for their use in the next two years. This will ensure that resources are used where they will have the greatest effect on our exports.

Financial Services Act

51. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to ensure that the Financial Services Act is being operated to the benefit of the investor.

64. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to ensure that the Financial Services Act is being operated to the benefit of the investor.

Mr. Redwood: I believe that the Financial Services Act has already brought benefits for investors, not least the SIB compensation scheme. However, investors also benefit financially when regulation of the firms with which they deal is least burdensome, and the amendments introduced in the new Companies Act should make the system of investor protection more flexible and cost-effective.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms were permitted to trade on the basis of interim authorisation by SIB and FIMBRA 18 months after their applications under the Financial Services Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Only applications received by 27 February 1988 were given interim authorisation. Eighteen months later 120 applications to FIMBRA and seven to SIB were still operating under interim authorisation.

Government Support for Business

53. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been spent in real terms on Government support for business in (a) 1979, (b) 1984 and (c) 1989.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Total DTI expenditure (including expenditure in respect of public corporations) was £2,257 million in 1979-80 and £1,814 million in 1984-85: it is now expected to be £1,363 million in 1989-90. The levels of expenditure in 1979-80 and 1984-85 are equivalent to £4,548 million and £2,387 million respectively in 1989-90 prices, based on the GDP deflator.

Advice Centres

54. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funding he proposes to give citizens advice bureaux and consumer advice centres for 1990-91.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funding he proposes to give citizens advice bureaux and consumer advice centres for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth: My Department does not provide any funds specifically for consumer advice centres or directly to citizens advice bureaux. Details of the DTI grant in aid for the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and Citizens Advice Scotland in 1990-91 will not be available until after the Chancellor's annual statement on 20 March.

Procurement Markets

56. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implications for British industry of the opening up of public procurement markets within the European Community.

Mr. Redwood: The opening up of EC public procurement markets will provide important new opportunities for British industry in markets in other member states which are closed at present. The British market, unlike some others, is already more open.

To put this into context, the annual value of EC public procurement is around £430 billion at 1989 prices. About half this amount is under contracts which are, or will soon be, subject to Council directives. Purchasers affected are Government Departments, regional and local authorities and public utilities. Also covered will be private sector firms in the energy, water, telecommunications and energy sectors operating on the basis of special or exclusive rights granted by public authorities. Suppliers harmed by infringements will be able to seek remedies from judicial or administrative review bodies.

57. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next expects to meet the president of the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters he intends to discuss.

88. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next expects to meet the president of the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters he intends to discuss.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I look forward to a continuation of constructive dialogue with the president of the CBI on matters relevant to the well-being of British business.

78. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I met the director general of the CBI on 1 February to discuss industrial representation and services to business.

Securities and Investments Board

58. Mr. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board to discuss issues of mutual interest as frequently as is necessary. No date has been fixed for the next such meeting.

72. Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a further statement on the future of the shipbuilding industry in Britain.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The future of the shipbuilding industry in the United Kingdom will depend on the level of demand and on its ability to obtain orders in the face of international competition. The Government provide substantial support to the industry to assist its return to normal competitive conditions.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the reply by the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North, 28 February, Official Report, column 207, which sentences in the statement by the right hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), 14 November 1988, Official Report, column 748, state the reasons why his Department rejected the bid by Mr. Nat Puri to acquire North-East Shipbuilders Ltd.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: References to the reasons for the rejection of the original bids received for NESL are contained in the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) on 14 November 1988, Official Report, column 748.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has held with the European Commission as to the implications for the sixth directive on shipbuilding arising from the amalgamation of the West German Shipbuilders Association and the German Democratic Republic Shipbuilders Association.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

Rechar Initiative

70. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much funding he expects the objective 2 areas of the east midlands in Retford, Worksop and Mansfield to receive from the Rechar initiative for coal mining areas from the European Commission.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is too early to say. The European Commission has first to determine and publish a list of eligible coal mining areas for the purpose of Rechar and then to consider programmes of measures for such areas. I hope that its decisions on the amounts of Rechar grants will be reached before the end of this year.

Batteries

73. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to manufacturers and retailers about the lead content of batteries.

94. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to manufacturers and retailers about the lead content of batteries.

Mr. Forth: Most lead-containing batteries are covered by the scope of a draft EC directive which aims to reduce the amounts of that metal going in spent batteries to landfill or incineration for disposal. Negotiations on the draft directive have recently begun in Brussels. Officials in my Department have been in regular contact with representatives of the lead and battery industries over the past months.

Industry Council

75. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what matters he expects to discuss at the next meeting of the EEC Industry Council.

Aerospace Industry

84. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the contributions being made by British companies to the aerospace industry in Europe and the United States of America.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am well aware of the significant contribution made by United Kingdom companies to the aerospace industry worldwide; indeed the United Kingdom has a large trade surplus in aerospace products. United Kingdom firms are prominent in all areas of the industry—as aircraft and aero-engine manufacturers, as partners in international collaborative programmes such as Airbus, EFA and the V2500 engine, and as major suppliers of equipment and components to other European and United States manufacturers such as Fokker, Boeing and McDonnell Douglas.

Electronics

86. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the electronics industry on the subject of skills shortages.

Mr. Forth: There have been no direct representations from the electronics industry on skills shortages during the past two months, but there have in the past been approaches with regard to IT skills shortages. My Department supports a number of programmes aimed at increasing skills in the sector.

100. Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest annual estimate of the balance of trade in electronic components.

Mr. Forth: Estimates based on figures published by the Central Statistical Office suggest that the United Kingdom had a crude trade deficit[1] in electronic components[2] of £1·1 billion in 1989.

Mr. Redwood: Available statistics show that exports (including re-exports) of furs and pelts (group 212 of the SITC) from the United Kingdom amounted to £53 million in 1989.

Bankruptcy

102. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest figures for the level of bankruptcies.

Mr. Redwood: A total of 8,115 bankruptcy orders were made in England and Wales in 1989. In the same year, 2,294 sequestrations (the equivalent of bankruptcy orders in England and Wales) were awarded in Scotland and 146 bankruptcy adjudication orders were made in Northern Ireland.

Hulme and Moss Side Development Projects

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of (a) the present membership of the Hulme and Moss Side community economic development trust and the means by which they were selected and (b) the mechanism by which elections will take place for the trust board including details of how voting will be conducted.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is a matter for the trust itself.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of projects assisted by the Hulme and Moss Side task force which involve a training element and which do not involve employment training.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since the introduction of employment training the task force has assisted the following projects for unemployed adults involving a non-ET training element:

Roots Oral History—20 trainees—Basic editorial skills in producing a book

Community Computing—30 trainees—Equipment for a "drop-in" training centre for Information Technology (re) familiarisation.

In both cases, the training offered is of an informal nature and aimed at unemployed people who are not yet ready to follow an ET training course.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what way the Hulme and Moss Side task force makes applicants for assistance aware of Department of Trade and Industry encouragement of the use of employment training.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Employment training is recommended to applicants as a source of funding whenever it seems appropriate.

Company Accounts

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the checks which Companies house staff perform upon receipt of annual company accounts.

Mr. Redwood: The basic checks carried out by the Registrar of Companies vary according to the type of accounts filed. For full accounts, these include confirmation that the accounts comprise the company's profit and loss account and balance sheet, the directors' report, the auditors' report and, where appropriate, the company's group accounts. The basic checks are supplemented by such other checks as the registrar considers are appropriate. Companies house is not responsible for the contents of the accounts.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, prior to formulating section 15 of the Companies Act 1989, his Department estimated the average cost of printing a full set of accounts which are normally circulated to shareholders.

Mr. Redwood: No, but my Department's customary prior consultations showed that the proposal to give listed companies the option of providing summary financial statements instead of full reports and accounts was endorsed by a range of public companies and representative organisations.

Financial Services

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if persons who lose money on the basis of advice from persons with interim authorisation from FIMBRA or SIB have their interests protected in any way by these organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Interim authorised persons are treated as though they had been granted authorisation and are effectively subject to the appropriate rules of FIMBRA or SIB. Interim authorised persons are not included in the investors' compensation scheme of SIB.

Mr. Adrian Ward

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will undertake discussions with the Securities and Investments Board on the trading as a financial adviser of Mr. Adrian Ward.

Mr. Redwood: No. The day-to-day operation of the regulatory system under the Financial Services Act is the responsibility of the Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulating bodies.

Statistical Divisions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest figures for the number of staff presently employed, and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts; and if he will give the staffing complements by grade, and differentiated between statistical and administrative posts, proposed for 1990-91.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 March 1990]: A major part of the Department's statistical work and associated staff were transferred to the Central Statistical Office on 31 July 1989. The remaining statistical work was distributed among a number of divisions within the Department. The following figures for 1989-90 relate to the statistics sections of these divisions. The manpower allocation for 1 April 1991 will be set later this month in the light of the Department's annual activity and resource management review.

House of Fraser

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what response he has had from the Bank of England to the submission to it of the House of Fraser report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 12 March 1990]: None. The Bank of England is not accountable to the Secretary of State.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, in view of the Garston Amhurst case, he will introduce legislation making the organisations appointing representatives liable for all the actions of these representatives, whether in the course of conducting authorised business or not; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Under the Financial Services Act, a principal is responsible for its appointed representatives' actions in carrying on investment business for which the principal has accepted responsibility in writing. It is for the Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulating bodies to consider what requirements should be imposed on principals in relation to the activities of their appointed representatives. I have no plans to amend the Financial Services Act in this regard.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the quotas covered by the multi-fibre arrangement and indicate the proportion of each quota used.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Details of current quotas for the United Kingdom under the European Community's bilateral multi-fibre arrangement agreements with third countries are set out in the notice to importers 2249 published in Lloyd's List International on 4 January 1990. This is available in the Library of the House.

Quota utilisation records for 1989 will not be finalised for some time yet. The DTI is currently preparing a summary of quota utilisation in 1988, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House when it is ready.

Enterprise Initiative Scheme

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what examination he makes in considering a company's eligibility for assistance under the enterprise initiative scheme of (a) previous name changes by the company, (b) its record of payment of liabilities to redundant workers and (c) its record of payment of rates.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The eligibility of companies applying for consultancy assistance under the enterprise initiative is the responsibility of my Department. Applicants are approved only after a visit by an enterprise counsellor who, after a broadly based review of the firm's business activities, is required to identify whether the firm would benefit from consultancy assistance and whether it has the resources to pay its share of a consultancy project.

TRANSPORT

Network SouthEast

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect of his decision to curtail public subsidy to Network SouthEast services on the quality of service offered to passengers.

Mr. Portillo: The latest objectives for British Rail are based on the board's forecasts in the 1989 corporate plan that the need for subsidy for Network SouthEast will be eliminated progressively over the next three years as a result of increased revenue and greater efficiency. The objectives also set tougher quality of service targets, which NSE will be expected to meet route by route. The investment programme of £1·2 billion over the next three years will make a major contribution to the achievement of these objectives, both through savings in energy and maintenance costs and through additional revenue from increases in capacity and improved service quality.

Roads Programme

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has made an assessment of the environmental implications of the proposed £13 billion road building programme.

Mr. Atkins: Protecting and enhancing the environment is a major feature of the Government's road building plans.

By reducing congestion, which wastes fuel, the trunk road programme will lead to lower exhaust emissions than would otherwise be the case if additional road capacity was not provided. The emphasis in the programme on increasing capacity on existing motorways and other strategic routes will help minimise the requirement for additional land and the overall impact on the countryside. Some one third of trunk road schemes are bypasses, which will considerably improve the environment of the communities concerned.

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many Ministry of Transport test centres have been suspended and subsequently permitted to continue for each year since 1983; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the number of garages whose operation of Ministry of Transport testing has been terminated by his Department for each year since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The information is as follows:

Year	Total MOT stations withdrawn	Permitted to continue after appeal	Appeals disallowed
1983	90	13	42
1984	107	35	43
1985	80	28	37
1986	73	17	38
1987	127	21	39
1988	103	22	45
1989	74	17	43

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average time taken between suspension and the final decision on the resumption or termination of testing for Ministry of Transport test centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Sixteen weeks.

Railway Inspectorate

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the extent of the remit given to the railway inspectorate in respect of reliability of equipment and systems of automatic train control as distinct from the safety of its operations.

Mr. Portillo: In his report on the Clapham junction accident investigation, Sir Anthony Hidden, QC, recommended that the railway inspectorate should monitor at six-monthly intervals British Rail's progress in implementing automatic train protection. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 7 November last that he accepted this recommendation. Safety and reliability are closely associated, and the inspectorate will take account of equipment and system reliability in its continuing oversight.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The latest figures for fees paid by the Department to management consultants are as follows:

1984-85	250,000
1985-86	272,000
1986-87	248,000
1987-88	371,000
1988-89	604,000
1989-90	[1]270,000
1990-91	[2]437,000

[1] Latest estimate.
[2] Budget.

This excludes fees on computing consultancies.

Information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Hospital Posts

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects the permanent third anaesthetist post in the Downe group of hospitals, Downpatrick, will be filled.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Appointment to the post is a matter for the Eastern health and social services board. It is under active consideration by the board.

ENVIRONMENT

Waste Disposal

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice is given by his Department to local authorities on how to handle redundant fridges and small quantities of solvents being disposed of by members of the public.

Mr. Trippier: My Department and the Department of Trade and Industry are currently considering the final draft of a report by Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte entitled "CFC Market Study", which, among other things, considers the methodology and economics of CFC recovery and recycling. We hope to issue advice to local authorities in the light of the final report which is expected shortly.

Litter

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish for consultation the draft code of practice relating to litter and part IV of the Environmental Protection Bill.

Mr. Trippier: The Secretary of State, together with the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Transport, published for public consultation a draft code of practice on litter and refuse on 20 February.

Water (Quality)

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount will be invested over the next 10 years to improve the quality of Britain's rivers, seas and drinking water.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In addition to the investment in new water treatment and disposal by industry and agriculture to meet effluent standards, the water industry in England and Wales will be carrying out the biggest programme of sustained investment in its history with total capital expenditure of over £27 billion planned over the next 10 years. This will enable the industry to renew and extend sewers and sewage treatment works, to improve our drinking water and to complete the clean-up of our coastal waters and beaches. The benefits of this investment will be seen in improved water quality, as well as in higher standards of service to the consumer.

In Scotland, where the water industry remains in the public sector, capital expenditure provision is considered over a three-year period with annual reviews. Provision for the water and sewerage programme has been substantially increased to over £500 million for the period 1990-91 to 1992-93. This will enable authorities to make good progress with improvements.

North Sea

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of measured or estimated total airborne pollution deposited on the North sea arises from discharges from factories, power stations and farms in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Emissions by source category of the major United Kingdom air pollutants will be published in the digest of environmental protection and water statistics, volume 12, at the end of March 1990, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House. Agricultural sources account for the majority of total reduced nitrogen emissions.

Modelling studies commissioned by my Department for oxides of nitrogen suggest that around 30 per cent. of United Kingdom emissions are deposited on the North sea.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further action he has taken on waste dumping in the North sea.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 5 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), Official Report, Vol. 168, column 489, and to my right hon. Friend's answer on 12 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on the outcome of the Hague conference on 7 to 8 March, Official Report, Vol. 169, column 106.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement regarding talks at, and the outcome of, the North sea conference of Ministers held earlier this month.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the North sea conference held on 8 March.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent initiatives he has taken to reduce pollution in the North sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given by my right hon. Friend on 12 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on the outcome of the Hague conference on 7 to 8 March, Official Report, Vol. 169, column 106.

Water Charges

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how the new infrastructure charges limits on water and sewerage, being introduced by each of the water services companies as from 1 April 1990, were arrived at.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The infrastructure charges limits were determined by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales following an assessment of each company's investment needs to meet the demands of new developments, so that estimated income from the new charges balances the investment required over the period from 1990-91 to 1999-2000.

Waste Paper Recycling

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce measures to protect the economic viability of recycling of waste paper from the effects of the current market price.

Mr. Trippier: No. Direct Government intervention artifically to maintain the price of waste paper through subsidising collection costs or other means would be ineffective or damaging since paper is an internationally traded commodity and users could switch to imported supplies. Central interference in the market overseas has been shown to drive down the price of waste paper and hamper recycling. The priority must be to encourage the market for recycled paper and expand industrial capacity to process waste paper. My Department and the Department of Trade and Industry are specifically examining the waste paper market to assess the economic and environmental benefits of waste paper recycling, the means of collecting waste paper, what new uses for waste paper might be promoted and how demand for recycled paper might be stimulated. Government Departments are also considering their use of paper with a view to increasing the use of recycled products wherever feasible and economic.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce regulations to implement the hazardous substance consent provisions contained in part IV of the Housing and Planning Act 1986.

Mr. Trippier: Later this year.

Inland Waters

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any intention of designating inland waters for the purpose of the EC bathing water directive (76/160/EEC).

Mr. Trippier: I am not aware of any inland waters which meet the criteria for inclusion within the scope of directive 76/160/EEC.

Crown Suppliers and Property Services Agency

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the latest position in relation to the privatisation of the Crown Suppliers and the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Chope: The Property Services Agency and Crown Suppliers Bill was given its Second Reading in another place on 5 March. The competition for the sale of the Crown Suppliers is proceeding.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the role of market mechanisms in protecting the environment.

Mr. Trippier: There will be such an assessment in the forthcoming White Paper on the environment.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he offers to those industries seeking to dispose of sewage sludge.

Mr. Trippier: Discussions are now being arranged with sewerage undertakers to consider the implications of the policy to end dumping of sewage sludge at sea by the end of 1998. We intend that wherever possible sludge should be used beneficially. We shall need to examine carefully with the sewerage undertakers the various options for disposal which vary according to the particular circumstances of each location. The main disposal options are to agricultural land, landfill, and incineration.

Pharmaceutical Wastes

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice his Department offers to those industries seeking to dispose of pharmaceutical wastes.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has issued general guidance on the disposal of pharmaceutical waste in waste management paper No. 19—"Wastes from the Manufacture of Pharmaceuticals, Toiletries and Cosmetics." However, advice on the disposal of specific pharmaceutical wastes is best obtained from the appropriate waste disposal authority as the body statutorily responsible for regulating waste disposal in its area.

Waste Water Treatment

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) of 5 March, Official Report, column 452, (1) who will be responsible for showing that coastal discharges which receive only primary treatment will not adversely affect the environment; and how this obligation will work in practice;

(2) what is his Department's definition of a substantial discharge of sewage;

(3) what proportion of existing sewage discharge outlets will be affected by the requirement for (i) primary and (ii) secondary treatment;

(4) how the investment programme of £1·5 billion for treating sewage discharges will be financed;

(5) what is the timetable for implementation of his policy on waste water treatment.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) on 5 March, Official Report, column 452, noted that the investment programme should be completed as soon as practicable and that discussions would be held with the National Rivers Authority, the Office of Water Services and the sewerage undertakers to work out the detailed arrangements for implementing this. Those discussions are now being held. The starting point for those discussions will be the CES report, copies of which have been placed in the Library. In this context substantial discharges are those from settlements of 10,000 or more to coastal waters. The number of sewage discharge outfalls covered by this definition is shown in tables 3·1 and 3·2 of the CES report. It will be for the water companies to determine how to finance their investment programmes, and for the director general to determine what adjustments to water charges will be needed.

Community Charge

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has circulated to community charge registration officers on the changes to the rules governing exemptions from the poll tax established by the Local Government and Housing Act; and if he will place copies of all relevant circulars in the Library.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 9 March 1990]: The Department wrote to all community charge registration officers on 16 November 1989, outlining the changes to be made to schedule 1 (personal community charge: exemptions) to the Local Government Finance Act 1988 by the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. I am arranging for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Irish Sea

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of pollution in the Irish sea is caused by sea dumping.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Licences for dumping are granted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and in the Irish sea apply only to the disposal of dredged spoil and sewage sludge.

Available data on inputs to the Irish sea are contained in the quality status report by scientists from the United Kingdom and Ireland published by the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, a copy of which is in the Library. As with other United Kingdom coastal waters, inputs of contaminants from dumping are generally less significant than those from rivers and estuaries.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations have been received about pollution in the Irish sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: A number of representations have been received recently from organisations and individuals concerned with protection of the marine environment in the Irish sea. The United Kingdom Government are committed to applying their policy to protect the marine environment generally to all their coastal waters and the Irish sea will benefit from the package of measures which were agreed at the North sea conference in the Hague on 7 to 8 March.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report recalculations of the tables in annex J of Cmnd. 9714 "Paying for Local Government" on the basis of the poll tax levels set by local authorities for 1990-91.

Mr. David Hunt: I do not yet have full information on levels of community charge set by local authorities.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he took to inform right hon. and hon. Members of the availability of the Community Charge Transitional Relief Report (England) laid before the House on 15 February, and of the levels of the assumed community charges to be used in the transitional relief scheme in 1990-91 by the local authorities in their constituencies.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Illustrative figures of the assumed charge for the purposes of transitional relief were announced on 11 January by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his answer that day to my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), Official Report, Vol. 164, columns 682-83. These were confirmed in the report laid before the House on 15 February to which reference was made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his answer that day to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord).

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he is considering raising levels of the assumed community charges to be used in the transitional relief scheme in 1990-91 above those set out in the Community Charge Transitional Relief Report (England);

(2) whether he will make the assumed community charge in 1990-91 for each charging authority to be used in the transitional relief scheme the same as the assumed average community charge of £278 per head rather than the assumed community charge set out in the Community Charge Transitional Relief Report (England) where the latter is lower.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 14 March 1990]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 8 March, Official Report, Vol. 168, column 798.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

House of Fraser

Mr. Shore: To ask the Attorney-General if he will prosecute the Al Fayed brothers under section 5(c) of the Perjury Act 1911 in view of the conclusion of the Department of Trade and Industry inspectors appointed under section 432(2) of the Companies Act 1985 that they repeatedly lied to them; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) on 1 March.

Property Law

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Attorney-General when the Government intend to bring into force section 1 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 and section 130 of the Companies Act 1989.

The Attorney-General: Section 1 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 will be brought into force on 31 July 1990. Section 130 of the Companies Act 1989 will be brought into force in respect of England, Wales and Scotland on the same date.

THE ARTS

Arts Exports

Mr. Cormack: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he is now in a position to announce decisions on the replacement for the indefinite stop and the recommendations of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art on collections.

Mr. Luce: I have today written to the chairman of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art conveying to him and his committee members the decisions which I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have taken on the indefinite stop. I have also conveyed in that letter my decisions on the committee's recommendations on collections, which it made to me in its annual reports for 1987-88 and 1988-89. I have placed copies of the letter in the Libraries of both Houses.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Gordon in the Official Report, 21 February, column 772, he will indicate which of the countries listed include expenditure on nuclear research and development in their renewable energy budget, giving details of the relative proportions of nuclear research and development and renewable energies research and development in each of these cases, if known.

Mr. Wakeham: While some of the countries listed spend substantial sums on their nuclear R and D programmes within their total energy R and D budgets, these sums are not included within the renewables element. The effect of a nuclear energy research and development programme is generally to increase the total size of the energy research and development programme and thus reduce the proportion of the total energy research and development programme spent on renewable energy development. The table sets out the budgets of different IEA Governments in 1988 on renewables R and D, nuclear R and D and expresses these as a percentage of the total energy R and D budgets.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) of 26 February, Official Report, column 89, when he expects the first two units of the flue gas desulphurisation plant at Drax to become fully operational.

Mr. Wakeham: I am advised by the Central Electricity Generating Board that the first two 660 MW units at Drax power station are expected to be operational by the end of 1993.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what contribution he estimates the flue gas desulphurisation programme at the Drax power station will make to the reduction in SO_2 emissions set out in the consultative document on implementation of the large combustion plants directive by 1993.

Mr. Wakeham: I am advised by the Central Electricity Generating Board that, when fully operational, the flue gas desulphurisation installation at Drax is likely to reduce the station's emissions of sulphur dioxide by about 250,000 to 280,000 tonnes.

Central Electricity Generating Board Property

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what date he proposes to set for the making of the scheme for the division of property which the Central Electricity Generating Board must prepare under section 66 of the Electricity Act 1989.

Mr. Wakeham: The Central Electricity Generating Board submitted on 12 March a scheme for transferring all the board's property, rights and liabilities to successor companies which subject to my approval and any modifications will come into force on 31 March 1990.

Bankside Power Station

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate has been made of the asset value of the Bankside power station site.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimate of the value placed on this site is commercially confidential.

Greenhouse Gas

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the contribution of coal to the United Kingdom (a) primary and (b) final energy consumption in the years 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985 and 1989; and what is the projected contribution for 2005 and 2020 in the range of scenarios set out in the evaluation of energy-related greenhouse gas emissions and measures to ameliorate them prepared for the intergovernmental panel on climate change.

Mr. Wakeham: The percentage contribution of coal to primary and final energy demands is shown in the table. Data for 1989 are provisional. Figures for 2005 and 2020 represent the range across all scenarios considered, on the basis of energy prices provided by the International Energy Agency.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the contribution of nuclear power to United Kingdom primary and final energy consumption in the years 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985 and 1989; and what is the projected contribution in the range of scenarios outlined in the evaluation of energy-related greenhouse gas emissions and measures to ameliorate them prepared for the intergovernmental panel on climate change.

Mr. Wakeham: The percentage contribution of United Kingdom-produced nuclear power to primary demand is shown in the table on a heat-supplied basis. Data for 1989 are provisional. Figures for 2005 and 2020 represent the range across all scenarios considered, on price assumptions provided by the International Energy Agency.

After the generation stage, in final energy consumption, it is not possible to separately identify the contribution of electricity from any particular source.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

National Curriculum

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to set up the national curriculum working parties in (a) physical education, (b) music and (c) art.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement shortly.

Gipsies

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he proposes to ensure rights of traveller children to education in those areas where authorities have not applied for grant under section 210 of the Education Reform Act 1988.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Section 6(1) of the Education Act 1980 places a duty on local education authorities to make arrangements to enable the parents of children in their area, including those of traveller children, to express a preference as to the school they wish their child to attend and to give reasons for their preference.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria have been established to determine allocation of grant under section 210 of the Education Reform Act 1988; and what plans he has to alter the level of funding for traveller education in future years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The draft circular issued in July 1989 indicated that in the case of satisfactory bids exceeding the total grant available priority would be given, as far as possible, to the maintenance of existing special provision. My right hon. Friend will review the level of funding for future years in the light of experience of the 1990-91 programme.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total amount of grant allocated for traveller education under section 210 of the Education Reform Act 1988 for the financial year 1990-91.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Expenditure of £7·9 million on traveller education is due to be supported through grant in 1990-91. Grant will be paid at the rate of 75 per cent.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether grants for traveller education under section 210 of the Education Reform Act are affected by whether local authorities applying have been granted designation under the Caravan Act 1968.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Grants are not affected by designation.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local authorities have applied, under section 210 of the Education Reform Act 1988 for grant to (a) finance existing traveller education provision and (b) to finance new provision; how many of (a) and (b) have received grant; and what is the amount of grant allocated to each local education authority.

Education Reform (Devon)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his best estimate of the cost to Devon county council of (a) circular 22/89, (b) introducing local management of schools and (c) introducing the national curriculum in the financial year 1990-91; and by what method each of the above was calculated.

Mr. Alan Howarth: On circular 22/89, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 14 March on the same subject. Estimates have not been made on an LEA by LEA basis of the additional costs of introducing LMS and the national curriculum in 1990-91. However, the additional pressures on spending nationally arising from the implementation of these reforms were among the factors taken into account in setting total standard spending for education for that year. Some of this spending is supported by specific grants (education support grants and local education authority training grants). Allocations of these grants to Devon LEA for 1990-91 will support spending of some £3·3 million on activities related to LMS and the national curriculum. These allocations are mainly determined by formulae relating to the number of pupils and schools in each authority.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Blackburn, Official Report, 7 March, columns 626-27, what assumption he made in calculating the cost of £620 million in 1990-91 of implementing the recommendations of the interim advisory committee on teachers' pay in the manner he has proposed of (a) the number of teachers who would be awarded pay supplements of £750 in the Inner London weighting area from 1 April, (b) the number of teachers awarded enhanced incremental points and (c) the number of teachers whose maximum was extended to £18,000.

Mr. MacGregor: I followed the IAC in assuming that 50 per cent. of eligible teachers would receive the new London pay supplement. The new main scale discretions, which will be introduced from 1 January 1991, are designed to give authorities a wider range of options on pay in the light of local circumstances: they will not necessarily lead to increases in costs overall.

Modern Languages

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the initial advice of the national curriculum working group for modern foreign languages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are publishing today the initial advice of the national curriculum working group for modern foreign languages, together with our letter to the group's chairman, Professor Martin Harris. Copies of the initial advice including the letter have been placed in the Library.

We welcome the progress which the group has made in developing the attainment targets and programmes of study for modern foreign languages in the national curriculum. The proposed structure covers the important aspects of learning a modern foreign language and it should provide a good basis for both developing and raising the linguistic competence of pupils of all abilities during compulsory secondary schooling.

We also welcome the helpful advice which the group has offered on the issues in its terms of reference. We hope that all those concerned with modern foreign languages will now take the opportunity during the consultation period to comment on the group's proposals in order to guide it in its further work. We look forward to receiving the group's final report by the end of July.

Capital Allocations

Mr. Thornton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide estimates showing for each financial year from 1978-79 to 1989-90 the capital spending allocations for (a) local education authorities and (b) voluntary-aided and special schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth [pursuant to his reply, 21 December 1989, column 351]: In my earlier reply, the figures for capital grants paid to voluntary-aided and special agreement schools were given, from 1982-83 to 1989-90, as gross amounts including the governing bodies' 15 per cent. contribution. The adjusted table shows the level of net DES capital grants to these schools:

	£ million
1978-79	16·4
1979-80	20·3
1980-81	22·1

	£ million
1981-82	24·0
1982-83	22·3
1983-84	19·0
1984-85	24·7
1985-86	31·0
1986-87	28·3
1987-88	31·6
1988-89	42·8
1989-90	55·5

Notes:
1. Capital grants are paid at the rate of 85 per cent. of gross expenditure; the balance of 15 per cent. is met by governing bodies.
2. From 1978-79 to 1981-82 capital grants were subsumed within a single building grant which included repairs and maintenance. The figures for this period in the table are estimates based on an apportionment of the building grant using the average ratio between capital and repairs during 1982-83 and 1985-86.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Abattoirs and Meat Inspection

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many of his staff, full-time equivalent, were involved in the supervision of abattoirs in 1988-89 and 1989-90;

(2) if he will list the number of man years of his staff involved in poultry meat inspection in 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Maclean: Local authorities are responsible for the supervision of slaughterhouses and for meat inspection. Officers of my Department visit plants to advise on hygiene and welfare standards. The manpower involved for 1988-89 was approximately 41 man years and we expect that it will be of a similar order for 1989-90. Of this, we estimate that in 1988-89 and 1989-90 seven man years were spent on poultry meat premises.

Food Safety Bill

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what level of new costs he expects to fall upon Devon county council in implementing the provisions of the Food Safety Bill and making preparation therefor, in the financial years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93, respectively.

Mr. Maclean: We have already announced that the Food Safety Bill is likely to create additional costs, for all the local authorities in Great Britain taken together, of the order of £30 million a year from 1991-92 onwards. This sum will be taken into account in the revenue support grant settlements, and will be reflected in the standard spending assessment for each authority. It is for individual authorities to plan their expenditure accordingly.

Butter Substitutes

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce further legal controls on butter substitutes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on 1 March 1990, at column 335.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to purchase at full value all offspring of cattle affected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the risks arising from his decision to allow the export of calves born of mothers affected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: The Southwood working party concluded that the risk to humans from BSE is remote and there is no evidence at present to show that the disease can be transmitted maternally from dam to offspring.

From 1 March, EC measures have restricted United Kingdom cattle exports to animals less than six months old and which are not the progeny of BSE-affected dams. Exports of cattle to third countries must satisfy the health conditions imposed by those countries.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further measures he proposes to take to prevent the spread of bovine spongiform encephalopathy among cattle and to reduce further the possibility of transmission to humans.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have introduced a comprehensive package of measures to tackle BSE in cattle and to eliminate the remote risk to public health.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the relationship between scrapie and bovine spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: BSE was almost certainly caused by feeding scrapie-infected protein material to cattle. The feeding to ruminants of protein material derived from ruminants was prohibited in July 1988.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has had from the National Farmers Union in respect of the incidence of bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: We have received a number of representations from the National Farmers Union about BSE.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps his Ministry will take to ensure that no threat is posed to humans by the sale of calves of six months or under, whose mothers are affected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: If transmission from dam to offspring can take place (and there is no evidence to indicate that this occurs), research into scrapie suggests that the agent of the disease would not be detectable in such young animals.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies have been undertaken to establish whether bovine spongiform encephalopathy can transfer from cattle to sheep; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Studies on the experimental transmission of BSE from cattle to sheep are being undertaken as part of the Ministry's programme of research announced on 9 January at column 572.

Salmonella

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to eliminate so far as is practicable salmonella in poultry breeding flocks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Under the Poultry Breeding Flocks and Hatcheries (Registration and Testing) Order 1989, registered owners of breeding flocks are required to have their flocks tested for the presence of salmonella and to comply with specific hygiene standards. A programme of compulsory slaughter, with compensation, has been introduced for flocks infected with salmonella enteritidis or salmonella typhimurium.

Scrapie

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies have been undertaken to establish whether scrapie can transfer from sheep to cattle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Epidemiological studies have shown that the most likely cause of BSE was feeding cattle with ruminant-based protein which included material from sheep infected with scrapie. Research investigating the experimental transmission of scrapie from sheep to cattle is not considered a priority.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether scrapie has been identified in muscle tissue in sheep; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: No.

Glacé Cherries

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the use of E127 on glacé cherries is permitted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The food colour erythrosine BS (E.127) is currently approved for use in both the United Kingdom and the European Community in a number of foodstuffs. The recent review of colouring matter in foodstuffs conducted by the Food Advisory Committee recommended in the light of fresh scientific evidence that the use of E.127 should be restricted to cocktail and glacé to a maximum level of 200 mg/kg. I have accepted that recommendation and will be taking steps to implement it in United Kingdom regulations in conjunction with European Community requirements as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Ian Richter

Q157. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will continue to seek to secure the release of Ian Richter from detention in Iraq.

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that our efforts to secure the release of Ian Richter on humanitarian grounds are continuing and will continue. Mr. Richter's case remains a cause of deep concern, as we have made clear to the Iraqis on many occasions.

Marine Archaeological Sites

Q206. Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister what recent discussions Her Majesty's Government have held with other European Community states concerning the protection of important marine archaeological sites; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: None.

Car Imports

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the restraints placed on the import of cars by individual member states; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The future treatment of car imports into the European Community from Japan was discussed at the Foreign Affairs Council on 5 March. The Commission is to open exploratory talks with Japan and the Government will consider any proposals resulting from these talks when they emerge.

The Government have put the case forcefully that there must be no obstacle to free trade between member states in all cars produced within the Community.

German Reunification

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the implications for the European Economic Community of the reunification of Germany; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The EC implications of German unification will be considered at an informal meeting of Community Heads of State and Government in Dublin on 28 April.

Marine Pollution

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received concerning action to reduce marine pollution.

The Prime Minister: The Government have recently had representations from a wide range of interested organisations and individuals including industry, environmental groups and members of the public in the run-up to the third North sea conference which took place in The Hague last week on 7 and 8 March.

The United Kingdom played a full and constructive part at the conference which, among other measures, agreed to

- reduce discharges to rivers and atmosphere for substances causing a major threat to the marine environment, such as cadmium, mercury, dioxins and lead by 70 per cent. or more by 1995;
- reduce emissions to the atmosphere for 17 dangerous substances by 50 per cent. or more by 1995, and at the latest by 1999;
- phase out all remaining identifiable uses of PCB by 1999 and to destroy them as far as possible in the country of origin and using storage only as an interim option;
- reduce nutrient inputs to the North sea by improving sewage discharge treatment standards and adopting secondary treatment as a general rule with exceptions in less sensitive areas; end sewage sludge dumping at sea at the latest by 1998 and to develop a programme to achieve this as soon as possible;

end incineration in the North sea by the end of 1991 (the United Kingdom will end it by the end of this year); protect dolphin and small cetacean species in the North sea and to co-operate on a programme to identify and protect a network of marine wildlife conservation sites around the North sea.

South Africa

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations and from whom, she has received regarding opposition to her current policy in South Africa; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I receive many representations from a wide range of people expressing both opposition and support for our policy towards South Africa.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what public expenditure will be incurred on publicising the lifting of limited sanctions with South Africa in order to encourage wider investment in that country; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in a written answer to a parliamentary question on 23 February 1990, Official Report, columns 934-35, announced the withdrawal of the advice on new investment in South Africa which was issued in 1986. This was a deserved response to the constructive steps taken by President de Klerk. However, it will, as before, be for companies and firms to make their own judgment about whether to invest in South Africa. The Government will neither encourage nor discourage them.

The statement made by the Secretary of State announcing the lifting of the ban was released as a press notice. Copies of this notice were also sent to relevant associated bodies and United Kingdom companies with existing interests in South Africa.

The Department of Trade and Industry incurred minor administrative costs in doing this.

Engagements

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 March.

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kashmir

Mr. Denis Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received a petition on behalf of the Jammu and Kashmir Plebiscite Front about the rights of the people of Kashmir to obtain self-determination; and what response he proposes to make.

Mr. Maude: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is writing to the right hon. Member. Both the Indian and Pakistan Governments are aware of our concern about the situation in Kashmir, and also of our long-standing view that their dispute over its status can be settled only by agreement between them.

North Korea

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), Official Report, column 702, 7 March, what action is taken to protect the well-being of British citizens who visit North Korea.

Mr. Maude: Since we do not recognise North Korea as a state, and accordingly have no relations with any authorities in North Korea, we can offer no consular protection there. British travellers to North Korea who seek advice from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are warned of this difficulty.

Archbishop Romero

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations have been made to the Salvadorean authorities about the murder of Archbishop Romero on 24 March 1980 and efforts to bring the perpetrators to justice.

Mr. Maude: None.

DEFENCE

Conventional Forces in Europe

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current United Kingdom and NATO holdings of equipment covered by the Vienna negotiations on conventional forces in Europe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Definitions of the treaty-limited items of equipment covered by CFE are not yet fixed. It is not therefore possible to be precise about the relevant holdings. But in general terms, on proposed western definitions the United Kingdom has some 1,250 battle tanks; 650 artillery pieces; 3,500 armoured combat vehicles; 1,000 combat aircraft; and 500 attack helicopters. Equivalent NATO figures are some 24,000 battle tanks; 18,000 artillery pieces; 30,000 armoured combat vehicles; 6,000 combat aircraft and 2,400 attack helicopters. The figures reflect the fact that for treaty purposes the definitions extend to equipment in storage and held in other non-operational forms, for example, in R and D and training establishments, rather than the more usual categorisation which reflects only equipment in active units.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if, at the next meeting of NATO Defence Ministers, he will raise the implications of the Soviet decision to move its nuclear warhead-testing site to the Novaya Zemlya Islands.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend will discuss a wide range of issues of mutual interest with other NATO Defence Ministers when they next meet at the nuclear planning group meeting early in May.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his counterpart in Norway concerning the plan by the Soviet Union to move its nuclear warhead-testing site to the Novaya Zemlya Islands.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Ministry of Defence Land

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review water access arrangements to Ministry of Defence land with a view to facilitating greater access when this would not pose security or safety problems.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is Ministry of Defence policy to allow access to our land and facilities for recreational, social or commercial purposes wherever this is consistent with operational, safety and security requirements and does not conflict with the interests of tenants or have a detrimental effect on local amenities and the environment.

Low Flying

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints about low flying were received in each month since November 1988 from addresses in (1) Scotland, (2) England, (3) Wales and (4) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Neubert: The number of total monthly inquiries and complaints received over the period 1 November 1988 to 28 February 1990 relating to military low-flying training in England, Scotland and Wales is as follows:

Month	England	Scotland	Wales
1988
November	254	81	50
December	137	63	26
1989
January	428	78	106

November	250	160	32
December	117	61	39
1990
January	267	93	18
February	256	71	62

No fixed-wing low-flying training is carried out in Northern Ireland. However, helicopters undertake low-flying operations in Northern Ireland and although no central records are available of complaints received, headquarters Northern Ireland received 38 complaints in 1988 and 50 in 1989.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-flying sorties were carried out over the United Kingdom in each month from November 1988 to the latest available date.

Mr. Neubert: The number of low-flying sorties flown in the United Kingdom in each month over the period of 1 November 1988 to 31 December 1989 is as follows:

Month	Sorties
1988
November	13,105
December	9,408
1989

Exercise Northaxe

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters are scheduled to take part in Exercise Northaxe 2/90; and what overland flying activity is planned during the exercise;

(2) what use is being made of (a) Stornoway airport, (b) Benbecula airport and (c) the Cape Wrath ranges as part of Exercise Northaxe 2/90.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Some 74 aircraft took part in Northaxe 2/90. Overland flying during the exercise was limited to transiting to and from Stornoway airport (to collect mail, stores and passengers for ships at sea), navigation training over north-west Scotland and the use of the Cape Wrath range. Benbecula airport was used as a diversion airfield.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many surface vessels and submarines are scheduled to take part in Exercise Northaxe 2/90; and what warnings have been issued to mariners about activities connected with this exercise.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Eleven vessels were involved in the exercise. Warnings of activity in the area round the Cape Wrath range between 6 and 9 March were issued to fishermen. It is not our normal practice to issue notices to mariners for exercises of this sort.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions have been given to military aircrew concerning interceptions of civilian air traffic during Exercise Northaxe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Military aircraft engaged on operational exercises have no instructions to intercept civilian aircraft and, in accordance with normal practice, aircrew have been instructed to avoid civilian aircraft during Exercise Northaxe.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of Exercise Northaxe 2/90; which nations are participating in the exercise; whether it is part of a regular series of exercises; and what plans exist to hold future Northaxe exercises in the region of the Minch.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Northaxe 2/90 is a primarily naval exercise which enables participant forces, all British, to practise their various anti-submarine and air defence roles. Northaxe exercises generally take place annually and one is provisionally planned for 1991.

Radiation

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals have received, in the last two decades, consecutive or separate annual radiation doses of more than 15 milliSieverts; and what is the total radiation dose, including doses of less than 15 milliSieverts, sustained by those workers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1990]: Records for radiation workers at the atomic weapons establishments are held separately from those for other Ministry of Defence radiation workers.

During the 17 years that AWE has been under the control of the Ministry of Defence, 91 individuals sustained attributable exposures to penetrating radiation determined to have been 15 mSv or more in each of one or more calendar years. The total attributable radiation exposure for all these individuals was approximately 15 person-sieverts.

Figures for other MOD radiation workers are readily available only for the period 1 January 1979 to 31 December 1989, when 1,484 individuals sustained attributable exposures to penetrating radiation determined to have been 15 mSv or more in each of one or more calendar years. The total attributable radiation exposure for all these individuals, based on a sample of 100, was approximately 143 person-sieverts.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many nuclear submariners have received radiation doses of more than 15 milliSieverts in two or more consecutive years, for the last two decades to the latest available date; if he will specify in ranges of 5 milliSieverts the doses into which those nuclear submarine personnel fall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1990]: In the period for which figures are readily available—1 January 1979 to 31 December 1989—60 naval personnel received radiation doses in excess of 15 milliSieverts per annum in two or more consecutive years. No naval personnel have received such consecutive doses for more than four years.

The 5 mSv ranges of lifetime radiation dose into which these individuals fall are shown in the table:

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals at CSB Faslane have been subjected to a total exposure to radiation of 10 milliSieverts over a period of six months in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Radiation dose data are not held in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance

59. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received seeking reform of the system of national insurance contributions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Representations have been received from the Confederation of British Industry about employers' national insurance, from the Institute of Directors about the upper earnings limit and from the Construction Industry Joint Taxation Committee about the closer integration of pay-as-you-earn tax and national insurance.

Child Benefit

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the total estimated saving to the Exchequer as a result of the freezing of child benefit in the financial years 1988-89 and 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

58. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the total estimated saving to the Exchequer as a result of the freezing of child benefit in the financial years 1988-89 and 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The sums involved are about £140 million and £210 million respectively.

Community Charge

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish in the Official Report the maximum net weekly incomes that would qualify for community charge rebates for (a) a single person aged 18 to 24 years, (b) a married couple with two children under 11 years, (c) a pensioner couple aged 60 to 79 years and (d) any person with capital in excess of £8,000, assuming community charge per adult levels of (i) £250, (ii) £300, (iii) £350, (iv) £400, (v) £438 and (vi) £328.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is shown in the table. Where a claimant or his partner has assessed capital in excess of £8,000 community charge benefit is not payable.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many other appeals have been received following that of Mrs. Morris and Whitbread concerning the effect of occupational pensions on unemployment benefit; what timetable he has established for dealing with these appeals; what consideration he has given to his general policy on this matter; and when he expects the social security commissioners to review the remainder of cases;

(2) if he will make a statement on the position of claimants aged 55 years or over in receipt of an occupational pension of £35 per week or over, whose unemployment benefit was reduced or removed on 1 January.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: From 1 January 1989 the age at which unemployment benefit is abated by the value of any occupational pension in excess of £35 per week was reduced from 60 to 55 years. The change affected people in receipt of unemployment benefit at the time and all subsequent claimants over age 55.

The appeal against the decision by the social security appeals tribunal in Mrs. Morris' case was heard by a tribunal of social security commissioners on 8 March and this decision is awaited. Pending the outcome of this case, employment service local offices are maintaining a record of people in similar circumstances who may wish to have their cases reviewed in the light of the commissioners' decision. These records, and the number of other appeals which might have been lodged, are not held centrally and the overall numbers could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Administration Costs

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the total administration costs as a percentage of benefit expenditure for each year from 1978-79 to 1989-90.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each of the Training Agency areas within Greater London, Merseyside, Greater Manchester, the Birmingham and Solihull Manpower Services Commission area and for Great Britain as a whole, what are the most recent monthly statistics for employment training showing (a) entrants in the latest available period, and the number of cumulative entrants since the scheme started, (b) a breakdown of entrants which shows how many were male and female, the length of time they had been out of work, their ethnic background and whether or not they had any disabilities, (c) the number of trainees in the latest available period who entered work placements and the cumulative total of how many are in work places at the latest available date, (d) trainees who left the scheme in the latest available period, and the number of cumulative leavers since the scheme started, (e) for all those trainees who have left the scheme how many found work; failed to attend; went on to another course of training or education; completed the course; left for sickness; or went back into unemployment and (f) the total number of currently filled places.

Mr. Nicholls: Information on entrants is given in table 1. The breakdown of entrants is given in table 2. Information about those entering or on work placements is not available. The estimated number of leavers in the most recent period is given in table 3. Information about the cumulative number of leavers since September 1988 is not available. Information about the destinations of leavers is not yet available. The number of filled places is given in table 4.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the work force at Easington district council are registered disabled.

Mr. Nicholls: As at 1 June 1989, 3·1 per cent of the work force of Easington district council were registered disabled, as published in the Employment Gazette in February 1990.

YTS

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people aged over 18 years are on YTS with special training needs endorsements.

Mr. Nicholls: A total of 15,900 young people aged over 18 were on YTS with special training needs endorsements on 31 December 1989.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Government intend to introduce an increase in the YT allowance, age related for 18-year-olds and over, in line with the principle set in April 1988 for income support claimants when rate liability was introduced.

Mr. Nicholls: There will be no change to the value of the higher rate of the youth training allowance. The present level of this allowance represents a clear lead over the corresponding level of the income support for 18-year-olds, and will continue to do so when the income support rates are increased in April.

Roustabout Training

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have gone through the roustabout training programme at the drilling instruction training centre; and what percentage of such people have subsequently been offered full-time employment by offshore contractors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: A total of 217 people have gone through the roustabout training programme operated by the offshore petroleum industry training board. Of these 191 or 88 per cent. have successfully completed their agreed training and have obtained full-time jobs with offshore drilling contractors. I welcome this extremely successful employment training initiative with the private sector and recognise the important contribution it makes in helping unemployed people find work and in meeting the labour needs of the oil industry.

Earnings

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what figures he has on the latest available evidence for average earnings for (a) 18 to 20-year-olds and (b) 20 to 40-year-olds by (i) gender and (ii) region.

Mr. Nicholls: The latest available information, for April 1989, is provided in the table:

Benefit Fraud

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total cost of fraud investigations conducted in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Eggar: The total cost of employment service fraud investigation in 1989 was £20·23 million.

Labour Relations

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has reconsidered the Government's reply to the Trades Union Congress's comments on the application of article 1 of International Labour Organisation convention 151, "Labour Relations —Public Service", to parliamentary staff, contained in the report of the committee of experts to the 71st conference of the International Labour Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Government have submitted further reports to the ILO since the committee of experts' report to the 71st conference in 1985 and have stated, following legal advice, that in the respects in question parliamentary staff enjoy the full range of normal employees' rights. The Government thus consider that the arrangements for parliamentary staff are fully in accordance with ILO convention 151 and that the application of article 1 of this convention to parliamentary staff is no longer at issue.

Toxic Substances

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many copies of each issue of the "Toxic Substances Bulletin" are provided and to whom they are distributed.

Mr. Nicholls: "Toxic Substances Bulletin" is issued twice a year and is available on subscription from the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). There are currently 2,400 subscribers, mainly from industry and professional institutions concerned with the control of exposure to hazardous substances at the workplace, accounting for 2,900 copies of the publication. A total of 1,500 copies are distributed within HSE and a small stock is held for new subscribers and complimentary issues.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of industrial establishments subject to the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations have registered a COSHH audit to 1 January 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no requirement under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988 for registration of COSHH audits.

Genetically Engineered Organisms

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment at how many locations experiments connected with the release or potential releases of genetically engineered organisms are taking place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Eleven centres have notified the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) of proposals to release genetically manipulated organisms to the environment. At eight of these centres, releases have taken place and the HSE is presently reviewing applications from the remaining three.

WALES

Local Government Finance

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average level of the poll tax so far declared by Welsh local authorities.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information available to me at present indicates that declared community charges range from £169 to £284 with a weighted average of £222.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for each of the past 10 years, for each county in Wales, the total expenditure by that county authority, and the contribution towards their spending that came from (a) Exchequer grants, (b) rate contributions, (c) capital receipts and (d) other sources.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 22 February 1990]: Information relating to the total expenditure for block grant purposes, rate income, rate support grant and the use of balances and other sources for each Welsh county for each of the past 10 years is shown in the following tables:

[1] As defined for Block Grant purposes. Net of specific and supplementary grants.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what targets were set by his Department and what are the actual sums set by each district, borough and city council for (a) each borough community charge and (b) each average sum for community council purposes within each council.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information about the actual level of community charge set by councils will be published when available. I have set no targets for 1990-91; it is for councils to determine their own budgets.

Milk

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairy farmers in the Carmarthen area are likely to produce more milk than their quota allows for this financial year and whose payments are now being reduced by the Milk Marketing Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: The position of individual producers under the quota arrangements is a matter for the Milk Marketing Board.

Health Authorities (Performance-related Pay)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for each district health authority in Wales the total payments made by way of performance-related pay during 1988-89; and what was the number of employees in each authority who received such performance-related pay.

Mr. Grist: The numbers of general and other senior managers authorised to receive performance-related pay additions to salary in 1988-89 are as shown in the following table:

Health authority	Number of senior staff authorised to receive PRP
Clwyd	10
Gwynedd	2
Powys	2
Gwent	6
Mid Glamorgan	9
South Glamorgan	8
West Glamorgan	8
East Dyfed	1
Pembrokeshire	3

Employing authorities have discretion to determine the level of payments within prescribed percentage limits. Particulars of actual payments made are confidential and information thereon is not held centrally.

EC Funds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the European Commission to ensure that adequate funds are available to meet the integrated development operation programme of Gwynedd, Dyfed and Powys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The major element of the integrated development operation (IDO) programme, £108 million of European regional development fund grant, was allocated in 1988 following my visit to Brussels in February of that year. The United Kingdom Government are currently in discussion with the Commission about the availability of sufficient funding to complete the IDO.

Roads

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was his original planned timetable for the construction of the Penydip tunnel on the A55 near Penmaenmawr together with the original estimated cost of this tunnel; and what is the latest timetable and estimated project cost.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The decision to proceed with a tunnel on the present alignment was taken in 1985. "Roads in Wales 1985" indicated that the estimated gross cost at November 1984 prices was £31·32 million and work was programmed to start between January 1988 and December 1990. Work on the four-year contract started in November 1989, at which time the estimated gross cost of the scheme was £79·4 million at October 1989 prices.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list those boroughs and district councils in Wales which in 1990-91 are estimated to pay more to central Government in respect of the uniform business rate than they will receive in return.

Mr. Peter Walker: Non-domestic rates are collected by the 37 Welsh charging authorities and (subject to netting-off arrangements) paid to the Welsh Office. The product is then redistributed by the Welsh Office to the 45 county and district councils in Wales as a flat-rate amount per head of population. Because both counties and districts receive shares of the amount collected, but only the districts collect, it follows that the amounts distributed to the boroughs and districts are in all cases less than the amounts they collect and pay to the Welsh Office.

Cancer

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure early publication of figures on the incidence in Wales of leukaemia, lung cancer, colon cancer and stomach cancer in each district in Wales in respect of the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Grist: As the actual numbers of certain cancer cases registered in a given year may be relatively small and subject to chance fluctuations, the publication of annual incidence rates in isolation may lead to misinterpretation. The practice has therefore been to produce several years' registrations with explanatory text. As previously advised, the most recently available information on cancer incidence rates in Wales is presented in "Cancer Registration in Wales, 1974-84", published in 1988.

It is intended that full data in respect of the period 1984 to 1986 together with a commentary will be published during 1990.

The Department is currently reviewing its procedures for collating information on patients who have developed cancer. In particular, the computer system for cancer registrations is being re-examined with a view to improving the speed and accuracy of recording. Subject to the outcome of this review it may be possible to complete the scrutiny of the records for 1987 and 1988 before the end of the year.

Flooding

Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make any changes to class XVII, vote 5, of his Department's cash limits in the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: As foreshadowed in my statements on 1 and 13 March, at columns 403 and 143 respectively, about the flood disaster in north Wales, the Government will be making contributions totalling £150,000 to the disaster funds.

This contribution will be met from savings on class XVII, vote 5, and the cash limit for the vote has been reduced accordingly from £268,972,000 to £268,822,000. As a result, the contribution will not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what financial support his Department is giving this year towards the teaching of Welsh to adults in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [pursuant to his reply, 20 February 1990, c. 630]: Unfortunately, due to an error an incorrect figure was given. The figure of £305,000 should read £356,000.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the annual expenditure on schemes to teach Welsh as a second language to adults in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [pursuant to his reply, 27 February 1990, c. 101]: Unfortunately, due to an error an incorrect figure was given. The figure of £305,000 should read £356,000.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many tutors are employed in a full-time capacity in Wales to teach the Welsh language to adults; and whether his Department has any plans to increase the number of full-time tutors of Welsh for adults.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [pursuant to his reply, 1 March 1990, c. 284]: Unfortunately, due to an error an incorrect figure was given. The figure of £305,000 should read £356,000.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Agricultural College

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure that the membership of the board of the new Scottish agricultural college is representative of the different geographical areas within Scotland, including the highlands and islands.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the press release issued on behalf of my noble Friend the Minister of State on 8 March which indicates the membership of the board of directors of the Scottish agricultural college, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. In deciding who should be invited to serve as directors, the Secretary of State took careful account of the desirability of representing the different geographical areas within Scotland, including the highlands and islands. He is confident that the new board adequately reflects the balance of backgrounds necessary to take forward the work of the Scottish agricultural college.

Tourism

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what reviews he is carrying out for Scotland under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Mr. Lang: The means by which Government support is delivered to the Scottish tourist industry, including the Scottish tourist board's section 4 assistance scheme, are kept under constant review. I remain satisfied that this support is both relevant and effective.

Under-age Drinking

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the relationship between alcohol sales in supermarkets and under-age drinking in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Both the 1986 survey on adolescent drinking conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and the 1987 report of the working group on alcohol and young people chaired by Baroness Masham identified under-age drinking as a major problem, and off-sale premises—including supermarkets—as a significant source of supply for under-age drinkers.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he issues any guidance on the enforcement of the law against sale of alcohol to under-age drinkers in Scotland; what action he intends to take to improve enforcement; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Enforcement of the law against sale of alcohol to under-age persons is an operational matter for the police. The Government are, however, concerned about under-age drinking and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill includes measures to restrict unsupervised off-sales by persons under the age of 18. These measures, if enacted, should significantly reduce the chance of illegal sales through ignorance, deliberate flouting of the law, or collusion between an under-age purchaser and a young sales assistant.

Deaf-blind Children

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many deaf-blind children have been identified in Scotland in the age range (a) nought to two, (b) two to five, (c) six to 11, (d) 12 to 15 and (e) 16 to 19 years;

(2) how many deaf-blind children in Scotland attend specialist deaf-blind units;

(3) what plans he has to issue a policy statement on the education of deaf-blind children in Scotland;

(4) what provision is made to ensure the training of teachers of deaf-blind children in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Carnbooth school in Glasgow operates as a centre for deaf-blind children from all parts of Scotland. It has nine pupils in all: six aged between six and 11, two between 12 and 15 and one between 16 and 19. Provision for other deaf-blind children is made by the education authorities in whose areas they reside. Details of the age distribution of such children are not held centrally.

I have no plans at present to issue a policy statement on the education of deaf-blind children. However, my Department is presently funding Moray House college of education and Carnbooth school to produce a training programme for teachers and carers of deaf-blind children.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what support is provided to the families of pre-school deaf-blind children in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Local authorities have statutory responsibilities for the care and support of young children who are sensorily handicapped and their families. Health boards have similar responsibilities in relation to Health Service provision and there are well-established arrangements for co-operation between health and social work services. Decisions on the nature and extent of assistance to be provided are for the authorities themselves, having regard to the resources available to them.

The Scottish Office supports two voluntary organisations which, to varying degrees, support such children and their families. The Carers' National Association has recently been awarded a grant of up to £31,750 during 1990-91 under section 10(1) of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 towards the cost of setting up and running an office in Scotland. The association offers information, advice, training and support to carers who look after all types of people, not only those who are sensorily handicapped. SENSE in Scotland is a specialised voluntary organisation which provides a wide range of service and support specifically for deaf-blind young people and their families. It is currently receiving a grant of around £60,000, comprising £45,000 revenue and £15,000 capital support, also under section 10(1) of the 1968 Act.

With regard to financial support from the DSS, the full range of social security benefits is available to families with disabled children. In particular for families on income support, the disabled child premium will be more than doubled from £6·50 to £15·40 from April; lower rate attendance allowance (£25·05 from April) is available for all severely affected deaf-blind children; and invalid care allowance (£28·20 from April) may be available to the parent or other carer who spends at least 38 hours each week caring for a disabled child for whom attendance allowance is paid.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his response to the representations of the Scottish Association of Master Bakery in relation to temperature control of bakery-crafted produce and food hygiene.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The representations made by the association will be taken fully into account in the revision of the food hygiene regulations.

Seal Culling

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the level of illegal seal culling in fish farming areas.

Mr. Lang: Any evidence of a suspected offence under the Conservation of Seals Act 1970 in Scotland should be reported to the police or procurator fiscal. The outcome of any subsequent proceedings is a matter for the courts.

The Scottish Salmon Growers Association has developed, in collaboration with various wildlife conservation interests, including the Nature Conservancy Council, a code of practice on salmon farming and predatory wildlife. This was published in February this year and lays down the general policy, which my right hon. and learned Friend welcomes, that shooting or other methods of destructive control must be considered only as a last resort. In relation to seals, the code of practice emphasises that the killing of a particular animal may be considered only after reasonable measures have been taken to exclude seals from salmon farms.

Education Budget

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the change in cash and percentage terms to his education budget in 1990-91 as against 1989-90 (a) including student support and (b) excluding student support.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Education expenditure will increase by £49 million or 13·1 per cent. between 1989-90 and 1990-91. Excluding student support, the increase is £5 million, or 2·1 per cent. No valid comparisons can be made between these separately calculated increases because of the effect on higher educational institutions of the switch to higher student fees.

Inverclyde Enterprise Zone

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created in the Inverclyde enterprise zone.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Two hundred and fifteen jobs have been created and a further 347 jobs forecast by firms which have established or announced their intention to establish in the Inverclyde enterprise zone.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Electoral Registration

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 8 March to the hon. Member for Copeland, Official Report, column 818, if he will provide (a) a breakdown by country of the £760,000 for overseas electoral registration expenditure for 1990-91 and (b) a breakdown of the £486,000 expenditure in Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not readily available. I will write to the hon. Member.

Race Relations (Prisons)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account of race relations issues is taken by the prison department in the drafting of new contracts with individual prison governors.

Mr. Mellor: Regional directors have been asked to ensure that every governor's contract for 1990-91 includes objectives relating to the race relations liaison officer, the race relations management team and ethnic monitoring.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to allow prisoner representation on race relations and other internal committees in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: We are considering what guidance we might offer to governors about prisoner representation on race relations committees. As regards committees generally, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 16 January 1990 at column 176.

Ethnic Minorities (Prisons)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total and ethnic minority numbers for the latest date available in (a) HMP Long Lartin, (b) HMP Parkhurst, (c) HMP Wakefield, (d) HMP Holloway, (e) HMP Frankland, (f) HMP Albany, (g) HMP Full Sutton, (h) HMP Gartree, (i) HMP Maidstone, (j) HMP Nottingham, (k) HMP Lewes and (l) HMP Wormwood Scrubs.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information is given in the table:

[1] The figures are those recorded centrally and are approximate.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reassessment he has now made of his parliamentary answers and Adjournment debate replies in the case of Colin Wallace.

Mr. Waddington: I have nothing to add to the answer given to the question from the hon. Member on 14 February 1990 at column 238.

Breathalyser Technology

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now issue a general circular to chief constables confirming the position stated by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport on 14 March 1988, Official Report, column 974, that the police have no powers to prevent clubs or pubs from installing breath alchohol testing machines.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. I see no need to do so.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at the latest available date, how many male and female prisoners in England and Wales are currently remanded in custody awaiting medical reports.

Mr. Mellor: The data on remands in custody awaiting a medical report are collected annually and are not available centrally in a form which would enable a figure to be given for the number held on remand for this purpose on a particular date. This could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in each year since 1979, how many male and female prisoners in England and Wales were remanded in custody for medical reports.

Mr. Mellor: The number of male and female prisoners in England and Wales remanded into custody for medical reports since 1980 is as follows:

	Males	Females
1980	7,587	1,058
1981	7,225	1,006
1982	7,506	832
1983	7,507	840
January 1984—March 1985	8,289	1,032
1985-86	7,578	782
1986-87	5,860	676
1987-88	5,493	481
1988-89	5,043	652

Figures are not available for 1979 and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Acid House Parties

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about acid house parties held in Lancashire.

Mr. John Patten: We have received a number of representations, both from hon. Members and members of the public, about acid house or pay parties. Some of these representations referred to Lancashire in particular but it is not possible to determine which particular events caused concern to our correspondents.

Police (Pay)

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the real increase in a police constable's pay over the last 10 years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Between March 1980 and March 1990, the basic pay of a police constable increased by 100 per cent., from £5,334 to £10,671 a year. Over the same period, the retail prices index increased by 86·9 per cent. and the tax and prices index by 77·3 per cent.

Firearms Certificates

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on fees for firearms and shotgun certificates.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It has been the policy of successive Governments that there should be full recovery from fees of the cost of operating the firearms licensing system. As a step towards this end my right hon. and learned Friend laid before Parliament on 27 February the Firearms (Variation of Fees) Order 1990, a copy of which is in the Library.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details, listing the sums provided and the names of the organisations, of all voluntary organisations working in penal affairs to which his Department gives grants and other financial assistance.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 13 February 1990]: I list in the table the voluntary organisations to which the Home Office gives grants for their work with offenders and ex-offenders and the amounts of those grants in 1989-90:

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 12 March 1990]: For information up to 1988-89, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on 6 April 1989 at column 240. In 1989-90 payments in respect of preliminary expenses on the privatisation of the Independent Broadcasting Authority's transmission system are expected to total £237,000. Parliamentary authority for such payments amounting to £752,000 in 1990-91 will be sought in the supply estimates.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total fees paid out by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his latest estimate for the current year and budget for 1990-91.

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 12 March 1990]: For information prior to 1987-88 I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on 6 April 1989 at column 240. The equivalent estimate of payments made for the financial year 1988-89 is £1,257,000; the latest estimated expenditure for 1989-90 is £1,547,525 and the budget for 1990-91 is £2,159,300.

John Harker

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his inquiries into the case of Mr. John Harker are now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. The case is still under consideration. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as we have been able to complete our inquiries.

Asylum

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if in the light of the decision of the High Court to override the immigration authority's decision not to permit Lebanese asylum seekers staying over in Britain en route for a third country to remain here, he will either appeal against the decision or introduce legislation to plug this loophole.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The High Court found that in the particular circumstances of these applications directions could not be issued requiring removal to Brazil. My right hon. and learned Friend has decided that the Government will not appeal against this judgment and the claims for asylum will now be considered in this country.

We shall keep the position under review in case any changes in procedures, or legislation become necessary.

Special Constables

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out by reference to police forces the number of special constables in post in 1985 and in 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of special constables in post as at 31 December in each police force in England and Wales was as follows:

Total	16,161	15,589

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to review the training programmes for special constables.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The training of special constables is to be reviewed by the central planning and training unit, commencing this spring.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total annual cost of special constables.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The total annual cost of special constables as recorded by police authorities for 1988-89 was £2,456,561.

Avon and Somerset Constabulary

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ask for a report from the chief constable of Avon and Somerset constabulary on the events outside Bristol council house on 6 March.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable of Avon and Somerset that in the early afternoon of 6 March demonstrators began to gather outside the council house in Bristol where the city council was meeting to consider the level of community charge. By 3.30 pm the crowd had grown to around 600 people. The crowd included some supporters of Militant and the Anti-Poll Tax Federation. At 3.45 pm a number of demonstrators attempted to force their way into the council house. They were prevented from doing so by the police.

Further sporadic outbreaks of disorder occurred throughout the afternoon and early evening as elements of the crowd tried unsuccessfully to break the police lines. Missiles were thrown from the crowd and officers were kicked and punched. The demonstrators began to disperse at around 7.30 pm when the council meeting was concluded. A section of the crowd then proceeded to march into the city centre causing serious traffic congestion. A number of cars were damaged and three shops had their windows broken. A number of demonstrators returned to the council house and held a short meeting outside. These demonstrators had dispersed by 9.15 pm. Twenty-one people were arrested, mainly for public order offences. Five police officers were injured, three requiring hospital treatment.

Penal Establishments

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the penal establishments in England and Wales, by security category, giving the number of inmates in each, at a convenient date in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Mellor: Prison service establishments are classified by main function; subdivision into security category is practised only for male training prisons. A list of all establishments in England and Wales with their inmate populations on 31 December each year has been deposited in the Library. For a variety of reasons, training prisons may hold a number of inmates whose individual security classification is lower than that of the establishment itself.

Police Rent Allowance

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning the outcome of representations he has received on his decision to set aside certain elements of the police negotiating board's recommendations on rent allowance.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 25 January 1990, columns 884-85]: Amending regulations were laid before both Houses of Parliament on 9 March. I have received representations from several quarters about the effect of these on officers in police forces whose maximum limits of rent allowance were last reviewed in 1988, on the grounds that they are at a disadvantage as compared with officers whose forces had a review date in 1989. I have therefore decided that officers whose allowances were last reviewed in 1988 and who are due to have their rent allowances protected at their existing amounts on 31 March should have those amounts increased as from 1 April by the movement in the retail prices index since their force maximum limit was last reviewed. Further amending regulations to give effect to my decision will be made as soon as possible.

This is in addition to the arrangements already provided for in the amending regulations whereby no officer in receipt of rent allowance on 31 March will receive less after that date than he was getting then.

I have also decided that officers in accommodation provided by their police authorities should receive a transitional allowance of £300 a year for three years. This is provided for in the amending regulations already laid. This decision is in recognition of the fact that up till now such officers have occupied their accommodation free of rates.

HEALTH

Population Statistics

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the current estimates and projections of the population aged 16 years and over, men and women, by standard region including Greater London for June each year from 1975 to the current year;

(2) what are the current estimates and projections of the population of working age, men and women, by standard region including Greater London for June each year from 1975 to the current year.

Mr. Freeman: I have placed the information in the Library.

Community Care

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is being made to provide community facilities for the mentally ill and handicapped.

Mr. Freeman: It is for health authorities and social services authorities to collaborate to provide, within reasonable resources, community facilities for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people. Subject to the enactment of current legislation, resources will be augmented by a transfer from social security to local authorities and by the introduction of a specific grant to help increase the social care available for people with a mental illness.

Psychotherapy

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what National Health Service in-patient facilities exist, other than the Cassel hospital, Richmond, Surrey, to provide psychotherapeutic treatment for severely disturbed patients and families.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally.

Cassel Hospital, Richmond

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the proposal by the Riverside health authority to close the Cassel hospital, Richmond.

Mr. Freeman: I have received letters from a number of hon. Members and others and responded for the Government in an Adjournment debate moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 9 February at columns 1201-08.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give for each Yorkshire and Humberside health authority the total available patient beds for each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the table.

Disabled People

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place a final copy of the report made under section 11 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: Copies are available in the Library.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in the light of the findings of the SSI report, "Developing Services for Disabled People", he plans to ring-fence the money allocated for the remaining sections of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: No money has been allocated for the remaining sections of the Act. In general, we believe that Government support for local authority expenditure is best provided through the revenue support grant, to ensure maximum local accountability.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in the light of the findings of the SSI report, "Developing Services for Disabled People", he plans to ring-fence the money for community care services for disabled people under his new arrangements for community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No. We believe that Government support for community care expenditure, as with other important local authority functions, is best provided through the revenue support grant. This will ensure maximum local accountability and encourage value for money by enabling local authorities to make decisions about community care based on local factors.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date he expects to lay a final draft of the report to Parliament under section 11 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 before Parliament; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The report was laid before Parliament on 21 December 1989.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date the first meeting with local authority associations was held to discuss implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: The implementation of these sections of the Act was discussed in the course of a meeting with the local authority associations on 4 July 1988, when it was agreed that work on other sections should take priority. Officials have now written to the associations to seek their views on the cost and other implications of these sections, and intend to arrange a further meeting with them to discuss these issues in due course.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the findings of the SSI monitoring of sections 5 and 6 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and what steps he will be taking to publicise its findings.

Mr. Freeman: The social services inspectorate's report "Developing Services for Disabled People", published on 6 February, gave the results of an inspection of all sections of the Act in force, including sections 5 and 6. The findings of a more specific study of the progress of six authorities towards implementation of sections 5 and 6 are due to be published shortly, and copies will be placed in the Library.

Overseas Treatment

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the average cost incurred by United Kingdom passport holders who, when falling ill abroad, required treatment.

Mr. Freeman: No information on this subject is collected or held centrally.

Wakefield DHA

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Wakefield of 8 March, Official Report, column 827, if he will make it his policy to make privately available to the hon. Member for Wakefield a copy of the director of audit's report relating to Wakefield district health authority's cook-chill catering system, when it is completed.

Mr. Freeman: No. If a report is issued it will be sent for consideration by Wakefield district health authority, Yorkshire regional health authority and the Secretary of State.

General Practitioners

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what allowance will be made for general practitioner remuneration in the light of his Department's non-issue of the child health surveillance fee claim;

(2) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that general practitioners receive sufficient supplies of child health surveillance fee claim forms by 30 March.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Stocks of the new child health surveillance fee claim form were issued to all family practitioner committees by 5 March 1990 for distribution to general practitioners.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many electoral wards would qualify for general practitioner deprivation payments if a score of 16 rather than 30 had been chosen as the trigger point for payment; and what would be the extra cost.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The number of wards (1981 boundaries) which have a Jarman score of 16 or more in England is 1,249. If deprivation payments were to be made at this level (16 or more) the cost would have to be met by reducing other fees and allowances within the remuneration system, to ensure that the average net income incurred by GPs did not exceed the level recommended by the doctors and dentists' review body and accepted by the Government. If the payment rate proposed for the band 30-39 was extended down to 16, some £30 million at April 1990 rates would have to be found by reducing other fees and allowances.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the electoral wards where general practitioners will qualify in England for deprivation payments; and if he will indicate what their Jarman index score is.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 March 1990]: I have placed information in the Library showing the wards (1981 boundaries) in England which have a score of 30 or more and the appropriate local authority district. The table shows that there are 269 wards with a score between 30 and 39 which will attract deprivation payment from April 1990 of £4·90 per patient per annum, 112 wards with a score between 40 and 49 (deprivation payment of £6·40 per annum) and 73 wards with a score of 50 or more (deprivation payment of £8·50 per annum) giving a grand total of 454 wards.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision there is to abate or reduce the fees of the Medicines Control Agency for orphan drugs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A reduced fee (currently £13,600 instead of £68,000) is payable for a major product licence application covered by paragraph 5 of chapter III of part 3 of the annex to EC directive 75/318.

The term "orphan drug" is of United States origin and has no direct counterpart in United Kingdom or EC legislation. It is considered that the above directive provision (which deals with situations where comprehensive data on therapeutic safety and efficacy cannot be provided) covers the concept of "orphan drugs".

Prescribed Medicines

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he intends to publish the recent research for his Department on the attitude of pharmacists to the prescribed medicines taken by the elderly.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the study "Elderly people, their medicines and their doctors" by Ann Cartwright and Christopher Smith which was published by Routledge in 1988. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library.

One element of the research was an assessment by a clinical pharmacologist and two pharmacists of the appropriateness of the prescribed medicines taken by the elderly people in the study. They found that 31 per cent. of the prescribed medicines were assessed as pharmacologically open to question, for example because of potentially harmful interactions or inappropriate dosages.

Ambulance Workers, Dewsbury

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on how many ambulance workers in Dewsbury are trained paramedics; and how many paramedic ambulance workers have been trained by Dewsbury health authority.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may like to contact the chairman of Yorkshire regional health authority, Sir Bryan Askew, for further information.

E111

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take urgent steps to ensure that all post offices and sub-post offices in the Wakefield constituency have an adequate supply of his Department's form E111.

Mr. Freeman: A further supply of forms E111 was received in the post office stores in Swindon on 12 March. Post offices and sub-post offices should apply for stocks through their usual channels.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the exemption from the community charge, to be given to mentally ill people, will be dependent on the definitions laid down in the Mental Health Act 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Exemption from the community charge will not be dependent on the definition laid down in the Mental Health Act 1983.

Provided that a person is in receipt of one of the qualifying benefits listed in schedule 1 (paragraph 4) of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 (as amended by the Personal Community Charge (Exemptions) Order 1989, SI 1989/442, and the Personal Community Charge (Exemptions for the Severely Mentally Impaired) Order 1990, SI 1990/462) and is in receipt of a certificate from a registered medical practitioner stating that he is severely mentally impaired he will be exempt from the community charge.

Food Poisoning

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what factors he ascribes the continued increase in reported food poisoning incidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) on 8 February at columns 773-74.

Children (Employment)

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prohibition orders under section 2(3)(a) and requirement orders under section 2(3)(b) of the Employment of Children Act 1973 have been served by (a) local education authorities in England and Wales and (b) education authorities in Scotland since the Act became law.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The Employment of Children Act 1973 has not been implemented. In England and Wales, equivalent provisions to sections 2(3)(a) and (b) of the Act are available in section 59 of the Education Act 1944. This enables local education authorities to serve a notice on an employer to prohibit or to impose restrictions on the employment of any child. In addition, section 18 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 provides for local authorities to make byelaws which regulate the employment of children and which prohibit children from being employed in any specified occupation. All local authorities (except Isles of Scilly) have such byelaws.

Figures notified to the Home Office for prosecutions and convictions under sections 18, 19 and 20 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 are as follows:

	Prosecutions	Convictions
1979	23	18
1980	26	25
1981	24	22
1982	17	16
1983	12	12
1984	12	9
1985	11	9
1986	2	2
1987	8	8
1988	28	22

Matters relating to the employment of children in Scotland are for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the report by Kathleen Murray entitled "Personal Data in Social Services Records, Access and Disclosure Policy in Practice" commissioned by his Department was completed; and when he expects to publish it.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Kathleen Murray's report on access to personal social services records was completed last year. The report is a substantial piece of work and is being given careful consideration with a view to publication.

Independent Taxation

8. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect independent taxation will have on low-income households.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Almost 400,000 married couples with combined incomes below £10,000 a year will pay less tax as a result of the change to independent taxation.

Mr. Ryder: The German Government are well aware of the United Kingdom's position on sterling's participation in the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

26. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average inflation rate of countries in the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ryder: It is 4·2 per cent. in December if owner-occupiers' housing costs are excluded.

Mr. Lilley: Our conditions for entry are well known.

Gas and Electricity Prices

15. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the effect of proposed price increases in the gas and electricity industries on the retail prices index.

Mr. Norman Lamont: British Gas has announced average price rises of 7½ per cent. from 1 March. Given the weight of gas of 2·2 per cent., this should have an impact of between 0·15 and 0·2 per cent. on the retail prices index, once the new tariffs have been fully implemented. The electricity boards are in the course of announcing their prices for 1990-91.

Mortgages

19. Mr. Snape: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates to be the effect on the average mortgage of an increase in mortgage rates from 9·5 per cent. to 15·5 per cent.

20. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates to have been the effect on the average mortgage of the increase in mortgage rates from 9·5 per cent. to 15·5 per cent.

Mr. Lilley: In July 1988, when the mortgage interest rate was 9·8 per cent., the monthly interest payment on the average mortgage, net of basic rate tax relief, was £128·63. At an interest rate of 15·5 per cent., the payment would be £203·44, if the level of outstanding capital was unchanged.

Non-oil GDP

21. Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of non-oil gross domestic product non-oil taxes and national insurance contributions represented in (a) 1978-79 and (b) 1989-90.

Mr. Ryder: Non-oil taxes and national insurance contributions amounted to 34·1 per cent. of non-oil GDP in 1978-79, and 37·1 per cent. in 1988-89, the latest available year.

Value Added Tax

23. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross earnings value added tax took up for a family on average male earnings with two children in 1978-79 and 1989-90.

Mr. Ryder: Approximately 2·7 per cent. and 5·0 per cent. respectively. Over the same period his real take-home pay has risen by 32 per cent.

49. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new businesses have registered for value added tax in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Ryder: The number of new VAT registrations processed by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in the calendar year was 261,783. This represents a 50 per cent. increase over 1980.

41. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross earnings value added tax took up for a family on average male earnings with two children in 1978-79 and 1989-90.

Mr. Ryder: A family consisting of a married man on average male earnings, his wife and two children would have paid approximately 2·7 per cent. of gross earnings in VAT in 1978-79 and will pay about 5·0 per cent. in 1989-90. Over the same period his real take-home pay has risen by 32 per cent.

Inflation

27. Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current rate of inflation.

Mr. Ryder: The all-items RPI annual inflation rate in January was 7·7 per cent. The underlying inflation rate, as measured by the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments, was 6·1 per cent.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many European countries have a higher inflation rate than the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ryder: Four EC countries have higher inflation rates than the United Kingdom when estimates of home owners' costs are excluded so as to bring the published figures on to a more comparable basis.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his Department has undertaken any study into the effect of the change in arrangements for local taxation on the rate of inflation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The change in the arrangements for local taxation is one among many factors which will affect the rate of inflation. A forecast for RPI inflation will be published in the forthcoming "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the overall inflation rate, based on the retail prices index, in each month from January 1986 to the latest available date.

Mr. Ryder: The information may be obtained from the latest issue of Employment Gazette and the latest annual supplement to Economic Trends (1989 edition).

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to have zero inflation.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg).

Charities

28. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money was raised through value added tax on charities in 1989; and what was the comparable figure in real terms 10 years ago.

Mr. Ryder: For the value added tax paid by charities in 1989, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to him on 15 February [Official Report, column 338]. It is estimated that 10 years ago charities paid at today's values between £100 million and £150 million in value added tax.

Interest Rates

29. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received any representations about the impact of interest rates from (a) Scottish businesses, (b) local authorities, (c) fishermen's organisations, (d) council tenants and (e) home owners.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on this subject from a wide variety of sources.

57. Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were long-term interest rates in (a) the United Kingdom (b) West Germany and (c) Japan (i) 12 months ago and (ii) currently.

Mr. Ryder: The information requested is as follows:

Long term interest rates[1]

Caravan Sites

31. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from caravan site owners in respect of value added tax.

Mr. Ryder: A delegation from the two national trade associations representing caravan park owners saw the then Economic Secretary shortly after the changes in the taxation of holiday caravan pitch rentals were introduced from 1 April last year. My hon. Friend confirmed the Government's decision to tax these pitch rentals but was able to give some reassurances about the impact on charges made by caravan park owners for electricity, water, gas and rates.

Business Investment

32. Mr. Paice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on his latest forecast for the share of gross domestic product taken by business investment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The success of this Government in encouraging business investment is widely recognised. Business investment as a proportion of gross domestic product is expected to have been the highest ever recorded in 1989.

Manufacturing Investment

33. Mr. Hind: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to meet the director-general of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss investment in manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the level of manufacturing investment was in the fourth quarter of 1989; and what percentage change this was on the third quarter.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the level of manufacturing investment was in the fourth quarter of 1989; and what percentage change this was on the third quarter.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Provisional estimates of manufacturing investment in the fourth quarter of 1989 and estimates for earlier quarters are contained in the press notice CSO (90) 25 0, "Capital Expenditure by Manufacturing Industries", issued on 15 February 1990. Copies of this notice are available from the Library of the House. Revised estimates will be included in the GDP press notice for release on 16 March.

Mr. Lilley: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 15 January 1990, Official Report, column 96.

Exchange Controls

38. Mr. Adley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the removal of exchange controls on confidence in the currency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The removal of United Kingdom exchange controls in 1979 has had a wholly beneficial effect on the economy.

Self-employment

39. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on his plans to encourage self-employment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Self-employment has increased by 72 per cent. since 1979 as a result of the Government's policies to encourage enterprise. My right hon. Friend has recently received a large number of representations on these policies.

Personal Savings

40. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on measures required to boost personal savings.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations concerning the subject of saving.

Mr. Lilley: In 1988, taxes on consumers' expenditure (net of subsidies) accounted for 30 per cent. of total taxes and national insurance contributions. There is no unambiguous definition of taxes related to employment and wealth creation.

Investment and Consumption

47. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the growth in total investment and in total consumption during the 1980s.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Total fixed investment grew by 42 per cent. in volume terms between 1980 and 1988, the latest full year for which estimates are available. Over the same period, the volume of total domestic final consumption grew by 26 per cent.

Exports and Imports (Non-oil)

48. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the underlying trend for the growth in non-oil export volume; and what it is for import volume.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the three months to January, export volumes (less oil and erratics) were 4 per cent. higher than in the previous three months, while import volumes (less oil and erratics) fell by 1 per cent. Export volumes were 11 per cent. higher than in the same period a year earlier, but import volumes were only 2 per cent. higher.

Corporation Tax

50. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the corporation tax rate in the United Kingdom and other European Community countries.

Mr. Lilley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on 18 January 1990, Official Report, columns 400-02.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was corporation tax as a percentage of gross domestic product in 1978-79 and 1988-89.

	Per cent.

1988-89	4·0

51. Mr. Hague: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the growth during the 1980s of manufacturing productivity in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other major industrial countries.

Mr. Ryder: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick).

Privatisation

52. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations against his privatisation programme have been received from employees of companies already privatised.

Mr. Lilley: I have no way of knowing by whom those who write to the Treasury are employed. But the popularity of the privatisation programme with the employees of privatised industries is amply demonstrated by the large numbers of those employees who apply for shares in their companies on privatisation. Most recently, some 37,500 employees (over 85 per cent. of those eligible) applied for shares in the water offers.

Workplace Nurseries

53. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received recently about the taxation treatment of workplace nurseries.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on this subject.

European Monetary System

54. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate the appropriate conditions for full United Kingdom membership of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) on 28 November 1989, Official Report, column 195.

55. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on developments towards economic and monetary union within the Community.

Mr. Ryder: Measures to improve the co-ordination of member states' economic and monetary policies were discussed at the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers on 12 March, about which I reported to the House on 14 March.

Preparation for the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union, which will begin at the end of the year, is taking place in the Council and its committees.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions took place at the most recent meeting of ECOFIN about the implementation of stage 1 of the Delors report on economic and monetary union.

In November 1981 a number of additional functions were transferred to the Treasury from the Civil Service Department, increasing Treasury numbers to 4,177 at 1 January 1982. The number employed at 1 February 1990 was 3,155.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his written reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 8 January, Official Report, columns 553-56, on mortgage interest relief by range of income, whether he will provide a breakdown for each region.

Mr. Lilley: The information requested is not available for each region. The regional distribution of mortgagors and mortgage interest relief can be estimated from the family expenditure survey (FES), but the sample size for the FES is not large enough to provide more detailed estimates for each region. The table provides the available estimates:

Regional share of mortgagors and mortgage interest relief based on FES data for 1986 and 1987

	Mortgagors (per cent.)	Mortgage interest relief (per cent.)
Northern	5·1	4·3
Yorkshire and Humberside	8·6	7·5
North West	12·0	10·5
East Midlands	7·8	6·8
West Midlands	8·3	7·4
East Anglia	3·6	3·7
Greater London	10·9	13·3
Other South East	22·6	26·0
South West	8·1	8·2
Wales	5·2	4·6
Scotland	6·3	6·4
Northern Ireland	1·5	1·3
United Kingdom	100·0	100·0

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many individuals in Scotland are currently receiving mortgate interest tax relief; and what were the comparable figures for 1973-74, 1978-79, 1983-84, 1988-89 and 1989-90;

(2) what is the current cost to the Exchequer of paying mortgage interest tax relief in Scotland; and what was the cost in 1973-74, 1978-79, 1983-84, 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Lilley: Precise estimates of mortgagors and mortgage relief in Scotland are not available. The 1986 and 1987 family expenditure surveys indicate that 6·3 per cent. of all mortgagors are in Scotland and they claim 6·4 per cent. of all mortgage interest relief. This would imply about 600,000 mortgagors receiving £450 million mortgage interest relief in 1989-90. The equivalent figures for 1988-89 are 570,000 and £350 million. Information for the earlier years is not available.

Company Taxes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of company income went in taxes in 1978-79 and 1988-89.

Mr. Lilley: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Per cent.
1978-79	38·9
1988-89	38·7

Taxes comprise corporation tax, petroleum revenue tax, employers' national insurance contributions, national insurance surcharge and business rates.

Company income, including public corporations, in the calendar year is as defined in the national accounts, net of interest payments.

Trade Deficits

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which OECD countries had trade deficits that were bigger as a percentage of gross domestic product than the United Kingdom's in 1989.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which OECD countries have, by latest estimates, trade deficits that are bigger as a percentage of gross domestic products than the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ryder: I would refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) earlier today.

TUC

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met representatives from the Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor last met representatives from the TUC at the National Economic Development Council on 10 January.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount of mortgage interest paid by owner-occupiers for 1988; and what is the comparable amount in 1989.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) earlier today.

Visible Trade Balance

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate for the United Kingdom visible balance.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information may be found in table 1 of the monthly press notice on the current account of the balance of payments, published on 28 February, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Balance of Trade

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the balance of trade and measures to reduce the manufacturing deficit.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the three months to January there was a deficit in manufactures of £3·1 billion compared with a deficit of £4·3 billion in the previous three months; this is clear evidence that the trade balance is now responding to the tightening of policy.

Productivity

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the growth of productivity in the economy as a whole since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Whole economy productivity has grown by over 20 per cent. since 1979.

Personal Equity Plans

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total value of funds in personal equity plans on 5 April 1989.

Mr. Lilley: The total value of funds in plans at 31 December 1988 is estimated at £670 million. Information is not available for 5 April 1989.

Banks (Tax Allowances)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his reply of 7 March, Official Report, column 652, what is the latest year for which the Inland Revenue has collected information on the amounts allowable against tax by the banks; and what was the amount for that year.

Mr. Lilley: Discussions between the banks and the Inland Revenue about provisions against Third-world debts allowable for tax for 1987-88 and later years are still going on. Amounts allowed against tax for earlier years were not significant. Estimates of the reduction in mainstream corporation tax receipts for provisions on doubtful sovereign debts are negligible for the years to 1984-85 inclusive, under £50 million, for each of 1985-86 and 1986-87, about £¼ billion for 1987-88, over £½ billion for 1988-89 and about £¼ billion for 1989-90.

Debt Write-offs

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of revenue lost in respect of write-offs for bad debts incurred in the last year for which figures are available by the main banks in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: Information about write-offs and provisions for bad debts other than sovereign debt where recovery is doubtful is not collected centrally and cannot be provided except at disproportionate expense.

European Bank for Reconstruction and Development

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to conclude discussions on establishing the European Community's bank for reconstruction and development.

Mr. Ryder: Discussions on establishing the European bank for reconstruction and development are making good progress. I hope that articles of agreement will be finalised very soon.

Personal Debt

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the effect of a 1 per cent. increase in interest rates on the total level of United Kingdom personal debt and the average level of debt for each family.

Mr. Norman Lamont: An increase in interest rates encourages saving and discourages borrowing and therefore, over time, leads to a reduction in the rate of growth of personal debt.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Fatchett: to ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what safeguards he is proposing to put in place to ensure that the provisions of section 105(5) of the Education Reform Act requiring capital repayments on discontinuance or change of character of a CTC or CCTA will continue to have effect after termination of the agreement with the Secretary of State and subsequent continuation on a fee-paying basis of the school in the same buildings, and so on.

Mrs. Rumbold: Paragraphs 54 to 59 of the model funding agreement between my right hon. Friend and a city technology college/city college for the technology of the arts provide that, in the event that my right hon. Friend shall give notice of the termination of this agreement in circumstances which include the CTC/CCTA seeking to charge for admission,

"He shall also give notice that the provisions of section 105(5) shall apply, and set out how the CTC/CCTA is to comply with them".

Under this provision, my right hon. Friend will set out a method and timetable, which the CTC/CCTA company would be required to follow to fulfill the provisions of section 105(5) following the termination of the agreement. No further safeguard is necessary in this respect.

Assisted Places

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the level of parental contributions to the fees of pupils in the assisted places scheme in 1990-91.

Mr. MacGregor: Subject to parliamentary approval, the parental contribution scales will be adjusted upwards for the school year 1990-91 as set out in the table. Total parental contributions for families with four or more assisted pupils will be limited to the amounts payable at any given level of income by parents supporting three assisted pupils.

TRANSPORT

Severn Bridge

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if non-United Kingdom consortiums will be allowed to bid for the new Severn bridge infrastructure project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Applications from consortia wishing to bid for the second Servern bridge project were invited in December 1988. There was no restriction on the nationality of bidders.

Blind People

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce provisions whereby blind people travelling within the EEC by any form of transport will be allowed a travelling companion to accompany them free of charge.

Mr. Portillo: Such provisions already exist for rail travel and, in some cases, for ferries in countries within the European Community. Concessionary schemes on other forms of public transport, where they exist, are of national or local application only.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what provisions exist in the EEC enabling blind people travelling by rail across internal EEC national boundaries to be accompanied by a sighted companion free of charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Reciprocal rail travel concessions for blind people are available between member states of the European Community. These allow a companion to travel free of charge with a blind person who has purchased a ticket (subject to some restrictions on the type of ticket).

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now introduce legislation to make it mandatory for local authorities to provide a uniform concessionary free bus scheme for those aged over 60 years in their area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Local authorities are best placed to decide what is appropriate for their area, and they already have powers to provide concessionary fares on local bus services for those of state pensionable age.

We have no plans to interfere with these arrangements.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Storm and Flood Damage

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give consideration to a special scheme for compensation for damage to farmers and horticulturalists arising from the storm and floods in February.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government do not normally compensate for losses which are insurable or which are the result of weather abnormalities.

Health and Social Services Boards (Appointments)

The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to advise health and social services boards that intrusive or inquisitive questions irrelevant to the requirements of the post should not be put to candidates in interviews.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: We should be grateful for information of any specific complaint.

Rev. Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what guidance he has issued to health and social services boards regarding the information which they require from applicants for medical staff appointments and research fellowships; what guidance his Department issues as to whether health and social services boards should require from applicants information on the primary school attended;

(2) what information he has as to the inclusion by health and social services boards of questions as to the primary school which a person may have attended in application procedures for medical staff appointments and research fellowships.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: None. As a result of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989, health and social services boards in Northern Ireland are required to monitor the religious composition of all those who apply to fill vacancies for employment.

Monitoring must be carried out in accordance with regulations made under the Act and guidance on the provisions is contained in the code of practice issued by the Department of Economic Development and which came into operation on 31 December 1989. Copies of the code have been made available to each health and social services board.

Cattle

Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the figures recently supplied to him by the Ulster Farmers Union on the financial position in relation to the finishing of beef cattle in Northern Ireland during last winter and the present winter.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The figures supplied by the Ulster Farmers Union were extracted from "Farm Business Data 1989" which was published by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland in May 1989.

The figures require adjustment in the light of actual price levels and prevailing market conditions during the autumn and winter. When adjusted in this manner and interest charges excluded, the figures show an overall positive gross margin for autumn-purchased stores last winter and a break-even this winter when account is taken of beef special premium payments.

Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he intends to take to improve the financial returns to the finishers of beef cattle in Northern Ireland in respect of cattle finishers during the present winter season.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The Government are seeking a substantial devaluation of the United Kingdom green pound in the context of this year's price-fixing round. We have sought to optimise beef intervention in Northern Ireland in recent months.

Substantial tonnages of beef have been taken off the market recently. This should help to raise producer prices.

HEALTH

Nurses

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many trainees entered the nursing profession in 1989; how many nurses are at present employed by the National Health Service; and what is the estimated number of nurses necessary to staff the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: 20,877 people entered pre-registration nurse training in England during the year ended 31 March 1989. At 30 September 1988, the latest date for which this information is available, there were 241,800 (whole-time equivalent) qualified nurses and midwives employed in the National Health Service in England. The planning and setting of staffing levels is a matter for individual health authorities. Decisions on appropriate levels of staff must be based on local needs and priorities.

NHS Employees (Private Practice)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to issue guidelines to National Health Service employees with private practice interests in potential competition with their work in income-generating departments in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As I stated in reply to the hon. Member on 5 February, at column 489, we are currently considering whether further guidance is needed in this field.

Inspection Units

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is being made for independent inspection units as proposed in the White Paper "Caring for People".

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give details of progress in implementation of his plans for independent inspection units proposed in the White Paper "Caring for People".

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) on 24 January at column 714.

Psychotherapy

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) individual patients and (b) families are on waiting lists for admission for in-patient psychotherapy treatment (i) in the North West Thames region and (ii) nationally.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about the numbers of patients awaiting specific types of treatment is not collected centrally.

Cassel Hospital, Richmond

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received any proposal for the Cassel hospital, Richmond, to become a self-governing hospital trust.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No.

Nurses (Grading)

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will introduce a standard set of guidelines in relation to the clinical grading structure for nurses;

(2) if he will issue a standard set of guidelines agreed by both management and unions on the clinical grading structure for nurses; and if he will include a provision that Macmillan nursing sisters be on grade H.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The grading definitions in the clinical structure introduced in 1988, and any joint guidance relating to them, are a matter for the Nursing and Midwifery Staffs Negotiating Council. Following prolonged discussions, it was not possible to reach agreement on such guidance between the staff and management sides of the council. It is for health authorities to decide how particular posts should be graded, including those occupied by Macmillan nursing sisters, in the light of the grading definitions agreed by the council, the management guidance which has been issued, and the specifications of the particular post.

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will take steps to establish a timetable for negotiations for those still appealing at district or regional level to deal with the cases of nurses throughout the country who are still awaiting appeals into their grading;

(2) if he will take steps to speed up the grading appeals process into the new clinical grading structure for nurses.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The procedures for handling NHS appeals are a matter for the General Whitley Council, not Ministers. Health authorities are making efforts to operate the appeals process as quickley as possible.

NHS Staff

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the current staff vacancy levels and staff turnover rates for the pathology MLSO grades in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We do not hold this information centrally. At 30 September 1988, the latest date for which data are available, there were 15,180 (whole-time equivalent) medical laboratory scientific officers (including unqualified grades) in post in the NHS in England.

Income Generation Unit

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the aims of the income generation unit, together with the costs of its operation and details of its staffing levels.

Mr. Freeman: The unit's aims are to develop policy on income generation; provide a central source of advice on this for health authorities and the private sector; assist health authorities to develop and implement income generation projects; monitor their achievements; and disseminate information and good practice.

The income generation unit's running costs in 1989-90 will be approximately £152,200. This is calculated using the average salaries, plus on-costs for accommodation, office services, travel etc. for each staff grade in the unit. In addition, almost £35,000 will be paid for outside consultancy work resulting in operational costs for the unit of approximately £187,200 in 1989-90.

Current staffing levels for the income generation unit are 0·5 grade 5, 2 grade 7s, 1 higher executive officer, 1 executive officer and 0·5 administrative officer.

NHS Reform

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many, and what representations he has received from general practitioners in south Yorkshire about the proposed changes in the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a number of representations from a wide variety of sources. Many ask questions, and many are in favour of some or all of our proposals. Others comment only on specific elements. However, it is not possible to distinguish them in the way the hon. Member requests.

Waiting Lists (Trent)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest waiting list figures within the Trent regional health authority for persons (a) waiting more than one month for an urgent operation, (b) waiting more than one year for non-urgent operations and (c) awaiting out-patient consultations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Following the implementation of the recommendations of the steering group on Health Service information (the Korner committee), starting in April 1987, no distinction is now made between urgent and non-urgent cases since the committee regarded such distinction as unreliable. On 31 March 1989, there were 54,870 patients on surgical specialty waiting lists in the Trent regional health authority of whom 20 per cent. had been waiting more than one year. No information is held centrally on numbers awaiting out-patient appointments.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest figure for hospital waiting lists in the Trent regional health authority; and what it was for each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table.

In-patient waiting lists at 31 March—Trent Regional Health Authority

Residential Homes

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to how many local authorities are closing down part III accommodation for the elderly and transferring residents to private homes and as to the number of such local authority homes closed in the last five years.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not collected centrally.

Pay Beds (Trent)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of private patients using pay beds in the Trent regional health authority; and what was the corresponding figure for each year since 1980.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table.

Care in the Community

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that local authorities are delivering care in their communities; and what further measures he is taking to improve co-ordination between all the various agencies involved.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The White Paper "Caring for People", the proposals of which are currently before the House in the NHS and Community Care Bill, made it clear that local authorities will have to draw up and publish plans for community care services. Those plans will have to be open to inspection by the social services inspectorate. Directions and guidance concerning personal social services will be issued to local authorities to help ensure the proper delivery of community care.

In drawing up their plans for community care, local authorities will be required to consult health authorities and other interested agencies. In the case of services for mentally ill people co-ordination between the local authority and the health authority will be encouraged by the payment of a specific grant for the social care of such people. This grant will be payable through regional health authorities as the agents for the Secretary of State for Health on the basis of plans for the development of social care agreed between social services authorities and the matching district health authorities.

Cardiothoracic Surgery

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by district and regional health authority the location of each regional specialist unit carrying out cardiothoracic surgery; what was the number of patients treated in 1987-88 and 1988-89 in each; and what was the total annual expenditure incurred by each of these units in dealing with their annual patient load for each year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 6 March 1990]: The number of cases treated by specialists in cardiothoracic surgery for the years requested are shown as follows by district health authority. The hospitals named in the second column are those where a specialist cardiothoracic unit is located. Activity in a district may not be confined to the specialist unit.

Information on expenditure by individual specialities within hospitals is not collected centrally.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements will be made for inner-city funded posts under the new local government finance arrangement (a) for posts within the first three years' funding and (b) for posts for which funding will end during the next financial year.

Mr. David Hunt: The new local government finance arrangements will have no effect either on posts currently funded by urban programme revenue grant or on the freedom of local authorities to choose to continue funding those posts when grant aid expires.

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the increase in the commercial rate for Bournemouth between 1979 and 1989 in real terms.

Mr. Chope: The increase in the commercial rate for Bournemouth between 1979 and 1989, in real terms, was 9·4 per cent.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to bring forward legislation to ensure that private landlords reduce rate-inclusive rents by an appropriate amount with the introduction of the poll tax on 1 April.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) on 8 February (Offical Report, Vol. 166 column 756).

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the amount that private landlords will gain when tenants pay rate-inclusive rents with the introduction of the poll tax on 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I have made no such estimate. Most tenants paying rates-inclusive rents can ensure that they do not continue to pay the rates element after 1 April.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the position of YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements and their liability for the poll tax.

Mr. David Hunt: The position of YTS trainees with special needs endorsements is similar to that of other YTS trainees. They receive the same allowances and may in addition be paid wages by the employer with whom they are placed. Virtually all non-employed trainees, and a proportion of employed trainees, would be entitled to community charge benefit where their income is low.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reproduce in the Official Report the mathematical calculation of the assumed personal community charge of £227·69 per head in Tonbridge and Malling for the purpose of the transitional relief scheme.

Mr. David Hunt: The assumed personal community charge of £227·69 in Tonbridge and Malling for the purpose of the transitional relief scheme was calculated in accordance with the formula in paragraph 2.2 of the Community Charge Transitional Relief Report (England). The relevant figures are:

	A	Assumed spending including assumed county precept less business rate income and revenue support grant (before adjustments)	17,437,972
Less	B	Safety net adjustment	−74,871
Less	C	Low rateable value area grant	0
Less	D	Inner London education grant	0
Equals		Assumed revenue to raise	17,512,843
Divided by		Relevant population	76,916
Equals		Assumed charge	227·69

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state for each charging authority in Kent the percentage amount by which its assumed personal community charge for the purpose of the transitional relief scheme is less than the average assumed community charge of £278 per head.

Mr. David Hunt: The table shows the percentage amount by which the assumed personal community charge for each charging authority in Kent for the purpose of the transitional relief scheme is less than the community charge for standard spending of £278:

	Amount by which assumed personal community charge is less than CCSS Per cent.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each London borough (a) the amount levied per head of its adult population for the precept of the Metropolitan police; (b) the relevant borough community charge; and (b) as a percentage of (a).

Mr. Chope [holding answer 14 March 1990]: This information is not available.

Housing Associations

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has on the proportions of housing association schemes which are represented by (a) rehabilitation work and (b) purchases of new-build schemes from builders; and whether there has been any change in each proportion over the past two years;

(2) what is the percentage reduction in rehabilitation work undertaken by the Housing Corporation in 1989-90 in the south-west.

Mr. Chope: Relevant information available to the Secretary of State is set out in the table. It shows housing association rehabilitation work as a proportion of the Housing Corporation's programme of new approvals nationally and in its west region.

No comparable information is currently available on the number of new-build schemes purchased by housing associations direct from builders. However, this was not a normal procurement method for associations in years before 1989-90.

The figures relate to Housing Corporation-supported housing association activity only. Housing associations also receive support from local authorities but comparable figures for that sector are not available.

Planning Applications

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether a planning application which concerns land falling within more than one local planning authority's area constitutes one of more than local importance.

Mr. Moynihan: Not necessarily. In any event, a development proposal falling in the area of more than one local planning authority would require more than one planning application.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether a planning application which gives rise to objections on the ground that an European Community directive or international treaty is likely to be breached constitutes one which raises issues of greater than local importance in the context of criteria for call-in of planning applications under section 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971;

(2) whether a planning application which gives rise to objections on the ground that an European Community directive or international treaty might be breached constitutes one where the interests of foreign Governments are involved.

Mr. Moynihan: Whether to call in a planning application for the Secretary of State's decision is a matter of judgment to be exercised in each case against the criteria to which the hon. Lady refers.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether a planning application which threatens irreversible damage to all or part of a site of special scientific interest constitutes one which might conflict with national policy on important matters;

(2) whether a planning application which threatens irreversible damage to all or part of a site of special scientific interest constitutes one which raises issues of greater than local importance in the context of criteria for call-in of planning applications under section 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971.

Mr. Moynihan: Such a threat might conflict with national policy on an important matter, and would be a material consideration in deciding whether to call in a planning application. The scale of the proposal and the extent of its effect on the site would also be relevant considerations.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether national planning policies relating to the determination of planning applications affecting sites of special scientific interest apply within the geographical area known as the Serplan East Thames Corridor Initiative.

Mr. Moynihan: Yes.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it remains his policy that it would not, in general, be acceptable for one area of a site of special scientific interest to be traded off in exchange for the protection of the rest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Planning authorities are advised to consider each case on its merits in accordance with the guidance in departmental circulars and policy guidance notes.

Safety Net Grant (Tameside)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review Tameside safety net grant for the community charge and the effect of the housing revenue account contributions being used twice.

Mr. Chope: Before making the Revenue Support Grant Report (England) 1990-91 and the other reports associated with the 1990-91 settlement, which were approved by the House on 18 January, my right hon. Friend considered all the representations he had received including those on Tameside's safety net grant and the effect of the housing revenue account contributions. He is satisfied that his decisions on the 1990-91 settlement are fair and reasonable.

Association of County Councils

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Association of County Councils; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the Association of County Councils on 26 February. The Association of District Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities were also present. They discussed environmental matters.

Departmental Houses (Greater Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses are in the ownership of his Department in each district in Greater Manchester; and what percentage of these are empty.

Mr. Chope: The Department of the Environment does not own any houses in the Manchester area. There are, however, three flats held for the Lord Chancellor's Department, of which one, a caretaker's flat in Manchester Crown court, is vacant. Due to improvements in the Crown court security system there is no longer a need for a caretaker, but as the flat has no separate access it is not possible to offer it on the open market.

Stairlifts

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the advice issued by his Department to destrict councils on the awarding of grants under the procedure introdure by the Local Government and Housing Act for the processing of applications for the county council to fit stairlifts.

Mr. Chope: We are considering the final form of our advice to local housing authorities on stairlifts in the light of reponses from organisations consulted on the draft circular, "House Adaptations for Disabled People". We shall issue this before the new disabled facilities grant arrangements come into operation on 1 July.

Local Income Tax

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the administrative cost of introducing a system of local income tax in place of the community charge.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no estimate of what the cost would be of introducing a local income tax. However, I believe that the cost of collecting such a tax would be up to twice the cost of collecting the community charge.

Bereavement

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidelines his Department issues to local authorities in providing support for widowers of working age with young families in the immediate bereavement period and later.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 5 March 1990]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security on 5 March [Official Report, column 533].

Irish Sea

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans Her Majesty's Government have to ban raw sewage outflow and sewage sludge from being dumped into the Irish sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The announcement my right hon. Friend made on 5 March, set out in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) (Official Report, Volume 168, column 452) on the elimination of all significant discharges of untreated sewage and the termination of sewage sludge dumping by the end of 1998, applies to all UK coastal waters including the Irish sea.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sunday Trading

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on Sunday trading in the past six months.

Mr. Mellor: In the past six months, 111 written representations have been received. Of these, 65 have been broadly in favour and 46 against.

Birmingham Six

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on his consideration of the new material submitted to him on the Birmingham Six.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. and learned Friend is still considering very carefully the further material presented to him by a solicitor on behalf of the six men, and will decide as soon as possible whether it justifies any intervention on his part.

Neighbourhood Watch

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now operate in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: At the end of December 1989 there were estimated to be over 81,000 neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales, covering more than 4 million households.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the practice of obtaining psychiatric reports on prisoners held on remand.

Mr. Mellor: A court requiring medical advice on a defendant's mental condition may remand that person to prison for a report. The Government encourage the use of other means of obtaining such reports including bail or remand to hospital where custody is not necessary in the public interest.

"Victim's Charter"

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what expenditure he has incurred in the production and distribution of the official pamphlet "Victim's Charter".

Mr. John Patten: The cost of the design, printing and distribution of the charter were £26,284.

Real Estate

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what information he has about the ownership of real estate and other assets in the United Kingdom by members of the former communist Administrations in (a) East Germany, (b) Romania, (c) Bulgaria and (d) Czechoslovakia;

(2) what information he has about the ownership of real estate and other assets in the United Kingdom by members of the present communist Administrations in (a) Angola, (b) Cuba and (c) China.

Mr. Waddington: Such information is not held by my Department.

Sunset Radio

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Sunset Radio and the future of ethnic minority broadcasting in Manchester.

Mr. Mellor: Sunset Radio was the first of the IBA's "incremental" radio contractors to begin broadcasting. It opened on 22 October 1989, six months after being awarded the contract. It broadcasts on 102·0 MHz (VHF/FM) for 24 hours a day, serving a number of ethnic minority communities within the Manchester area. I understand that some internal reorganisation has taken place recently; this is a matter for the station itself, under overall IBA supervision.

The Broadcasting Bill, which was introduced to Parliament in December 1989, paves the way for further expansion of independent radio. The new Radio Authority will be able to offer licences for many more local stations catering for a range of listeners' tastes and interests, including services for ethnic minorities. The location of the services will depend on demand and the availability of suitable frequencies.

Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of prisoners in each prison in England and Wales who were employed in prison workshops or kitchens on 5 March.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not collected in precisely the form requested. The average daily number of inmates employed in prison workshops and kitchens during the week ending 27 January, the most recent period for which complete information is available, was as follows:

Hepatitis B

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the percentage of prison officers and other prison staff who have been vaccinated against hepatitis B.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 9 March 1990]: No central record detailing this information is maintained. The prison service's present policy is to make available hepatitis B preventive vaccination on request to all staff who routinely come into contact with prisoners.

ENERGY

North Sea Investment

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the level of capital investment in the North sea in 1989; and what are the prospects for 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: Capital investment in the production of the United Kingdom's oil and gas in 1989 was £2·6 billion (provisional), an increase of well over 20 per cent. on the level achieved in 1988. The industry has indicated that capital investment in 1990 could reach a massive £3·7 billion.

Nuclear Industry (Subsidies)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the total value, in the latest available year, of national subsidies paid to the nuclear industry in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Federal Republic of Germany and (c) France.

Mr. Baldry: The Government have paid no subsidies to the electricity industry in the United Kingdom in respect of nuclear generation, nor have they paid any subsidies to British Nuclear Fuels. I have no information on Government subsidies to the nuclear industries in the other countries mentioned.

Sudbury House and Bankside Power Station

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, what is the estimated value of Sudbury house and Bankside power station.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimated value of these sites is commercially confidential.

Nuclear Electric (Trading)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what scale of guarantees are needed to prevent Nuclear Electric from trading while insolvent.

Mr. Wakeham: On 6 March I laid before the House a minute which set out my intention to provide a letter of assurance to Nuclear Electric plc.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) explained in an answer to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 26 February (Official Report, Column 91), work is currently in hand on the financial structure of the company. Decisions on the extent of any support in addition to the letter of assurance cannot yet be taken. They depend on the outcome of the company's review of accounting policies and its financial performance in 1989-90.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department was consulted about the allocation of (a) Sudbury house and (b) Bankside power station to Nuclear Electric plc.

Mr. Wakeham: I took the decision that Sudbury house and Bankside power station should be allocated to Nuclear Electric.

WALES

Cancer

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth of 13 March on information on cancer in Wales, for what reason no figures for the incidence in Wales of (a) leukaemia, (b) lung cancer, (c) colon cancer and (d) stomach cancer are available for any year since 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 15 March.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Overseas Projects (Environmental Impact)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice is available to United Kingdom industry on the need to consider the environmental impact of overseas projects and investments.

Mr. Forth: The Department provides a full range of overseas market advice to companies as part of the export initiative. More detailed advice on environmental controls and requirements in other countries is available from the environmental inquiry point at Warren Spring laboratory, established under the DTI's environmental programme as a free source of information on environmental concerns in strategic planning. The Overseas Development Administration has published a manual of environmental appraisal, which is available to companies on request.

Electrical Equipment

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to secure the safety of electrical equipment made in Europe which does not conform to British safety standards.

Mr. Forth: The safety of most electrical equipment traded throughout the European Community is judged on its compliance with the low voltage directive, implemented in the United Kingdom through the Low Voltage Electrical Equipment (Safety) Regulations 1989. Conformity may be established in a number of ways, primarily through harmonised European standards or, in their absence, by compliance with national safety standards. However, neither method is mandatory. The fundamental requirement is for the product to be safe.

Barlow Clowes

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many investors on Barlow Clowes have benefited from the scheme he announced on 19 December.

Mr. Redwood: By 28 February, 13,724 cheques had been dispatched by my agents, totalling £145 million. A further 260 claims were being processed and a further 210 investors appear to have been unable to meet the deadline for claims for understandable reasons, such as absence overseas, and their cases will be considered if there is good reason. Of the remaining 66 cases, some would not appear to qualify because they have already assigned their rights in return for payments from others, while others are being investigated further to establish whether they benefited directly or indirectly from the circumstances leading up to the liquidation.

My agents have received assignments of rights from all the investors who are being paid out. My Department will now obtain necessary information from these investors and will be considering all the claims that may be pursued in order to secure the maximum net recovery for the taxpayer.

EC Industry Ministers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what subjects he raised at the last Council of Industry Ministers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 15 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) on Wednesday 14 March at columns 476-77.

Advisers

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all those organisations who have received fees for advice given to his Department since April 1985, giving in each case the period over which they were retained and the matters on which they advised.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 13 March 1990]: My Department uses widely the services of many organisations to give advice on a broad range of issues. The length of period during which the advice is sought and given varies according to the subject.

The information sought by the hon. Member can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

If the hon. Member would care to write clarifying the information he seeks, I shall consider his request.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Tax

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the number of (a) working heads and (b) dependants facing marginal tax and benefit withdrawal rates in excess of 40 per cent. in the manner of his answer to the late hon. Member for Kensington on 25 March 1988, Official Report, column 244.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available information is set out in the table. The table shows the number of tax units where the head faces a combined withdrawal rate above 50 per cent., and the total number of individuals, including spouses and children, in their families.

(ii) Estimates based on 1985 and 1986 FES data uprated to 1989-90 levels.
(iii) * denotes an estimate of fewer than 2,500.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people face marginal tax rates, both including and excluding social security of (a) over 40 per cent., (b) over 50 per cent., (c) over 60 per cent., (d) over 70 per cent., (e) over 80 per cent., (f) over 90 per cent. and (g) over 100 per cent.; (i) now and (ii) in each year since 1978-79.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Available estimates are set out in the table. The first table shows the number of tax units facing combined marginal tax/benefit withdrawal rates in the requested ranges, in 1985 and as currently projected for 1989-90. These are the only years for which estimates on a comparable basis are available. The second table shows the number of tax units facing marginal rates of income tax in the requested ranges. Estimates are provided for 1985-86 and 1989-90, to be comparable with those provided incorporating social security withdrawal rates, and also for 1978-79.

Benefit Rights (Publicity)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has proposals to help make people who are eligible to apply for benefits aware of their rights to claim benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government's policy on take-up of benefits is set out in the White Paper on the Government's expenditure plans 1990-91 to 1992-93, chapter 14, paragraph 27, which is in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward plans to raise the capital limit for the community charge benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We continue to keep under review the capital limits for all income-related benefits.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a table for the following household types: (a) single pensioner, (b) other single adult, (c) two adults, (d) three or more adults and (e) all households listing (i) the number receiving rate bills, (ii) the total value of their gross rate bills, (iii) the numbers entitled to rebates and (iv) the total value of rebates in 1987-88 and 1988-89 in Scotland.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available in the form or detail requested. The latest available information is in the table.

Numbers receiving rate rebates (000s)	785	688
Rate rebate expenditure (£ million)	212	170

Sources: Scottish Office statistics. Housing benefit expenditure and caseload return from local authorities.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of giving the community charge relief at 20 per cent. of full charge to those adults of working age who currently remain at home caring for immediate relatives who are in receipt of attendance allowance.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is not available.

Social Fund

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current refusal rate for social fund applications in each social security office; and what was it in March 1989.

Mr. Scott: Information regarding the numbers of social fund applications processed and awards made is placed in the Library for each month since the start of the scheme. The information sought can be derived from that source.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have had their mobility allowance withdrawn in each of the last 10 years on the grounds that they were no longer deemed to be able to benefit from enhanced facilities for locomotion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Very few recipients have their mobility allowance withdrawn on the grounds that they will no longer, from time to time, be able to benefit from enhanced facilities for locomotion. I regret that records of the number of cases are not kept.

Income Support

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons in Barnsley, East, who are in receipt of income support, receive the single parents' supplement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In February 1990, there were 1,690.

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which include a number where benefit payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons in south Yorkshire, who are in receipt of income support, receive the single parents' supplement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In February 1990, there were 19,894.

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action, which include a number where benefit payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he proposes to appoint a new chairman of the occupational pensions board.

Mr. Newton: I have reappointed Mr. Jeremy Rowe CBE as chairman of the board for a further three years from 6 April 1990.

Community Care Grants (Preston)

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many refusals of community care grants at the Preston social security office one of the grounds for refusal has been insufficient funds.

Mr. Scott: On 21 occasions at the Preston South local office and 318 occasions at the Preston North local office, the social fund officer refused applications for community care grants, giving as a reason that they had insufficient priority to be met from the budget. These figures are provisional and cover the period April 1989 to February 1990.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any further proposals concerning occupational pensions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: There has been a wide welcome for the general aims of the provisions in the current Social Security Bill which seek to give members of occupational pension schemes greater protection.

One of the provisions in the current Social Security Bill requires pension increases to be paid when a scheme winds up. I have received representations saying that I should go further and place a similar requirement for pension increases on schemes which continue as well. Others have pointed to the possible consequences for businesses and have said that the current wind-up provisions could in certain cases lead to employers facing additional contingent liabilities for which they had not been able to plan.

I have carefully considered all these representations, and the discussions in Committee, and have concluded that we can strike a better balance. I shall bring forward an amendment for the Report stage of the Bill.

The amendment will make two requirements. First, in future schemes will have to pay annual increases to members for their pension rights which they build up after an appointed day. In respect of their rights, members will be guaranteed increases in line with the retail price index up to 5 per cent. a year. Schemes will of course continue to be free to pay more than this if they wish, as indeed some already do.

Secondly, where schemes have a surplus of assets over liabilities the first call on such a surplus will be to pay increases to members for pension rights which they have built up before the appointed day (including pensions now in payment). The target rate of increase will be the rise in the RPI up to 5 per cent. a year, but the rate to be guaranteed by each scheme will depend on the amount of its surplus. Employers will not be able to take a contribution holiday or refund until increases are guaranteed at the target rate.

The position when a scheme winds up will follow the general requirements for pension increases. In the event of a scheme winding up employers will have to ensure that members receive increases at the prices—5 per cent. rate for pension rights they have built up after the appointed day. For pension rights based on service before then, increases will depend on (a) the extent of increases already guaranteed as a result of the new requirements and (b) any additional surplus emerging when the scheme winds up.

We shall consult the industry about implementation, but I intend that these proposals should take effect no later than the end of 1991.

Together with the Bill's other proposals to establish a pensions ombudsman, to improve help and advice for scheme members and control the extent of self-investment, I believe that these revised proposals to strengthen the pension increase rights of scheme members constitute a significant further step forward in the development of occupational pensions.

Administration Costs

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of staff administering the social security programme per 100,000 claimants for each year from 1978-79 to 1989-90 consistent with the information given in table 14.28 of the current public expenditure White Paper.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The total number of staff administering the social security programme per 100,000 receiving benefits for the years 1979-80 to 1988-89 is in the table.

Figures for 1978-79 are not available for work on social security administration as a separate item.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vietnam

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made and what information he possesses concerning changes in the levels of employment and of remuneration following recent changes in economic organisation in Vietnam; and what assessment he has made of their consequential effects on illegal movements to Hong Kong.

Mr. Maude: There are no reliable statistics on current levels of employment and wages in Vietnam. One of the short-term effects of economic reform in Vietnam is likely to be higher unemployment and cuts in real wages. Any changes in the Vietnamese economy will take time to affect clandestine movements of people to Hong Kong. In the longer term, sustained economic improvement, already evident in small businesses, services and rural areas, should begin to deter would-be emigrants.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the level of contributions from the United Kingdom and other countries to the United Nations fund for drug abuse control.

Mr. Maude: Since 1982 the United Kingdom has contributed or pledged a total of £11·05 million to the United Nations fund for drug abuse control. This includes an annual contribution to UNFDAC's general purpose fund and contributions (or pledges) to a range of individual country projects. The United Kingdom is the fifth largest donor after Italy, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and Sweden.

Hong Kong

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current position he has arranged with other countries issuing passports to Hong Kong residents.

Mr. Maude: We have for some months been encouraging our friends and partners to follow our lead in providing assurances to Hong Kong people to give them the confidence to remain in the territory. A few countries are already taking action of this kind; the other countries that we have approached have undertaken to consider our proposal.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what negotiations he has had with the Chinese authorities to ensure that they honour passports issued before 1997 to Hong Kong residents when that country takes over the colony.

Mr. Maude: We have had a number of discussions with the Chinese authorities on nationality questions. We have made it clear to the Chinese authorities that the granting of British citizenship to certain Hong Kong residents falls entirely within the competence of the British Government, and is consistent with the provisions of the 1984 joint declaration.

Israel

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Israeli Government, over the use of tear gas and rubber bullets by their security forces to disperse Palestinian women, who staged anti-occupation marches on the West Bank and in Arab East Jerusalem to coincide with International Women's Day.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly remind the Israelis of our concern about their excessive use of force in suppressing manifestations of the intifada in the occupied territories.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had, or intends to have, with the Israeli Government on its policy on the establishment of further Jewish settlements in the occupied territories.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Israeli Government are well aware of our view, expressed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in her speech to the Board of Deputies of British Jews on 18 February, that the Jewish settlements in the occupied territories, including east Jerusalem, are illegal.

Iraq

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department had with Nizar Hamdoun of the Iraqi Foreign Ministry, during his visit to the United Kingdom attending the conference at Chatham house on Iraq in the 1990s, in respect of the detention and trial for spying of The Observer journalist Farzad Bazoft and British nurse Daphne Parish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I raised the case of Mrs. Parish and Mr. Bazoft when I met Nizar Hamdoun on 8 March. I expressed our serious concern for the two and emphasised the importance of a fair trial. Mr. Hamdoun took note of these points and emphasised the sensitivity of these cases for the Iraqi authorities. Similar representations were made to Mr. Hamdoun at a senior official level.

East Germany

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the establishment of property rights and a coherent law of contract in East Germany.

Mr. Waldegrave: Revising property and contract law seems likely to be one of the priorities of a new GDR Government after elections on 18 March. It is also to be expected that these questions will be covered in discussions between the two German states on a currency union.

Human Rights (Women)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on those countries where women do not have the vote; and to which of those countries he has made representations on their observance of human rights for women.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are, of course, many countries where neither men nor women have the vote. Women are also under a variety of specific electoral disabilities in a number of different parts of the world. We do not have a complete list of these. Our support for universal suffrage and equal treatment for women is clear from our ratification of the relevant international instruments, particularly the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, and the international covenant on civil and political rights.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made representations to the Kuwait Government on their observance of human rights for women.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. As already stated, our position on female suffrage is clear from our ratification of both the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women and the international covenant on civil and political rights.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Investment Bank

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guarantee obligations the Government have in respect of exchange losses on loans given by the European investment bank.

Mr. Ryder: The Government have guarantee obligations against exchange losses on outstanding foreign currency loans from the European investment bank under the official exchange cover scheme and the exchange risk cover scheme for the private sector. However, there has been virtually no borrowing under the official exchange cover scheme since changes in the scheme were announced at the end of 1987, and the scheme for the private sector was closed in 1985.

Income Tax

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women pay tax on schedule E; and what are their average earnings.

Mr. Lilley: In 1989-90 there are about 7½ million women with earnings taxed under schedule E and their average earnings are approximately £7,750. These estimates include taxpayers with earnings from full-time or part-time work.

The estimates are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Retail Prices Index

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the current retail prices index for the United Kingdom calculated on the same basis as the similar indices are in (a) France and (b) Germany.

Mr. Lilley: It is not practicable to perform such calculations taking account of the many differences between these countries in methods and concepts used in constructing consumer price indices.

Taxation and Expenditure

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report, for the years (a) 1978-79, (b) 1987-88 and (c) 1988-89: (i) the total national tax revenue raised and (ii) the central Government public expenditure spent, in each region of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: (i) Estimates of the total national tax revenue are not made on a regional basis. However, figures giving a partial coverage are available and include estimates of the income tax liability of residents in the regions. Figures for 1978-79 have been published by the CSO in "Regional Trends" No. 16 and for the latest figures, which are for the year 1987-88, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 12 February (Official Report, column 18).

(ii) Apart from expenditure which is the responsibility of territorial Departments, all Government expenditure is both planned and controlled on a national basis. Information on expenditure broken down by standard regions within England is thus not available on a consistent basis. Published figures giving a partial coverage are published by the CSO in "Regional Trends". They include estimates of social security cash benefits, current expenditure by regional health authorities and regional preferential assistance to industry.

Taxation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to allow United Kingdom shipping companies whose employees work on vessels registered in the United Kingdom to be exempt from paying income tax and national insurance contributions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I cannot anticipate the Budget statement.

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the earnings of a married man in the present fiscal year, assuming a mortgage of £30,000 and a mortgage interest rate of 14 per cent., would be paid in income tax and national insurance payments if his earnings were (a) £15,000, (b) £20,000, (c) £25,000, (d) £50,000, (e) £100,000 and (f) £250,000.

Mr. Major: The information is in the table:

Percentage of earnings paid in income tax and national insurance contributions[1] by married man[2] at 1989-90 levels of income

Earnings £ per annum	per cent.
15,000	16·1
20,000	20·6
25,000	21·9
50,000	29·7
100,000	34·8
250,000	37·9

[1] Based on the post-October 1989 rates.

[2] Calculations assume that the married man has no other forms of income and that he does not receive any tax allowances or reliefs other than mortgage interest relief of £4,200 per annum—the interest paid on his £30,000 mortgage at a rate of 14 per cent.—and the married man's allowance.

European Community Budget

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the total budget of the EC, in the latest available year, was made up from the contributions of (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Federal Republic of Germany and (c) France.

Mr. Major: The information in the table relates to the 1990 European Community budget, which totals 43,815 mecu:

	United Kingdom		Federal Republic of Germany		France
	mecu	per cent.	mecu	per cent.	mecu	per cent.
Gross contribution before taking account of United Kingdom abatement	9,005	20·6	10,899	24·9	8,072	18·4
Gross contribution after taking account of United Kingdom abatement	6,575	15·0	11,383	26·0	8,722	19·9

Girobank

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East of 26 February, Official Report, columns 12-13, if he will arrange for an examination of the operation of the Girobank keyway account.

Mr. Ryder: No. I see no reason to do so.

Mortgages

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on the retail prices index of raising the ceiling on relief on mortgage interest to (a) £35,000, (b) £40,000 and (c) £45,000; and what would be the effect on the retail prices index of restricting relief in each of these cases, and in circumstances where the present ceiling is unchanged, to the standard rate of income tax.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Using the current calculations, as for the latest retail prices index, the approximate effect of raising the maximum level of mortgage to which tax relief on interest payments applies would be as follows:

Ceiling	Approximate effect on "all items" RPI at January 1990
£	per cent.
35,000	−0·1
40,000	−0·2
45,000	−0·3

For the purpose of the RPI all tax relief is assumed to be at the standard rate of tax.

DEFENCE

SSBN 007

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place the order for SSBN 007.

Mr. Neubert: We expect to place the order for the third Vanguard class submarine later this year.

Coolant Water Discharges

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what level of radioactivity, and which radio-nuclides, are released into the Clyde by the Royal Navy, which are the result of nuclear powered submarine coolant water discharges.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Treated liquid containing a small amount of radioactivity is discharged from the Clyde submarine base into Gareloch. The radio-nuclide of principal significance is Cobalt 60. In 1988 the total level of discharge was 0·000029 terabecquerels, which is less than 1 per cent. of the limits agreed with the Scottish Development Department.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what level of radioactivity, and which radio-nuclides, are released into the Irish sea by the United States Navy, which are the result of nuclear powered submarine coolant water discharges;

(2) when the USS Simon Lake (AS33) stopped releasing processed reactor coolant water, from United States nuclear powered submarines, into Holy Loch; and at what depth of ocean it is now the practice to release the processed coolant water;

(3) what volume of processed coolant water from nuclear-powered submarines, on average, is discharged per excursion; and which radio-nuclides, and in what quantities, this coolant contains from the discharges made by the USS "Simon Lake".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Matters concerning the operation of United States Navy nuclear-powered submarines are for the United States Government. Her Majesty's Government remain satisfied that while in United Kingdom waters the United States Navy continues to operate its nuclear-powered warships in accordance with the recommendations of the International Commission of Radiological Protection (ICRP).

Sultan's Forces, Brunei

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any payment is made by the Sultanate of Brunei for the provision by the United Kingdom of troops and training to the Sultan's forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Appropriate payments are made by the Government of Brunei for individuals attending training courses in the United Kingdom and for loan service personnel serving with the Brunei armed forces. In addition, the Government of Brunei meet the full costs of the British Gurkha battalion stationed in Brunei.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will show (a) how many training establishments within the armed services have sought to register trainees as students for poll tax purposes and (b) a full list of all those establishments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally.

THE ARTS

Arts Funding

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is the increase in funding for the arts for the year 1990-91.

Ms. Luce: Funding for the arts will increase in 1990-91 by £45,221,000 to £494,193,000.

"Lizzie"

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on his latest actions in relation to "Lizzie", the fossil found near Bathgate, West Lothian.

Mr. Luce: I have nothing to further to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 6 March, Official Report, column 585.

Tourism

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister for the Arts what contribution the arts makes to tourism in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Luce: The arts play an important part in United Kingdom tourism. The Policy Studies Institute report, "The Economic Importance of the Arts", published in 1988, calculated that some 42 per cent. of arts attendances in London were by tourists while tourism with an arts ingredient was worth in 1986 £3·1 billion or 25 per cent. of total tourist earnings for that year.

The most recent figures published by the British tourist authority relating to the number of visits to tourist attractions in the United Kingdom in 1988 indicate the continuing importance of museums and galleries to United Kingdom tourism. Of the 10 most popular attractions visited, four are museums or galleries.

SCOTLAND

Technology Academies

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what the budget for technology academies in 1989-90 was spent.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 13 March at column 159.

Capital Allocations

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total money allowed to local authorities for capital spending in (a) 1989-90 and (b) 1990-91.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Capital consents issued by the Secretary of State for local authority capital programmes totalled £790 millon in 1989-90. Authorities also have considerable other resources for capital spending. No comparable figure is yet available for 1990-91.

EMPLOYMENT

Northumbria (Tourism)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of overseas visitors visited the Northumbrian tourist area in the last five years; and what steps are being taken to encourage visitors to the north-east.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates of the percentage of overseas visitors who visited Northumbria in the years 1984 to 1988 are as follows:

Overseas visitors to Northumbria tourist board area

	Percentage of overseas visitors
1984	1·9
1985	1·7
1986	2·0
1987	2·1
1988	1·8

Part-time Workers

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assistance the Government is giving to the training of part-time workers.

Mr. Nicholls: The primary responsibility for training the employed, whether they work full or part-time, rests with the employers. The Government's employment training programme offers part-time training opportunities in certain circumstances for a number of groups of unemployed people. These include people with disabilities, returners to the labour market and lone parents.

Tourism

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment why grant aid for tourism development under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 was withdrawn for England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The decision to withdraw funding from the section 4 scheme in England was made because of serious doubts about the scheme's continuing value and effectiveness; and in the light of record levels of capital investment in the tourism industry.

Youth Training, Peterlee and Seaham

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people on Government employment training schemes have left the course before completion in the Peterlee and Seaham areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Information about the number of people leaving employment training before completing their planned training in the Seaham and Peterlee areas is not available.

Youth Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people over 18 years are on YTS special training needs endorsements.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls: On 31 December 1989, 15,900 young people aged over 18 were on YTS with special training needs endorsements.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce an increase in the youth training allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The minimum value of the lower and higher levels of the youth training allowance will remain at £29·50 and £35 respectively. However, from 29 May, youth training trainees will be eligible for the higher rate of the trainee allowance when they reach their 17th birthday, instead of after completing a fixed period of training, which is the current rule. In consequence, most trainees will qualify for the higher level of the trainee allowance earlier than is the case now.

An increasing proportion of YTS trainees have been taken on as employees while training, and will be in receipt of a wage from their employer, not a training allowance. Those who remain as trainees (not employees) are increasingly likely to be in receipt of supplementary payments from employers. Both trends are most encouraging and show that employers are accepting more responsibility for bearing the costs of training young people.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many local authorities are offering early retirement pension schemes to teachers on the grounds of ill health or because they are surplus to requirements;

(2) what is the cost to local authorities of offering early retirement pension schemes to teachers on the grounds of ill health or because they are surplus to requirements;

(3) what is the Government's policy on teachers who have taken early retirement pensions on the grounds of ill health or because they are surplus to requirements taking paid teaching posts with other local authorities.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Teachers' Superannuation (Consolidation) Regulations 1988 provide that a teacher before the age of 60 can receive retirement benefits if he has become incapacitated, that is, he is incapable for reason of infirmity of mind or body of serving efficiently as a teacher. Applications are made direct to this Department by individual teachers. In the financial year 1988-89, a total of 3,400 teachers in England and Wales were awarded benefits under this provision.

The regulations also provide that a teacher over 50 can receive retirement benefits prematurely where his employer has notified the Secretary of State that his pensionable employment was terminated by reason of his redundancy or in the interests of the efficient discharge of the employer's functions. In the financial year 1988-89, a total of 12,500 teachers in England and Wales received benefits under this provision.

The costs of awarding infirmity benefits are borne by the teachers' superannuation scheme; in the case of premature retirement the employer may award additional benefits. The cost of this is met by the individual employer. No central record of costs is available.

Teachers who have retired under these provisions may at a later date seek further employment. In cases where infirmity benefits were awarded, the employer is responsible for satisfying himself that the teacher is medically fit to teach. In all cases, the pension will be subject to the abatement provision and reduced or suspended according to circumstances.

Lingua Programme

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what submissions have been made by his Department for resources from the European Community Lingua programe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Lingua programme began on 1 January 1990. Its first year is essentially preparatory and the programme will be fully operational from 1 January 1991. Applications for support mainly directed at modern language students have been invited for 1990 and United Kingdom institutions will participate fully. It is planned to seek applications for support under other elements of the programme from autumn 1990. The Government will encourage the widest possible United Kingdom participation.

Vacant School Places (Avon)

Mr. Haywood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many vacant places there are in secondary schools in Avon; and what proportion of secondary school places this represents.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information about the number of surplus places in individual local education authorities is not held centrally.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children in the school population have been statemented; what this is as a percentage of total school population; how many of those children statemented are in special schools and what is the percentage; and how many are in mainstream schools and what is the percentage.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested for January 1989 in England is as follows:

	Number of children with statements of special educational needs	As a percentage of the school population
All schools	155,191	2·1
Special schools	[1]102,064	1·4
Mainstream schools	53,127	0·7

[1] No information is available on the number of children without statements in special schools. It is assumed that all children in special schools have statements.

School Budgets

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if it is mandatory for local education authorities to reduce their holdback of 10 per cent. of general school budgets to 7 per cent. over the next three years;

(2) whether the 7 per cent. figure of centrally held budget by local education authorities over the next three years is a target figure.

Mrs. Rumbold: Within three years of the introduction of their scheme, LEAs must review the scope of the items they have held back from delegation. In that review we expects LEAs to aim for a target of reducing the total cost of most of the items held back to 7 per cent. of their general schools budget.

Primary School, Landkey

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to approve capital funding for the provision of a new county primary school at Landkey, north Devon.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The building of a new school, or a significant enlargement to the existing school, at Landkey will require the publication of statutory proposals. No statutory proposals of this kind are currently before my right hon. Friend for decision. Priority is given in the distribution of annual capital guidelines for new school places needed as a result of population growth.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mrs. Rumbold: The figures for publicity and advertising expenditure by this Department for the financial years 1979-80 and 1989-90 are provided below. The 1989-90 figure is provisional. Figures for non-departmental public bodies cannot be provided without disproportionate cost.

	Publicity £ Thousand
1979-80	103·8
1989-90	2,596·7

Disabled Students

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to improve the support for disabled students in higher education.

Mr. MacGregor: Disabled students need special help to enable them to take full advantage of higher education opportunities. I propose to improve the arrangements for them in two major ways.

First, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary regulations in due course, I intend to increase substantially the disabled students' allowance payable within the mandatory award by local education authorities in England and Wales. For the academic year 1990-91 the maximum allowance will be raised from the present £765 to £1,000. In addition, two further allowances will be introduced: one for non-medical personal helpers, such as interpreters for the deaf, up to a maximum of £4,000 a year; and the other for major items of specialist equipment, such as word processors with braille printers, up to a maximum of £3,000 spread over the whole course. The Department will be taking steps to ensure that local education authorities and disabled students are fully aware of the new arrangements. Parallel improvements will be made in the grant arrangements for disabled students from Scotland and Northern Ireland.

When top-up loans are introduced this autumn subject to the passage of the Bill before Parliament, disabled students will also be eligible for relevant social security benefits, as well as for the new disabled students' allowances and for existing allowances for extra travel costs and vacation hardship within the mandatory award system Together with the basic award, these should provide adequate resources to meet disabled students' needs while studying. Indeed, overall, disabled students will have considerable additional resources at their disposal as a result of the introduction of loans on top of their continuing grants and benefits.

Secondly, I accept, however, that disabled graduates' capacity to repay loans may be affected by extra living costs resulting from their disability. Such costs will generally be reflected in social security benefit entitlements. As these benefits are provided specifically in relation to the additional costs faced by the disabled, it would not be appropriate to take them into account in assessing disabled graduates' liability to repay. I therefore propose to disregard disability-related benefits when graduates' income is assessed for the purpose of deferment of loan repayments. This means, in effect, that a graduate whose gross income including disability-related benefits is above the deferment threshold, but whose income net of these benefits is below the threshold, will be able to defer loan repayments.

THE ARTS

Arts Funding, Merseyside

Mr. Alton: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will ask the chairman of the Arts Council to review the effectiveness of its policy of parity funding in Merseyside.

Mr. Luce: This is entirely a matter for the Arts Council. I am aware that the council attaches importance to the participation of local authorities in the funding of arts organisations in their area.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will provide direct financial assistance to help pay the deficits and secure the future of the Liverpool Playhouse.

Mr. Luce: It remains a matter for the Arts Council to determine the level of grant appropriate to this or any other arts organisations.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about funding for the Merseyside Everyman theatre and the Playhouse theatre in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I am aware of the financial difficulties facing these two companies. It is a matter for the Arts Council to determine the level of grant appropriate to them. I understand that the council is in discussion with the local authorities concerned to try to find a solution. I am aware of the important contribution of both theatres to the cultural life of Liverpool and the surrounding areas.

Museums and Galleries (Maintenance)

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Minister for the Arts how he intends to provide for the maintenance of national museums and galleries in the next 12 months.

Mr. Luce: I am providing £57 million in 1990-91 for the building and maintenance programmes at the national museums and galleries which I sponsor.

This provision will increase to some £60 million in 1991-92 and to £64 million in 1992-93. This will bring the total provision for building and maintenance over the next three years to over £180 million.

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Minister for the Arts what functions his office carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his office's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his office's regions.

Mr. Luce: The functions of my office are carried out only in London. Most of its expenditure programme is in the form of support to arts organisations, museums, galleries and other bodies. It is not possible to estimate the proportion that is spent in each region.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Incomes

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the investment income and earned income in (i) 1989-90, (ii) 1988-89 and (iii) 1978-79, expressed in cash terms and in constant prices of (a) the bottom 10 per cent., (b) the bottom 20 per cent., (c) the bottom 30 per cent., (d) the bottom 40 per cent., (e) the top 50 per cent., (f) the top 40 per cent., and (g) the top 10 per cent. of all taxpayers; and if he will give the minimum and maximum figures of each income band in this table, together with the minimum and maximum figures for the bands listed in his answer of 20 February, Official Report, columns 681-82.

Mr. Lilley: Available information is given in the tables. Estimates for 1988-89 and 1989-90 are based on projections of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional. These estimates are subject to a large degree of uncertainty since some investment income on which tax is deducted at source is not reflected in the survey.

Information on the investment income of the bottom 10 per cent., 20 per cent., 30 per cent. and 40 per cent. of taxpayers is not available.

Government Staffing Levels

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out a table showing for each year since 1979 (a) the full-time, (b) the part-time and (c) the total staffing of central Government.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested is given below. The total figures cover Her Majesty's forces, the National Health Service, the civil service—except trading funds—and other organisations classified to central Government. The component figures, in aggregate, and definitions are contained in an article on employment in the public and private sectors published in the December 1989 edition of "Economic Trends". The full-time/part-time split for 1989 shown below is a later estimate. Figures for the civil service are also shown separately.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1974 (a) the level of manufacturing investment in cash amounts, (b) the level of manufacturing investment at 1985 prices, (c) the percentage share of manufacturing investment in gross domestic product, (d) the percentage share of manufacturing investment in gross national product and (e) the annual growth rate of manufacturing investment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates of manufacturing investment, gross domestic product and gross national product may be obtained from the CSO database accessible through the House of Commons Library.

Data for 1989 were released by press notice on 16 March, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Interest Rates

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his assessment of the likely movement of interest rates in the United Kingdom produced as a result of currency union between East and West Germany.

Mr. Ryder: The United Kingdom is watching developments in Germany with interest. However, United Kingdom rates will continue to be kept as high as is needed for as long as is needed to bring down inflation.

Balance of Payments

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report his provisional estimate of balance of payments deficit on current account with the European Economic Community for 1989; and if he will include the figure for invisibles separately.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information for 1989 is not yet available. It will be published later in the year in the 1990 edition of the CSO Pink Book.

European Community

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in trade with the EEC in 1989; and what were the comparable deficits in the previous five years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest information is available in table A12 of the monthly review of external trade statistics, available in the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library.

Value Added Tax

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to make any changes to the method by which health authorities are compensated for the application of value added tax to construction work.

Mr. Ryder: The Government have decided to compensate health authorities for the application of VAT to their construction work through matching increases in public expenditure. From 1 April 1990 health authorities will no longer be eligible under section 11 of the Finance Act 1984 for refunds of VAT paid on construction contracts. The extra capital provision necessary to ensure that health authority building programmes are not prejudiced by the application of VAT will be granted to the NHS in supplementary estimates for 1990-91 to be presented in due course.

Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated number of adults whose income is below the income tax threshold; what is the number of those above and below pensionable age distinguishing between single persons and one and two-earner married couples; and whether he will provide a breakdown of the figures for each region.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 1 March 1990]: Available estimates for 1989-90 are given in the tables. They are based on a projection of the 1987 family expenditure survey and are provisional.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The information is in the table.

[2] Three quarters average male earnings.

[3] Average male earnings for full time adult males in all occupations in 1989-90; £280·00 per week; in line with the assumptions in paragraph 3.02 of the 1989 Autumn Statement.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the proportion of income tax receipts received by the Exchequer (a) by payment at rates higher than the standard rate and (b) from those paying tax at rates higher than the standard rate in (i) 1978-79, (ii) 1987-88 and (iii) 1988-89.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The information is in the table.

[1] Based on a projection of the 1987-88 Survey of Personal Incomes and therefore provisional.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the proportion of income paid in income tax and national insurance combined by a married man with two children aged under 11 years on (a) average earnings, (b) one-and-a-half times average earnings, and (c) twice average earnings, in 1975-76, 1978-79 and the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The information is in the table.

[1] Calculations assume that the married man has no other forms of income and that he does not receive any tax allowances or reliefs other than the married man's allowance and child tax allowances. Child benefit is treated as negative income tax.

[2] Earnings are for full time males on adult rates in all occupations.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

County Courts

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Attorney-General how long it takes for the county court to clear a cheque in each county court area; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The period for a county court to obtain clearance of a cheque drawn in sterling on a bank located in the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland and the Channel Islands—identified by a bank sort code on the cheque—is currently a minimum of eight working days for courts using the Bank of England and 14 working days for courts using the main clearing banks; other cheques, for example drawn on a foreign bank, are subject to individual clearance with no standard clearance period.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Attorney-General how long it takes to process a bad debt claim in each county court area; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Sovereignty (Law Enforcement)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if she will make a statement regarding the implications for United Kingdom national sovereignty and legal systems of the United States Supreme Court ruling of 1 March giving law enforcement agents power to act against non-United States of America nationals abroad without permission of the host country;

(2) what representations Her Majesty's Government made to the United States of America Administration regarding the ruling of the United States Supreme Court of 1 March giving United States law enforcement officers power to act against non-United States nationals abroad without permission of the host country.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom is aware of the judgment of the United States Supreme Court, given on 28 Februrary, in the case of a Mexican citizen.

The United Kingdom is studying the judgment, although at first sight it appears unlikely to affect the interests of this country. Her Majesty's Government have made it clear to the United States authorities that they do not accept that any foreign county has the right to exercise extra-territorial jurisdiction in the United Kingdom.

King Hussein of Jordan (Meeting)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if during her meeting with King Hussein of Jordan on 11 March, she raised (a) the situation of the journalist Farzad Bazoft in Iraq, (b) the threat of nuclear weapons in the middle east and (c) the failure of Israel to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

The Prime Minister: I had a wide-ranging and very useful discussion of the situation in the middle east with King Hussein, who kindly agreed to intercede with the Iraqis over the case of Mr. Bazoft. Our views on the threat posed by nuclear proliferation in the middle east are well known.

Department of Health

Mr. David Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to rename the Department of Health the Department of Health and Personal Social Services in order to more appropriately reflect the Department's responsibilities in its title.

The Prime Minister: No.

ENERGY

Fossil Fuel Levy

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish an explanation in plain terms designed to be comprehensible to ordinary consumers of the formulae contained in the Fossil Fuel Levy Regulations 1990.

Mr. Baldry: The algebra used in the Fossil Fuel Levy Regulations 1990 will enable the Director General of Electricity Supply to calculate the rate of the levy as a percentage of the electricity sales revenue. This percentage will then be notified to licensed suppliers and published. Licensed suppliers will not need to apply these formulae; they will calculate the payments due from them in accordance with the rate notified by the Director. They will therefore be in no doubt as to the rate applicable to any particular month.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Aerospace Companies

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what economic contribution aerospace companies make to the United Kingdom industrial production, investment, the balance of payments and corporation tax revenues.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom aerospace industry made contributions to the United Kingdom economy as follows. Its net output—£3,133 million in 1987—provided 2·9 per cent. of the total net output of production industries; capital expenditure—£258 million—amounted to 1·9 per cent. of production industries' total capital expenditure investment and they recorded over £6 billion worth of exports, in 1988, with a balance of trade of about £1·7 billion in the United Kingdom's favour. Corporation tax statistics are not compiled for individual industries.

Laing Properties

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what grounds he decided not to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the takeover bid by the Peninsular and Oriental company for Laing Properties.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's decision not to refer the proposed acquisition of the P and O Group and Chelsfield plc of Laing Properties plc was taken in accordance with the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading and after consideration of all relevant issues. In my right hon. Friend's view, the proposal did not raise competition or other public interest issues which justified reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many regional development grants and at what total amount were awarded to west Lancashire firms in 1988-89; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many regional selective assistance grants and at what total amount were awarded by his Department in 1988-89 to commercial firms in west Lancashire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:

	Number[2]	Value[3] (£ million)
Regional development grants[1]	146	7·2
Regional selective assistance grants	10	4·1

[1] Data are only available for the revised RDG scheme, which was introduced on 29 November 1984 and closed to new applications on 31 March 1988.
[2] Approvals of RDG, offers of RSA.
[3] Amount expected to be paid if the projects proceed as planned.

Water Reed

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding allegations of dumping from eastern European countries of water reed used for thatching; what investigations he has made into these allegations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I have received no such representations. Investigations into allegations of dumping in the Community are carried out by the European Commission.

Bankruptcy

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current minimum amount of debt which has to be incurred before bankruptcy proceedings can be instigated under the provisions established in section 267(4) of the Insolvency Act 1986 (c. 45); and what plans he has to introduce a statutory instrument to increase or decrease that minimum figure.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 16 March 1990]: The minimum amount is £750. There are no current plans to change that figure.

Directorships

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the conditions under which a person may be banned from being a director of a private limited company or of a public limited company.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 16 March 1990]: A person may be banned from holding such positions in the circumstances specified in the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986. These are: conviction of an indictable offence in connection with the promotion, formation, management or liquidation of a company, or with the receivership or management of a company's property; persistent breaches of companies legislation; fraudulent trading; fraud in relation to a company while an officer or liquidator of the company or receiver or manager of its property; on summary conviction of an offence specified in the above Act; having been a director of a company which has become insolvent where the court finds that the individual's conduct as a director of that company makes him incompetent to be concerned in the management of a company; and where the court is satisfied, following the investigation of a company under section 437 of the Companies Act 1985, or sections 94 or 177 of the Financial Services Act 1986, or where it appears that such an order should be made in the light of information or documents obtained under section 447 or 448 of the Companies Act 1985 or section 105 of the Financial Services Act 1986 or section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 or section 52 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987 or section 83 of the Companies Act 1989, that the person's conduct in relation to a company makes him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company; and where a court has made a declaration under section 213 or 214 of the Insolvency Act 1986 that a person is liable to contribute to a company's assets.

A person may also be disqualified where a court revokes an administration order under section 429 of the Insolvency Act 1986. In addition, a bankrupt person is prohibited automatically from acting as a director and a more limited automatic prohibition applies in the circumstances specified in section 216 of the Insolvency Act 1986.

Securities and Investments Board

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the responsibilities of the Securities and Investments Board for monitoring the activities of companies which have had their licences withdrawn by FIMBRA, LAUTRO, IMRO and TSA.

Mr. Redwood: Powers have been transferred by the Secretary of State to the Securities and Investments Board relating to investment business carried on without authorisation, which is an offence under the Financial Services Act 1986. SIB is therefore in a position to investigate and take action in respect of a company carrying on investment business after its membership of a self-regulating organisation has ended. How it exercises those powers is a matter for the board.

Accountancy Bodies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the steps he is planning to take to promote the involvement of ethnic minorities in the administration of the accountancy bodies incorporated under royal charters.

Mr. Redwood: I have no such plans. It is for the bodies and their members to determine what steps are necessary to ensure equality of opportunity for their members and staff, including those from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many meetings he or his senior civil servants had with the accountancy bodies in 1988 and 1989;

(2) what meetings his Department has held with the accountancy firms criticised by inspectors; and what was discussed.

Mr. Redwood: I and my officials have frequent contact with members of the accountancy profession to discuss a wide range of matters.

BOM Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to give details of the business connections of the accountant inspector inquiring into BOM Holdings.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 21 February 1990, at columns 782-83. The accountant inspector is Mr. R. T. Turner of Messrs. Neville Russell.

DTI Inspectors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if his Department has any plans to insert a statement showing the inspector's business connections on the first page of each report;

(2) if his Department has any plans to insert the cost of completing an investigation on the first page of each inspector's report.

Mr. Redwood: My Department has no such plans.

Lonrho

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he plans to take any action against Lonrho plc for its failure to comply with schedule 7, paragraph 9, of the Companies Act 1985 in its 1989 and earlier annual reports and accounts.

Mr. Redwood: In accordance with its usual practice in response to specific allegations of non-compliance with statutory disclosure requirements, my Department will look into this.

Wages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to amend the Companies Acts to require all companies to publish the lowest annual wage rates applicable in the company.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Accidents

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to require directors of all large companies to publish the work accident rates and the steps being taken to combat them.

Mr. Nicholls: I have been asked to reply.

There are at present no plans to introduce such legislation.

Auditors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to require the auditor's letter of engagement to be filed with the registrar of companies.

Mr. Redwood: No. The letter of engagement is a private contractual matter between the auditor and his client.

External Financial Reporting

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department is undertaking any work in developing a conceptual framework for external financial reporting.

Mr. Redwood: No. We are, however, following with interest the debate in the profession on this subject.

Accounting and Auditing

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department will issue recommendations on the accounting treatment of good will.

Mr. Redwood: No. The Accounting Standards Committee has recently published an exposure draft of a proposed revised standard on accounting for good will, inviting comments by 30 July. My Department is considering the draft and will make any comments in due course.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why his representative on the auditing practices committee does not have a vote.

Mr. Redwood: The terms of reference set by the Consultative Committee of Accountancy Bodies for its auditing practices committee provide that voting members shall be nominated by their professional accountancy bodies. In addition, up to seven non-voting members, including two Government representatives, may be co-opted.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he has given to providing a statutory definition of a balance sheet.

Mr. Redwood: Section 228(2) of the Companies Act 1985 states that the balance sheet shall give a true and fair view of the state of affairs of the company at the end of the financial year, and schedule 4 to the Act sets out rules on the form and content of the balance sheet. These provisions are subject to amendment when part I of the Companies Act 1989 comes into force on 1 April. I do not believe that any further statutory definition is needed.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will take steps to provide a statutory definition of an asset.

Mr. Redwood: No. The definition of an asset is one of the issues which was addressed in the exposure draft ED 42 entitled "Accounting for special purpose transactions" published by the Accounting Standards Committee in March 1988. I understand that a further document will be published in the summer.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to legislate to change companies' practice of showing fixed assets in the balance sheet at original cost less depreciation.

Mr. Redwood: Under the alternative accounting rules of paragraph 31 of schedule 4 to the Companies Act 1985, fixed assets may be shown at values or costs other than original cost less depreciation. I have no plans to legislate to change current practice.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures for British aid to Indonesia from 1979 to 1988, the most recent year for which figures are available, are as follows. Further details are given in the ODA publication "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

South Africa

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to increase aid to black South Africans in the light of recent political developments; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will today announce in South Africa a new pledge of £10 million for assistance to black South Africans.

Our aid programme there is a practical demonstration of our commitment to ease the transition to a just, democratic and non-racial society in South Africa. I welcome the recent political developments there which bring the prospect of such a society closer.

The new pledge, for expenditure over the next four years, will enable us to provide support for new projects to improve the standard of education, which is the key to enabling black people to play their full part in a post-apartheid South Africa; and for urban and rural development projects. This increase includes an element which honours a commitment we made at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur last October. This was that, rather than contributing to the costs of the independent agency set up to review and report on South Africa's financial links, and of the continuing work of the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers on South Africa, we would contribute an equivalent amount for additional help for black South Africans.

DEFENCE

Indonesia

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total value of British arms contracts with Indonesia for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Neubert: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to release figures for defence sales to specific countries. Statistics of United Kingdom defence sales by broad geographic regions are set out in volume 2 of the annual Statement on the Defence Estimates.

Atomic Energy

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the specific reasons for the amendments made respectively in each case since 1959 to the 1958 United Kingdom-United States mutual defence agreement on atomic energy matters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The amendments to the 1958 agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes and the reasons for their implementation were:

Cmnd 859 (1959)—to permit the transfer between the two countries of nuclear materials, other than submarine propulsion materials which had been agreed upon in the original agreement, for military purposes.

Cmnd 4119 (1969)—to extend the range of material transfer clauses

Cmnd 4384 (1970)—to extend the duration of the material transfer clauses

Cmnd 6017 (1975)—to further extend the duration of the material transfer clauses

Cmnd 7976 (1980)—again to further extend the duration of the material transfer clauses and also to add a minor change to the wording of the contraints upon each part as applied by the conditions clauses

Cmnd 9336 (1984)—a further extension of the duration of the material transfer clauses, the provision of materials processing services, and a major change to the wording of a number of clauses to ensure the appropriate protection of US "sensitive nuclear technology information" and "controlled nuclear information"—two new classes of US information which had been created by changes in US federal law.

Rapier System

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cause of the 183·2 per cent. increase in the projected development cost of the Rapier field standard B system noted on page 23 of the minutes of evidence of the Public Accounts Committee, HC483, Session 1988-89.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Rapier field standard B programme now comprises two distinct marks of equipment, known as FSB1 and FSB2. Both are included in current estimates of development cost, whereas the original development estimate comprised only FSB1. The addition of FSB2 explains the bulk of the increase; the remainder is due to increases in the cost of FSB1. The Public Accounts Committee also reported a decrease of almost 26 per cent. in production—where the bulk of the cost lies—for field standard B projects which means that the total cost of development and production for field standard B has increased by 38 per cent. in real terms.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimate of the total expenditure on (a) the European fighter aircraft, (b) the Trigat medium-range missile and (c) the Trigat long-range missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: Total United Kingdom expenditure to date (at current prices) is (a) EFA = £308 million; (b) medium range Trigat = £23 million; (c) long range Trigat = £52 million.

Upholder Submarines

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why the forecast in-service date for the Upholder class submarines changed from 1988 in the 1987 major project statement to 1989 in the 1988 major project statement.

Mr. Neubert: HMS Upholder's forecast in-service date was revised from 1988 to 1989 primarily as a result of an industrial dispute at the contractor's Barrow in Furness yard.

Aircraft Crash, Berwickshire

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the RAF has concluded its report into the fatal aircraft crash at Fastcastle, Berwickshire, on 13 April 1989, and when he expects to publish the inquiry report.

Mr. Neubert: It is intended to publish a military aircraft accident summary in respect of this accident in the near future.

Royal Hospital, Chelsea

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what qualifies a person to be an occupant of the Royal hospital at Chelsea.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The regulations for the Royal hospital, Chelsea, issued under royal warrant stipulate:

"There shall be eligible for admission to the In-pension establishment former soldiers of good character who are:

1. in receipt of
   (a) a service pension or service invaliding pension paid by the Ministry of Defence and awarded in respect of service which included such period of service in the British Army as the Commissioners may in each case in their absolute discretion consider adequate; or
   (b) a disability pension awarded by the Ministry of Defence or the Department of Social Security in respect of disability resulting from service in the British Army; or
   (c) a Victoria Cross or George Medal annuity awarded in respect of bravery while serving in the British Army and who are
2. (a) aged not less than 65 years; or
   (b) in the opinion of the Commissioners incapable of supplementing their pensions by their own exertions owing to the loss of a limb, wounds or other injuries or disabilities resulting from service in the British Army; or
   (c) in the opinion of the Commissioners incapable of supplementing their pensions by their own exertions for reasons other than under paragraph (b) next above provided they are aged not less than 55 years.

In addition, there shall be eligible for admission any former soldier of good character aged not less than 65 years drawing service retired pay awarded as a result of commissioned service in the British Army who rendered at least 12 years' full time service in the ranks of the British Army over the age of 18 years. Preference will be given to those who have borne the best character and rendered the longest service in the British Army.

The commissioners may at their discretion admit such out-pensioners of good character as may from time to time be required for the efficient administration of the hospital, irrespective of their age, length of service or earning capability."

NORTHERN IRELAND

Kilroot Power Station

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when a decision regarding the start date for the second phase of development is likely to be announced for Kilroot power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Timing of the Kilroot phase II project will depend on the outcome of investigations currently being made into the potential benefits of establishing an electricity interconnection with Scotland.

It is hoped to clarify the position on these matters within the next few months.

Job Market, Rathcoole

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will provide funding at an early date to provide for a job market at Rathcoole, Newtownabbey.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A job market will be established in the Newtownabbey area as soon as suitable accommodation is found.

Farmers (Utilities Supply)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to compensate farmers in rural areas in South Down in respect of the cutting off of their electricity and mains water supply during recent storms.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: With sympathy, the answer is no.

Fire Service

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the required statutory period within which the Northern Ireland Fire Authority was required to serve notice of appeal on interested parties in the case of Kerr v Northern Ireland Fire Authority; and on what date notice of appeal was served.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: These were matters for the fire authority.

Deaf-Blind Children

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaf-blind children have been identified in Northern Ireland in the age range (a) 0 to 2, (b) 2 to 5, (c) 6 to 11, (d) 12-15 and (e) 16 to 19 years.

Dr. Mawhinney: A number of Northern Ireland children have been identified as having both hearing and visual impairment but few are totally blind or totally deaf. The information below relates to children who in a varying degree have a multi-sensory handicap which may, in some cases, be associated with a physical or mental handicap.

Age ranges	Number
0 to 2	1
2 to 5	32
6 to 11	32
12 to 15	9
16 to 19	4

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaf-blind children in Northern Ireland attend specialist deaf-blind units.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are no such specialist units in Northern Ireland but two pupils from Northern Ireland attend such units elsewhere.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to issue a policy statement on the education of deaf-blind children in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department of Education (Northern Ireland) is currently considering policy and provision for children with multi-sensory handicaps and will be taking into account the policy statement on this subject issued by the Department of Education and Science.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provision is made to ensure the training of teachers of deaf-blind children in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are already in Northern Ireland a number of teachers in the education sector who in addition to specific qualifications in deaf education also possess qualifications in visual impairment. Opportunities also exist through in-service and distance learning courses for teachers to extend and develop their expertise in particular spheres, including teaching children with multi-sensory handicaps.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the capital expenditure on major capital roads provision in Down district council area in each year since 1 April 1977 until 31 March 1989.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is as follows:

Agriculture

Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the structural weaknesses which he has identified in the agricultural industry in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The main structural weaknesses in the beef sector are the pronounced seasonality of production allied to the marketing challenge.

GPs' Contracts

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining the proposed formula for deprivation allowances in relation to general medical practitioners' contracts arrived at by the DHSS in Northern Ireland, listing those electoral wards which would qualify for the allowance under that formula and indicating the Government's conclusions regarding that proposal.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 14 March 1990]: It was agreed with the General Medical Services Committee (NI) that the index of social deprivation should be used as the basis for calculation of the deprivation supplement in Northern Ireland.

Further work has been undertaken to refine the Northern Ireland index.

This work is nearing completion and the results will be the subject of further consultation with the profession's negotiators.

Finishing Beef Cattle

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from the Ulster Farmers Union concerning the financial implications for producers of finishing beef cattle over the recent winter; and how he intends to respond to the Ulster Farmers Union request for special measures to help keep these producers in business.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 14 March 1990]: I met the Ulster Farmers Union on 17 January 1990 about the difficulties affecting beef producers in Northern Ireland. Subsequently I put the issues involved to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who has given the union an assurance that he will be seeking a substantial devaluation of the United Kingdom green pound in this year's price-fixing round. The Government have also sought to optimise beef intervention in Northern Ireland in recent months and substantial tonnages of beef have been taken off the market recently.

The special measure which the union has sought is a slaughter premium on finished cattle marketed since 1

December 1989. The Government have made it clear that such a measure would be difficult to justify let alone to negotiate in Brussels. The EC Commission and most member states disliked the United Kingdom's beef variable premium scheme and would be certain to oppose any suggestion to reintroduce that kind of end price support. Unilateral action by the United Kingdom would be illegal.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Capital Assets

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what is the total current value of the capital assets of the Church of England; and what are comparable figures updated to 1990 values, for 1960, 1970, and 1980.

Mr. Michael Alison (Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing the Church Commissioners): The Church Commissioners' assets produce about 72 per cent. of the Church of England's investment income and, at their last published valuation, at the end of 1988, were worth £2,640 million or £2,860 million at 1990 prices. The comparable figures for the Church Commissioners' assets in 1960, 1970 and 1980 were, at 1990 prices, £2,240 million, £2,700 million and £2,040 million respectively.

Income

27. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what have been the trends in the Church Commissioners' income over the past 12 months.

Mr. Alison: Although final figures for 1989 are not yet available, it is expected that the commissioners' investment income for that year will have increased by about 14 per cent. over that for 1988.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Accountancy Bodies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will introduce legislation to ensure that before a recommendation is made for the granting of a supplemental royal charter to the accountancy bodies a formal invitation is issued to the public to comment on the conduct of such bodies.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Legislation is not necessary for this purpose. As a matter of standard practice, notice of the receipt of any petition for the grant of a supplemental charter is published in the relevant gazette, together with an invitation to anyone wishing to make representations to communicate with the Privy Council Office within a specified period.

Official Duties

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Lord President of the Council, on average, how much of his time has been spent on his duties as (a) Lord President of the Council and (b) Leader of the House of Commons since 1 January.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is not possible sensibly to separate and quantify the duties associated with the two offices referred to, as distinct from my wider duties as a member of the Administration.

Civil Servants (Advice)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will issue guidance indicating under what circumstances civil servants in the Official Box can advise and offer briefings to Back-Bench Members during the course of a debate; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is the function of civil servants in the Official Box to advise Ministers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Interests

34. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he proposes to recommend any changes to the rules governing the registration of Members' interests.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no proposals to make at this time. However, the hon. Member will recall the motion which I moved, and to which the House agreed, on 7 March.

EEC Affairs

36. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps to improve the provision of factual information to hon. Members on EEC affairs; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Government attach great importance to keeping the House informed of developments in the Community and will continue to report promptly on the outcome of Council meetings as necessary. The Government are actively considering the report by the Procedure Committee on parliamentary scrutiny published on 30 November 1989 which covers a wide range of issues concerning the way in which the House deals with European Community legislation.

Leicestershire

37. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many debates on Leicestershire have taken place since March 1989.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Three Adjournment debates related specifically to Leicestershire have taken place since 1 March 1989.

Official Visit (South America)

38. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his answer of 7 March, Official Report, column 963, if he will make a statement on (a) his visit to Brazil and his discussions on rain forests and (b) his discussions with President Menem of Argentina in relation to the Falklands.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no plans to do so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Staff Numbers

Mr. Wallace: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what was the number of people employed (i) full-time and (ii) part-time (a) by the House of Commons and (b) by an outside agency but working at the House of Commons as of 1 January 1990.

Mr. Beith (on behalf of the House of Commons Commission): A total of 832 full-time and 166 part-time staff, and three agency secretarial staff were employed by the House of Commons Commission on 1 January 1990. In addition, agency staff are employed on a regular basis in the Refreshment Department to cover absences and to assist at functions. An average of 11 such agency staff were employed on each working day during January. These figures do not include full-time and part-time staff employed in the House of Commons by agencies such as the Parliamentary Works Office, the Metropolitan police and Post Office, who are not the direct responsibility of the Commission.

Training

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what training opportunities are provided by the House for those employed (a) by and (b) in the House of Commons.

Mr. Beith: I can reply only for those staff employed by the House. For them training is available either on the job or in external organisations, such as the Civil Service college, the Industrial Society and various academic institutions. Training falls into four broad categories: induction courses; professional training; career development; and educational courses.

Responsibility for the identification and organisation of relevant courses lies in the main with individual departmental training officers who advise their own management and staff of available courses. Certain courses of common interest such as induction and staff reporting and appraisal are, however, organised centrally by the Establishments Office.

Staff undertaking relevant educational courses are assisted financially towards the cost of the course, books, and examination fees and, where necessary, are allowed time off and special leave with pay.

Trade Union and Labour Relations Act

Mr. McLeish: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will place in the Library copies of all the correspondence between the House of Commons management and the Association of First Division Civil Servants over the last 15 years concerning the applicability of the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974, and other national employment legislation, to its employees.

Mr. Beith: No. Correspondence between management and trade unions is not written with a view to publication. The applicability of the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 and the Health and Safety at Work Act 1975 are dealt with in replies given today to other questions from the hon. Member.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the policy of the Commission as to whether the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 applies in its entirety to employees in the House of Commons service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith: Subject to the right of the House to determine its own actions and the interpretation of the law by the courts, there is no reason to believe that the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974, as amended, does not apply in its entirety to employees in the House of Commons service.

Health and Safety at Work etc. Act

Mr. McLeish: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what progress has been made since 1 November 1989 by the head of the Administration Department in considering whether the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 applies to Commission employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith [holding answer 15 March 1990]: As explained in reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 19 June 1989, at column 16, it is the policy of the House of Commons Commission to endeavour to comply fully with the requirements of the Act and with all other relevant statutory provisions, subject only to specific exemptions provided for in legislation. Further advice has confirmed that there has been no change in this position.

WALES

Severn (Rail Tunnel)

6. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans for the construction of a second rail tunnel under the Severn.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. This would be a matter for the British Railways Board.

Local Government Finance

7. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the highest and lowest community charge levied in Wales for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Walker: My information is not yet complete, but the charge set by Clwyd county council is £223 and by Powys £147. The charge set by Cardiff city council is £78, and £7 by South Pembrokeshire. When full details are reported to me I will place in the Library a comprehensive report on the community charges set by all councils in Wales together with details of their expenditure decisions. It will be for the electorate to consider whether explanations given by councils for their decisions are acceptable.

20. Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will, as a matter of urgency, meet representatives of Welsh district and borough councils to discuss the implications of the community charge.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet representatives of Welsh district and county councils on a regular basis in the forum of the Welsh consultative council on local government finance. I have no plans to convene a meeting of the consultative council to discuss the implications of the community charge.

22. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what lessons he has learnt from the process of implementing the poll tax in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have learnt that, in setting their budgets, some local authorities appear to have acted with insufficient regard for the interests of their charge payers, especially those on low or fixed incomes.

Hospice at Home Movement

17. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to make a statement for funding of the Hospice at Home Movement in Wales.

Mr. Grist: I will be meeting representatives of district health authorities and the voluntary hospice movement to discuss the way in which resources for the movement in Wales can best be deployed. A statement will be made after their views have been considered.

Welsh Assembly

18. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about the setting up of a Welsh assembly in Cardiff.

Mr. Peter Walker: None for more than a year.

Coal Miners

19. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many of those coal miners employed in the south Wales coalfield up to and including 1981 are still receiving pensions from their employers.

Mr. Peter Walker: British Coal does not have information in the form requested. It believes, however, that the majority of the 134,000 or so persons who left the south Wales coal industry between 1961 and 1981 will either be receiving pensions now or are entitled to payment in the future.

Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin

21. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what level of support he intends to give to Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin in the coming year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin is one of many organisations that have applied for Welsh language grant support next year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be announcing individual allocations shortly.

Local Government Leaders

23. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to meet the leaders of the organisations representing local government in Wales; and what subjects will be discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the leaders of organisations representing local government in Wales as and when required. I have no such meetings arranged at the moment.

Cancer

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the figures for the incidence of (a) leukaemia, (b) lung cancer, (c) colon cancer and (d) stomach cancer in each district in Wales will be published in relation to 1985.

Mr. Grist: As indicated in my answer of 15 March, I expect this information to be published before the end of this year.

Geriatric Patients

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will commission a study into the location of future geriatric patient care facilities in towns and cities in Wales, from the point of view of convenience of access to (a) patients, (b) relatives and friends and (c) medical staff.

Mr. Grist: No. While the Government place great emphasis on responding effectively to local health needs and preferences, and to being people-centred, the detailed planning and development of services is a matter for individual district health authorities in consultation with other key local interests.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will institute a fire and public safety review of day patient geriatric care wards of wooden construction in actual or prospective use in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Operational responsibility for fire and public safety rests with individual district health authorities which are expected to comply with Firecode, a comprehensive code of guidance on fire precautions in NHS premises issued in 1988 by the Welsh Office. As part of its monitoring function the Department will shortly be asking DHAs to review their compliance with Firecode.

If, in the meantime, the hon. Gentleman is concerned about fire or public safety at a particular hospital, I suggest that he contact the appropriate health authority general manager as a matter of urgency. If he believes that there is a more general problem he should write to me more specifically on the matter.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to institute an analysis and review of the staffing qualifications and training of medical and paramedical staff involved in geriatric patient care in the hospital service in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Grist: No. These matters are the operational responsibility of South Glamorgan health authority.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to meet a deputation concerning the future quality of geriatric patient care in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Grist: I understand that South Glamorgan health authority is proposing to consult on changes to geriatric services in the district. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should ensure that his views on these proposals are made known to the authority at this stage.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what representations he has received regarding the future of St. David's hospital, Cardiff;

(2) what representations he has received regarding the future provision of geriatric patient care in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Grist: My right hon. Friend has not received any such representations since approving the broad thrust of South Glamorgan health authority's draft strategic plan.

South Glamorgan Health Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will institute a study into the causes of the revenue shortfall for 1990-91 of the South Glamorgan health authority.

Mr. Grist: We have no plans to do so at the present time. Health authorities have a statutory duty to manage services within available resources. We would therefore expect South Glamorgan health authority to plan accordingly when rolling forward its financial plan and capital programme for the next 10 years and preparing its business plan for 1990-91. These plans will be scrutinised by the Department as part of the annual review process in the course of the next few months; and officials will be seeking to ensure that they are realistically based in terms of prospective resources and provide a clear agenda for the management of the authority's services within those resource assumptions.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fish Farming

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information and statistics he has for the turnover of and growth in the trout farming industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Curry: The United Kingdom trout farming industry has shown steady and impressive growth and is a major contributor to our aquaculture industry. In 1989, about 16,000 tonnes of farmed trout were produced for consumption whose first sale value was some £40 million. This compares, for instance, with production of 4,500 tonnes in 1979, worth around £6·5 million.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the fish farming industry over proposals for the National Rivers Authority on residual flows.

Mr. Curry: We have received a number of representatons from fish farming interests, principally concerning the NRA's plans for the introduction and operation, in England and Wales, of abstraction licences and discharge consents, and charges for these.

Fish Producers

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when he expects to allocate the sectoral quota management arrangements to the Northern Ireland Fish Producers Organisation;

(2) when he expects to make available the final sectoral quota figures for fisheries management arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Following consultation with the industry, Fisheries Departments have agreed to the introduction of sectoral quota management arrangements in the cod, plaice, sole and whiting fisheries in the Irish sea for 1990. Departments will shortly be writing to producer organisations asking them to supply the information necessary to begin the calculations which are likely to be complicated. We would aim to produce provisional allocation figures in May and final figures in June.

Acid Rain

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list by location for the last 10 years the fisheries in Yorkshire and Humberside that have been affected by acid rain; and if he will make a statement as to what effect this has had on their revenue.

Mr. Curry: I am asking the National Rivers Authority to write to the hon. Member with whatever information it has on the impact of acid rain on fisheries in these areas.

EC Surplus Food

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements he has made for implementing the EC surplus food scheme in the United Kingdom in 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Pending its detailed review of this scheme in 1990, the European Commission has decided to authorise the distribution of surplus food from intervention stocks to the most needy for one further year. The Government continue to believe that such a scheme is an inefficient method both of dealing with surpluses, which are now substantially lower than at the outset of the scheme in 1988, and of assisting those whom it should help. Nevertheless, the Government do not wish to deprive eligible United Kingdom citizens of an opportunity available to their counterparts elsewhere in the Community.

The Commission has allocated 150 mecu to the European Community for this purpose, the same as was allocated in 1989. The United Kingdom has obtained some 22·9 mecu, the same proportion as last year, which represents about £17 million worth of butter and beef. This produce will be distributed in the United Kingdom by charitable and other non-profit-making organisations which meet the prescribed conditions and wish to apply. The scheme applies to certain clearly defined categories of people. Pensioners or the unemployed are eligible only if they fall into one or other of these categories. The coverage of those who are eligible will depend on the extent to which the organisations participate.

I am arranging for further details to be sent to the appropriate bodies, and I will place a copy of this information in the Library.

New Forest

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to respond to the report of the New Forest review group.

Mr. Curry: The responses of the Government and the Forestry Commissioners to the review group's recommendations will be made public tomorrow. Copies of the document containing these responses will be placed in the Library of the House.

Sheep Premiums

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the payment of advances of sheep annual premium.

Mr. Curry: The revised sheepmeat regime which my right hon. Friend negotiated last year gives member states the option of making two advances of premium to all sheep producers, or of combining the two advances into a single payment which would be made at the time the second advance was due.

My right hon. Friends and I recognise the advantage to producers of an early advance payment. We also see it as important to ensure that United Kingdom producers are not at a disadvantage compared with producers in other member states. We have, therefore, decided to adopt the system of two advance payments of premium. The precise timing will depend on European Community decisions as well as the speed with which our local offices can complete the various checks which have to take place before payments can be made. By adjusting priorities, we hope to complete the administrative arrangements in time to pay the majority of first advances under this year's scheme by no later than early autumn, with the second advance following in January 1991, and the balancing payment in the spring of 1991. The level of payments will be determined by the European Community Commission in the light of forecasts of income loss.

I am sure that sheep producers will welcome this feature of the new sheepmeat regime which will give them earlier benefit from the sheep annual premium.

Coastal Eutrophication

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department will be represented at the international conference on marine coastal eutrophication on 21 to 24 March.

Mr. Curry: No.

Salmon Net Fishing

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to complete his review of the north-east salmon net fishing.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 12 January to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) at columns 779-80.

Shellfish

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he proposes to take to ensure a regular and adequate future supply of nephrops suitable for processing into scampi.

Mr. Curry: We have, through EC legislation, adopted conservation measures to maintain and safeguard the renewability of fish stocks including nephrops. It is for the processing industry to arrange for its supplies of nephrops suitable for scampi.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what temporary financial assistance he is prepared to offer shellfish processors who have to resort to temporary lay-offs and closures because of shortage of prawns, nephrops and other types of shellfish.

Mr. Curry: None.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will amend by-catch restrictions for the use of separator trawls for prawns.

Mr. Curry: Amendments to the bycatch restrictions in the Community's technical conservation regulation EEC Regulation No. 3094/86[1] require the agreement of the Council of Fisheries Ministers. Specific provisions for the use of separator trawls need to take account of the nature of the gear and enforcement aspects as well as the catch composition. Further studies are necessary. At the request of the United Kingdom, the Commission will report on the effects of the use of these trawls which is to be permitted from 1 April 1990 for catching nephrops in the Bay of Biscay.

[1]Official Journal L288/1, 11.10.86.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for a one net rule.

Mr. Curry: The recent paper the United Kingdom put to the EC Commission setting out possible improvements in technical conservation measures included a proposal, which was agreed with the fishing industry, for a one-net rule. We expect the idea to be discussed in Brussels shortly as part of the work of the high-level working group which the Council of Ministers asked to report at the end of June.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to introduce a comprehensive shellfish licensing scheme.

Mr. Curry: We have no plans at present to introduce such a scheme.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to restrict beam and pair trawling within inshore waters, particularly on the Scottish west coast, Orkney and Shetland.

Mr. Curry: We have no such plans.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the extra cost to the average family of the additional costs of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Curry: The magnitude of the costs of the common agricultural policy depends on the nature of the alternative policy envisaged. The Government's aim is to achieve lower levels of agricultural support worldwide, thereby reducing the costs borne by consumers and taxpayers.

Food Safety Bill

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much of the £30 million per annum extra cost falling on local authorities as a result of the Food Safety Bill he estimates will not be included in central Government grants while being taken into account in setting rate support grants and standard spending assessment levels for 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Maclean: None.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sultan of Brunei

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what continuing commitments the Government still have arising from the agreement made between the British Government and the Sultan of Brunei in 1985.

Mr. Maude: We know of no agreement between the British Government and the Sultan of Brunei signed in 1985.

East Jerusalem

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to oppose any increase in Jewish settlement in East Jerusalem.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. We regard Jewish settlements in the occupied territories, including East Jerusalem, as illegal.

China (Foreign Compensation)

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has been paid out under the Foreign Compensation (People's Republic of China) (Registration) Order 1980, and to how many claimants; and if he will estimate how much is still owing to current and potential claimants.

Mr. Maude: No compensation was paid to claimants under the 1980 order which merely provided a framework for registering claims against China prior to the start of intergovernmental negotiations.

The China compensation fund was established by the Foreign Compensation (People's Republic of China) Order 1987. In January 1989 an interim distribution of 5 per cent. of the assessed value of a claim was begun by the Foreign Compensation Commission to successful bond claimants. To date, a total sum of approximately £504,000 has been paid in this way to 1,660 such bond claimants. Judicial determination of property claims is a more complex task than determination of bond claims. The payment of the balance owing in respect of bond claims and the full and final payment in respect of property claims will not be made until the final distribution from the fund. It is expected that this will be announced in the autumn.

Only when all claims against the fund have been determined will it be possible to assess the amount payable in relation to the assessed value of each claim. It is expected, however, at this stage that the percentage of the assessed value of a claim received by successful claimants will exceed 10 per cent.

Lithuania

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government recognise the declaration of political independence by the new Parliament of Lithuania.

Mr. Waldegrave: The well-established criteria which we have applied to the recognition of a state are that it should have, and seem likely to continue to have, a clearly defined territory with a population, a Government who are able of themselves to exercise control of that territory, and independence in their external relations. We will therefore continue to watch the situation closely as it develops.

Test Ban Treaty (Conference)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of planning for the preparatory conference for the amendment conference of the 1963 partial test ban treaty, to be held in January 1991.

Mr. Waldegrave: Parties to the partial test ban treaty have agreed that a preliminary meeting will be held in New York from 29 May to 8 June 1990 to address organisational aspects of the amendment conference. Consultations on the details of the meeting are continuing.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he, or any Ministers or officials in his Department, met or communicated with the deputy Foreign Minister of Iraq, Mr. Nizar Hamdoun, during his visit to the United Kingdom on 8-9 March.

Mr. Waldegrave: I raised the case of Mrs. Parish and Mr. Bazoft when I met Nizar Hamdoun on 8 March. I expressed our serious concern for the two and emphasised the importance of a fair trial. Mr. Hamdoun took note of these points and emphasised the sensitivity of these cases for the Iraqi authorities. Similar representations were made to Mr. Hamdoun at a senior official level.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent his actions in respect of Iraq have been influenced by his assessment of the likelihood that Mr. Bazoft was involved in espionage.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have seen no proof that Mr. Bazoft was a spy. Our concern in his case has throughout been entirely humanitarian.

Antarctica

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the area covered by permanent ice in Antarctica and in the British area of Antarctica; and what was the comparable area so covered 10, 20 and 30 years ago.

Mr. Maude: The main Antarctic ice-sheet extends to 12 million sq km with attached ice shelves covering an additional 1·5 million sq km. Data are unavailable specifically for the British Antarctic territory. However, the Antarctic peninsula contains a grounded ice-sheet of 0·3 million sq km and ice shelves totalling 0·14 million sq km.

Comparisons with ice cover 20 and 30 years ago are not possible due to the rudimentary survey methods then employed. Satellite imagery since the mid-1970s indicates no discernible changes overall in the areas of grounded ice or ice shelves in the Antarctic. It is estimated, however, that ice shelves in the Antarctic peninsula have decreased by more than 750 sq km in the past 10 years, a reduction of around 0·5 per cent.

Albania

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy that the Albanian gold bullion held by Britain following the second world war is returned to the Albanian Government only on payment of full compensation at today's value to the families of sailors who died and the survivors of the crews of HMS destroyers Saumarez and Volage sunk by Albanian mines in 1946.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our policy remains that we shall be able to agree to the Tripartite Gold Commission's releasing gold to Albania only when Albania has paid the compensation awarded to Britain by the International Court of Justice in the Corfu channel case. This delay will not, however, penalise the survivors and the families of those killed on board HM ships Saumarez and Volage. All concerned were fully compensated at the time under the regulations then in force.

Germany (Ministerial Meeting)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during his meeting with Ministers and officials of the Federal German Government on 12 March he discussed (a) the forthcoming fourth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and its final preparatory committee meeting in April, and (b) the geopolitical implications for nuclear arms control of an independent Lithuanian state.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Katyn Massacre

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's latest information on who bears the responsibility for the Katyn massacre.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is substantial circumstantial evidence pointing to Soviet responsibility for the Katyn massacre. We urge the Soviet authorities to help establish the facts once and for all.

SCOTLAND

Fishing

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what representations he has received regarding the state of the fishing industry on the west coast of Scotland;

(2) what measures his Department intends to take to protect the west coast fishing industry;

(3) what measures his Department intends to introduce to restrict fishing effort during 1990 on the west coast of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Representations have been received concerning the need to protect certain west coast fish stocks from excessive fishing effort. My noble Friend the Minister of State announced on 8 March that a consultation paper on possible conservation measures would be issued soon. It is hoped to do so in the next few days.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department intends to introduce pressure stock licensing to assist in effort limitation on the fishing of stocks on the west coast of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Pressure stock licensing already applies to stocks on the west coast of Scotland.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to restrict twin and triple rig trawling in the Minch.

Mr. Lang: Fisheries departments will shortly be issuing a consultation paper on a range of measures for conserving stocks on the west coast of Scotland. This will include seeking views on the use of twin and triple rig trawls since some sections of the fishing industry have expressed concern about their impact.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what training Scottish Office spokespersons receive in local government finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Government press officers receive training in media techniques, which includes communication of information to the press and broadcasters on a wide range of subjects, including local government finance.

Technology Academies

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland where the city technology academy will be sited.

Mr. Lang: The company which was set up to establish the first technology academy in Scotland is actively pursuing the acquisition of a suitable site in Glasgow.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the opening of a technology academy.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Progress with establishing a technology academy will depend on a number of factors, and in the first instance on the acquisition of a suitable site.

Disabled Students

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he intends to make in the support arrangements for disabled students in higher education.

Mr. Lang: In recognition of their particular needs, I propose for session 1990-91 to increase the maximum allowance for disabled students from £765 to £1,000 per session. In addition, I propose to introduce two new provisions which will provide up to £3,000 to cover the cost of expensive specialist equipment over the period of the course, and up to £4,000 per session for those students requiring non-medical personal help such as readers for the blind and interpreters for the deaf. We will be taking steps to publicise these new arrangements.

Disabled students will continue to be eligible for relevant social security benefits. These, together with the basic award and the new allowances, should fully meet the disabled student's requirements.

When top-up loans are introduced this autumn, subject to the passage of the Bill before Parliament, I accept that disabled graduates' capacity to repay loans may be affected by additional living costs associated with their disability. I therefore propose to disregard disability related benefits when assessing graduates' income for the purpose of determining when to defer the repayment of the loan.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many post-neonatal death per 1,000 live births there were, for each year since 1975, in (a) Scotland, (b) the United Kingdom, (c) Denmark, (d) France, (e) West Germany, (f) Italy, (g) the Netherlands, (h) Spain and (i) Sweden.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: The information readily available is as follows:

Post-neonatal deaths per 1,000 live births.

Year	Scotland	United Kingdom
1975	5·4	5·1
1976	4·5	4·6

Deprivation

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what account has been taken of the work of the Medical Research Council sociology unit in Glasgow in shaping his policies regarding deprivation effects on the health of Scottish people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: In formulating policy, account is taken of all relevant research.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures the research project into community health promotion in a deprived area, funded by his Department, recommended regarding effects of deprivation on physical and mental health.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: It was concluded that a community development approach to health promotion is feasible and that models, which involve local people, can be developed.

Health Authorities

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, what specific measures he has carried out in response to the "Scottish Health Authorities' Priorities for the Eighties" report recommendations.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: The recommendations of the SHAPE report were reviewed in 1988 with the publication of the SHARPEN report (Scottish Health Authorities Review of Priorities for the Eighties and Nineties). This endorsed the broad thrust of SHAPE but stressed the importance of care in the community for the priority groups.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many speech therapy posts are established in the Greater Glasgow health board area; how many are vacant; and for how long they have been vacant.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Greater Glasgow health board employs 66·1 whole-time equivalent speech therapists. Sixteen vacancies were identified last October and five have since been filled.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many speech therapy posts are vacant in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Speech therapists are employed almost exclusively by health boards and information about current vacancies is not held centrally.

Terminally Ill People

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provisions he has made for augmented community care reviews for the terminally ill in his allocation of money to the National Health Service in Scotland in 1990-91; and how much has been allocated to each of the health board areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Health boards are expected to fund the provision of community care services from within their general allocations.

Schools and Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what surveys he has undertaken on the physical conditions of Scotland's schools and colleges; and what were the findings.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 16 March 1990]: My right hon. and learned Friend has undertaken no comprehensive survey of the physical condition of local authority schools and other educational buildings in Scotland. It is the responsibility of the authorities and the bodies responsible for the management of colleges to maintain information about the condition of their building stock.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion on the basis of the 1987 family expenditure survey of (a) all pensioners and (b) newly retired pensioners have neither a state additional pension nor an occupational pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the 1987 family expenditure survey shows that 52 per cent. of all pensioners and 73 per cent. of recently retired pensioners receive an occupational pension.

Residential Homes

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people are currently in receipt of income support, living in nursing homes and claiming for accommodation and meals in the categories (a) suffering from terminal illness, (b) physically disabled, under pensionable age and (c) physically disabled, over pensionable age;

(2) how many people are currently in receipt of income support, living in residential care homes and claiming for accommodation and meals, in the categories (a) of retirement age, (b) very dependent elderly, (c) physically disabled, under pensionable age and (d) physically disabled, over pensionable age.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 15 February 1990 at columns 375-78.

Social Security Reform

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update tables 1.5, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, 1.10 and 1.11 which appeared on pages 18 to 21 of Reform of Social Security, volume 3, Cmnd. 9519.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Comparable figures for years after 1982 could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Area Computer Centres

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security who tendered for the contract to run the area computer centre at Livingstone; and to whom it was awarded.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The contract to run the area computer centre at Livingstone was tendered for by two companies and awarded to Electronic Data Systems.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security who tendered for the contract to run the area computer centre at Norcross, Lancashire; and to whom it was awarded.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The contract to run the area computer centre at Norcross was tendered for by Electronic Data Systems, to whom the contract was awarded.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Broadwater Farm (Convictions)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to seek information from the Police Complaints Authority under the provisions of section 98 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in relation to the Broadwater Farm convictions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have already carefully considered the reports of investigations supervised by the Police Complaints Authority into complaints against the police arising out of the Broadwater Farm disturbances and can find no evidence from these investigations which casts doubt on the safety of any of the convictions of those concerned.

Road Traffic Offences

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the total cost of police time, for each of the last three years, of all activities relating to traffic management, including attendance at accidents and court appearances relating to Road Traffic Act offences.

Mr. Waddington: In 1987, 1988 and 1989, approximately 8 per cent. of the total police strength in England and Wales was deployed on specialist traffic duties. The proportion of non-specialist officers' time spent on traffic matters is not recorded. The total costs could not be reliably estimated.

Vehicle Registration

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to allow police authorities to reveal the keeper of a vehicle when a member of the public has a good reason to seek the information and has details of the vehicle registration number.

Mr. Waddington: The police obtain details of vehicle keepers as necessary for police purposes from the driver and vehicle licensing centre at Swansea. The disclosure of such information to members of the public is a matter for that organisation and there is an established procedure for this purpose. The driver and vehicle licensing centre will, on request from a member of the public and on payment of a charge of £3·50, supply the name and address of the owner of any vehicle registered with it providing that that person can show that he has reasonable cause for his request. It would not be appropriate for the police to assume the responsibilities of the driver and vehicle licensing centre for deciding whether the information should be made available.

Custodial Sentencing

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to reduce custodial sentencing.

Mr. John Patten: Our proposals for statutory framework for sentencing were set out in the White Paper, "Crime Justice and Protecting the Public" (Cm 965), which was published on 6 February. These include restrictions on the use of custody for all but the most serious offenders, together with a wider and more flexible range of strengthened community penalties and reduced maximum penalties for theft and burglary, except burglaries of people's homes.

Prison Privatisation

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the privatising of prisons and remand centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are still considering the outcome of the further studies into the likely cost-effectiveness of contracting out to the private sector the design, construction and operation of remand centres which my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) announced in his statement on 1 March 1989 at columns 277-78. We hope to make a further announcement soon.

Bingo

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the way in which section 42 of the Gaming Act operates in so far as it refers to bingo; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: In the 12 months to 15 March 1990, four hon. Members have asked questions about any plans which we might have to amend section 42 of the Gaming Act 1968 in so far as it provides controls on the advertising of licensed bingo clubs, and we received 102 letters from hon. Members, and one letter from a member of the public, about these controls. The correspondence from hon. Members has mainly been on behalf of constituents employed in the licensed bingo club industry who supported a campaign by the Bingo Association of Great Britain (BAGB) for the complete removal of the controls.

As the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), explained in his reply on 17 January—at column 265—to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), we have informed the BAGB that we cannot accept its campaign, but that it is open to it to resume discussions with the Gaming Board for Great Britain on the scope, if any, for some relaxation of the controls. I understand that the board has offered the BAGB a date next month for such discussions.

Terrorist Suspects

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce safeguards to ensure that suspected terrorists who should be interviewed under his two-year experiment at either Bridewell police station, Liverpool or Paddington Green police station, London, will not be taken to other police stations for interview.

Mr. Waddington: No. Main Bridewell and Paddington Green are the stations used whenever possible in terrorist cases by the Merseyside and Metropolitan police respectively. It may be necessary on occasions to use other stations if the accommodation for terrorist suspects is full or out of use, but tape recordings would still be made in such circumstances.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest number of juvenile offenders in youth custody; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 December 1989 there were 358 sentenced juvenile offenders in prison service establishments. This compares with 907 sentenced juvenile offenders who were held in prison establishments on 31 December 1984. It is the Government's policy that juvenile offenders should, wherever possible, be dealt with other than by a custodial sentence. Many young offenders are already dealt with under a range of demanding and constructive community-based measures. Under the proposals in the White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public", the courts will have a wider range of powers for dealing with young offenders in the community.

West Midlands Police

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report on the progress of the inquiry into the West Midlands serious crime squad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Members for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) on 25 January at column 873. I understand that the investigation team, led by Mr. Shaw, assistant chief constable of the West Yorkshire police, is continuing to examine the files relating to all the arrests made by the squad since 1986, and is also investigating individual complaints made against officers of the squad. It will be some time before all cases have been examined.

Passports

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to privatise the passport-issuing function of his Department.

Mr. Waddington: There are no such plans, but work is well advanced on arrangements for the proposed conversion of the passport department to an executive agency, and for making use of relevant private sector expertise where this would help to improve standards of service.

Child Crime (Accountability)

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about his proposals to make parents more accountable for crimes committed by their children.

Mr. John Patten: Since we published the White Paper "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public" last month, we have received about 10 responses on the proposals to increase parental responsibility. These broadly support the proposals contained in the White Paper. We look forward to receiving more responses in the next few weeks.

Immigration

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the implications of other European Community countries' immigration policies for the Government's policies on immigration and deportation.

Mr. Waddington: While the United Kingdom's policies on immigration and deportation are not determined by those of other Community countries, the Government seek to keep informed of developments in and between Community countries, and is engaged in discussion with them in the context of the implementation of the Single European Act.

Victim Support

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what grants he has made in each of the last five financial years to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes; and what assessment he has made of the effect of actual and planned changes in funding by his Department.

Mr. John Patten: Home Office funding of victim support since 1986 has been as follows:

	Local victim support schemes £	Victim support headquarters £	Total £	Annual increase per cent.
1985-86	—	126,000	126,000	—
1986-87	136,000	150,000	286,000	127
1987-88	1·60 million	103,000	1·70 million	494
1988-89	2·55 million	190,000	2·74 million	61
1989-90	3·70 million	210,000	3·91 million	43

This funding has enabled local victim support schemes to expand to cover 94 per cent. of the population of England and Wales with the following effects on provision of service:

	Number of schemes	Number of paid co-ordinators	Number of referrals	Number of Volunteers
1985-86	293	133	180,000	3,935
1986-87	305	151	257,083	4,200
1987-88	294	180	328,174	5,900
1988-89	299	227	400,810	6,292
1989-90	355	300	[1]420,000	[1]6,800

[1] Estimates.

For 1990-91 the planned level of grant in aid subject to parliamentary approval is £4·47 million for local schemes and £235,000 for headquarters.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from Birmingham city council on the Birmingham pub bombings case.

Mr. John Patten: We are not aware of recent representations from Birmingham city council about the Birmingham pub bombings case.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has completed his consideration of the new evidence in the Birmingham pub bombings case.

Mr. John Pattern: No. My right hon. and learned Friend is still considering very carefully the further material presented to him by a solicitor on behalf of the six men and will decide as soon as possible whether it justifies any intervention on his part.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has sought the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice on the new evidence in the Birmingham pub bombings case.

Mr. John Patten: No.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special units have been established within the Metropolitan police area dealing with cases of domestic violence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are 33 units operated by the Metropolitan police offering support to the victims of domestic violence, reflecting the priority given to this in the Commissioner's strategy statement for 1990.

Homosexuality Law

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take in relation to the criminal law on homosexuality in (a) Jersey and (b) the Isle of Man.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Discussions between the Home Office and the Jersey and Isle of Man authorities are continuing. Both islands have been made aware of the urgent need to amend their current legislation in order to enable the United Kingdom to conform with its international obligations under the European convention on human rights.

Prisoners (Media Interviews)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to prevent the holding of press conferences by, and the sound or television broadcasting of, interviews with persons detained, following conviction, in Her Majesty's prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Media interviews with prisoners about their individual cases are not permitted. We are reviewing our procedures to try to ensure that, when the media are invited into establishments for a particular purpose, unauthorised interviews do not take place.

Jurors

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to enrol extra jurors for cases expected to last several months.

Mr. John Patten: We have no present plans to change the law in this respect, although we will keep it under review. A trial can generally proceed so long as nine jurors are still serving. Enlarging the jury beyond 12 at the outset would introduce complexity, and place a greater burden on the pool of jurors. The special procedures introduced in the Criminal Justice Act 1987 for handling serious and complex fraud trials (which the hon. Member may have particularly in mind) were designed to keep the proceedings before the jury as short as possible.

Animal Protection

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to extend the scope of the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to afford the same protection to wild animals as that presently afforded to domestic and captive animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 15 March 1990]: Wild animals which are in captivity are protected by the Protection of Animals Act 1911 (1912 in Scotland), but we do not have any plans to extend the scope of this legislation to include animals which are not in captivity.

However, there ar other statutes which provide protection for particular species in the wild, for example, deer, seals and badgers. Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, special protection can be given to certain species which are considered to be in need of it on conservation grounds.

HEALTH

Ambulance Dispute

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he hs as to the cost to public funds of the ambulance dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The cost of providing military assistance during the ambulance dispute up to the end of January was £3·3 million. The cost of assistance by the police and other agencies has not yet been fully assessed by the authorities concerned.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the total numbers of people entitled to free prescriptions on the ground of low income alone (a) on 31 March 1988 and (b) on the latest date for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At 31 March 1988 about 3·8 million people were entitled to free prescriptions on the grounds of low income. The corresponding figure for 31 March 1989, the latest date for which information is available, is estimated to have been 3·4 million.

South West Thames RHA

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he is to have with officials of the South West Thames regional health authority on the health cuts now being considered by the authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No discussions are planned with officials of the South West Thames regional health authority. Regional health authorities must live within their allocated resources and difficult decisions about priorities have sometimes to be made. South West Thames RHA has received a cash increase of 36 per cent. over the last three years.

RHAs (Resources)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by each regional health authority, the percentage cash increase in resources being made available for the financial year 1990-91, over the financial year 1989-90.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is shown in the table. The percentage figures shown represent the cash increase in each authority's 1990-91 initial revenue cash limit compared with the equivalent 1989-90 figure.

Hormone Replacement Therapy

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received on the preventive properties against illness of hormone replacement therapy.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In recent months I have received representations and have also met and discussed hormone replacement therapy with my hon. Friend and the assistant medical director of the Amarant Trust. I have also met the voluntary organisation, Women's Health Concern. I also had a meeting about osteoporosis with the National Council of Women and affiliated organisations at which we discussed hormone replacement therapy.

Psychotherapy

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to retain, within the National Health Service, specialist in-patient psychotherapeutical services for severely disturbed patients and families.

Mr. Freeman: It is national policy that all district health authorities should, as resources allow, develop locally based psychiatric services, the main components of which are summarised in paragraph 7.3 of the White Paper "Caring for People" (Cm 849). Within this overall objective, it is for each authority to determine the exact content of its service, including whether facilities for in-patient psychotherapy should form part.

Psychosocial Nursing

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for the training of nurses in psychosocial nursing.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All nurses who are admitted to part 3 of the Professional Register (Registered Mental Nurse) are given training in psychosocial nursing. This aspect of development psychology is encompassed in the knowledge base of the 1982 syllabus of training.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a table showing the number of people on waiting lists for urgent and non-urgent operations for each health authority in Yorkshire and Humberside for each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: The available information is given in the table. The Körner committee on health services information felt that the distinction between urgent and non-urgent cases was too subjective to be reliable. The information has thus not been subdivided in this way since 1987.

Project 2000

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what incentives are being offered to nurses to remain in the nursing profession, in the light of Project 2000; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Our aim is to ensure the Health Service's ability to recruit and retain the staff it needs. We have increased the pay of nursing staff by an average of 43 per cent. in real terms since 1979. The new grading structures for clinical and educational staff allow nurses to be better rewarded for the work they do and provide improved career prospects. The current pilot scheme of flexible pay supplements for nursing and midwifery staff is intended to improve retention and re-entry rates in areas where there are special difficulties. There is also an increased emphasis on the importance of providing flexible working arrangements and improved facilities for re-entry after breaks in service, on which the national steering group on equal opportunities for women in the NHS has published advice.

Community Care

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that users of community care services are formally consulted when local authorities are drawing up their plans for community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We will be issuing guidance to local authorities on community care plans. This will reinforce our intention, set out in the White Paper "Caring for People", that local authorities should consult representatives of users of services and their carers in drawing up plans.

Salmonella

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the sources of his information regarding the number of incidents of salmonella enteritidis-induced food poisoning reported during the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Freeman: The sources of information this year (which is less than three months old) are the same as in past years, and are detailed in annex 1 of the public health laboratory service's evidence to the House of Commons Select Committee on Agriculture in October 1988.

The sources of information for the routine surveillance of human salmonellosis in England and Wales include:

(i.) reports of human isolates to the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre (CDSC) from public health and other laboratories;
(i.) referrals of human isolates of salmonellas for detailed identification to the PHLS division of enteric pathogens from public health and other laboratories;
(iii.) laboratory reports of outbreaks to CDSC;
(iv.) local authority reports of outbreaks to CDSC;
(v.) outbreaks ascertained by CDSC by other means and verified.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his assessment of the future trend in outbreaks of food poisoning through the consumption of eggs infected by salmonella enteritidis.

Mr. Freeman: It is impossible to predict trends in outbreaks of salmonellosis with any degree of certainty. Early indications, however, from data from the PHLS division of enteric pathogens indicate that the levelling off in total salmonella enteritidis phage type 4 isolates seen last year has been maintained in the early part of this year. There is room for cautious optimism that this trend will continue.

Cataract Operations

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average length of the waiting list for cataract operations throughout the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about specific conditions and proposed method of treatment of patients on hospital waiting lists is not collected centrally. On 31 March 1989 the average length of lists for patients awaiting admission for treatment by a consultant ophthalmologist in district health authorities in England was 491. The individual lists, which varied from one in Kettering to over 3,000 in central Manchester, are influenced by the nature of local and neighbouring facilities, the size of the population being served, and the number of consultants providing the service.

Child Abuse Allegations

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will consider financial assistance to the organisation called Parents Against Injustice which seeks to help those parents who have been falsely accused of abusing their children.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has contributed to the organisation's headquarters administrative expenses each year since 1987. In the current financial year the contribution totalled £24,000. I have agreed to meet representatives of the organisation.

Dental Health

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the dental experts who were involved in the COMA panel's report on sugars.

Mr. Freeman: The members of the committee on medical aspects of food policy's panel on dietary sugars are listed in the report. The dental member was Professor A. J. Rugg-Gunn of the departments of child dental health and oral biology at the dental school of the university of Newcastle upon Tyne.

A number of submissions on dental and other aspects of health were received and considered by the panel. These are also listed in the report, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the change in the occurrence of dental cavities in the teeth of five-year-old children over the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Freeman: Surveys of children's dental health are carried out at 10-yearly intervals by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on behalf of the health departments. The last survey which was conducted in 1983 showed that the proportion of five-year-olds in England and Wales with dental decay experience fell from 72 per cent. in 1973 to 49 per cent. The average number of teeth estimated to have had some decay, allowing for the condition of missing deciduous teeth, was 4·0 in 1973 dropping to 1·8 in 1983.

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy when considering the findings of the COMA panel report on sugars relating to the reduction of dental caries to assess the findings of the United States Food and Drugs Administration in 1986, the British Nutrition Foundation in 1987, and the European congress on diet, nutrition and dental caries held in 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The panel on dietary sugars of the committee on medical aspects of food policy (COMA) took account of these, and other, reports in coming to its conclusions. The COMA report is, we believe, the definitive statement on present knowledge of the relationship between dietary sugars and health.

The COMA report on dietary sugars and human disease was published by HMSO on 12 December 1989. Copies are in the Library.

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any official medical report concerning the incidence of dental caries has distinguished between natural sugars and added sugars in terms of their effects on dental health.

Mr. Freeman: The report on dietary sugars and human disease produced by the committee on medical aspects of food policy included the relationship between sugar and dental caries. It distinguished between sugars naturally integrated into the cellular structure of a food (intrinsic) from those, whether natural or added, which are free in the food (extrinsic).

It argued that this distinction was more logical and comprehensive than distinctions such as that between "added" and "natural" sugars. It noted (para. 2.6) that "this difference in physical location influenced [the sugars] availability for bacterial metabolism in the mouth . . . ."

and concluded that

"if the prevalence of dental caries in the UK is to be reduced further it will be necessary to reduce the amount and frequency of consumption of non-milk extrinsic sugars" (para. 6.13).

We are not aware of any other official report which has made a distinction between "natural" and "added" sugars.

Visitors (National Health Service Treatment)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many visitors from overseas were treated by the National Health Service in each year since 1980; and what was the cost.

Mr. Freeman: We do not hold information centrally on the number of overseas visitors treated by the National Health Service or the cost of their treatment. Such visitors are normally charged for hospital treatment unless they are from a country with which we have a reciprocal agreement.

Health Authorities, Yorkshire

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is hospital expenditure per head for each of the regional health authorities in Yorkshire and Humberside for each of the last 10 years;

(2) if he will give the figures for hospital expenditure per head of population for each Yorkshire and Humberside health authority for each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: Figures of revenue expenditure per head of population on hospital services (HS) and on hospital and community health services (HCHS) for the district health authorities providing health services in Yorkshire and Humberside are shown in the table for the years since the establishment of those authorities on 1 April 1982. I should point out that the table includes all the district health authorities comprising the Yorkshire health region with the addition of Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham and Sheffield health authorities which form part of the Trent health region.

Sources:

(a) Annual accounts of the named health authorities.

(b) Mid-year estimates of resident populations 1982 to 1988 (Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys).

Notes:

1. Hospital and community health services (HCHS) covers total expenditure including that on hospital, community health and where applicable patient transport (i.e. ambulance), blood transfusion and other services. District capital expenditure and expenditure on family practitioner services is excluded.
2. The table also excludes all revenue and capital expenditure incurred by the Yorkshire and Trent regional health authorities on behalf of their regions as a whole. Such revenue expenditure on health and community health services was equivalent to about £7 and £14 per head for the Yorkshire and Trent regions respectively in 1988-89.
3. Significant variations in expenditure figures per head of population at district level arise principally because:
   (i) people travel across district boundaries for treatment and sub-regional resource allocations reflect the pattern of service provision locally;
   (ii) the population figures used make no allowance for people resident in one district who receive treatment in another or for the differences in morbidity and age/sex structure of particular populations.

Self-governing Hospital Trusts

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the amount of money allocated for assisting self-governing hospital trusts for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The total available in 1990-91 for NHS review-related initiatives is just over £300 million. So far no resources have been allocated to regions specifically for work on NHS trusts.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of the last 10 years (a) the gross sum for expenditure on the personal social services in England assumed in the rate support grant settlement and (b) the actual outturn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The table sets out details of the provision in the rate support grant settlement and actual expenditure on the personal social services in England for the period 1981-82 to 1989-90. Comparable figures for the rate support grant provision are not readily available for earlier years. The outturn figure for 1989-90 is based on local authority budget estimates.

£ million

	Provision	Outturn
1981-82	1,551	1,616
1982-83	1,857	1,967
1983-84	2,017	2,132
1984-85	2,156	2,271
1985-86	2,328	2,361
1986-87	2,521	2,628
1987-88	2,843	2,964
1988-89	3,031	3,264
1989-90	3,336	3,603

It is of course the responsibility of each local authority to determine its own spending priorities, in the light of legislative requirements and of its own knowledge of local needs, within the overall resources available.

Hepatitis B

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health authorities actively offer vaccination against hepatitis B for those identified as belonging to high risk groups.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to include refuse collectors among the high risk groups for whom vaccination against the hepatitis B virus is recommended.

Mr. Freeman: It is not our intention to do so.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice his Department has issued to sexually transmitted diseases clinics regarding vaccination of patients and staff against the hepatitis B virus.

Mr. Freeman: The Department has issued the following advice on hepatitis B vaccination to health authorities whose responsibilities include genito-urinary medicine clinics:

(i) Chief Medical Officer's letter 1982—CMO(82)13;
(ii) Executive letter 1988—EL(88)P/125.

Advice on hepatitis B and other vaccinations is also contained in the memorandum "Immunisation against Infectious Disease" which is prepared for the health departments by the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation (JCVI). It is issued free to all doctors, including consultants in charge of GUM clinics.

The Health Education Authority publishes a booklet "Guide to A Healthy Sex Life" which includes information on hepatitis B vaccination. The authority is reviewing this and other publications on sexually transmitted diseases.

Copies of all these documents are available in the Library.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with organisations representing medical staff regarding the risks of contracting the hepatitis B virus and the availability of vaccination.

Mr. Freeman: No such discussions have been held.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the number of drug addicts who have been vaccinated against the hepatitis B virus.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the prevalence of the practice of offering the hepatitis B vaccine after an incident in which the patient may have contracted the virus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Reports on needlestick or other injuries where hepatitis immunoglobulin has been given are collated by the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre. The reports for 1989 (provisional data) show that hepatitis B vaccination was recommended in 62 per cent., not recommended in 11 per cent. and in 27 per cent. this information was not recorded on the reporting form.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has regarding incidents in which refuse collectors have been tested for infection by the hepatitis B virus after being wounded by discarded needles in refuse.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ensure that drug addicts dispose of used needles in a safe manner.

Mr. Freeman: The Department of Health has made over £14 million available to health authorities in 1989-90 to enable drug services to expand and develop in such a way as to make contact with more drug misusers in order to offer help and advice on safer behaviour.

Money from this allocation is used to fund exchange schemes, which encourage drug misusers to return their used equipment when obtaining sterile needles and syringes. There are about 120 such schemes in England.

In addition, we are monitoring arrangements in Scotland whereby drug misusers are provided with personal sharps containers for the return of used equipment to a safe disposal facility. Some English drug services are also issuing personal containers. We know of some other experimental disposal facilities such as "hole in the wall" sharps boxes, deliberately located in areas where needles and syringes are discarded.

Cardiothoracic Surgery

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to provide a substantive reply to the question tabled by the hon. Member for Fylde for priority written answer on 6 March about specialist units carrying out cardiothoracic surgery.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I gave my hon. Friend a substantive reply to his question on 16 March 1990.

Prescribing Analyses and Costs

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) why there has been no dispensing information level 1 from PACT since September 1989;

(2) why there has been no prescribing information level 1 from PACT since September 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Level 1 PACT reports are issued on a quarterly cycle to all prescribing and dispensing general practitioners. Reports have been issued on time since September 1989 to all FPCs and GPs.

Drug Costs

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those drugs which on an average doctor's prescription cost less than the prescription charge.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A list setting out those preparations which had an average net ingredient cost per prescription of less than the prescription charge in 1988 —the latest year for which figures are available—has been placed in the Library. The list shows preparations in an abbreviated form, but has an explanatory list of abbreviations attached. It is possible to produce a list containing the full names of preparations only at disproportionate cost.

The list contains 2,323 preparations—less than one third of the 7,124 different preparations dispensed by pharmacies and appliance contractors in that year. The net ingredient cost does not represent the full cost to the NHS of dispensing a prescription, this being made up, when prescriptions are dispensed by pharmacies, of the net ingredient cost, less discount, plus dispensing fees, on-cost and container allowance. Because of the extensive exemption arrangements, over 75 per cent. of prescriptions are dispensed free.

Road Accidents

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost to the National Health Service, for the latest year for which figures are available, of all road accidents.

Mr. Freeman: Data on the actual cost to the National Health Service in England of road accidents is not collected by the Department. However, the Department of Transport has estimated the medical and ambulance costs associated with the treatment of road accident victims in Great Britain at around £160 million in 1988.

Newton Lodge Secure Unit

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether, in view of the absconding of a patient on the evening of 11 March from the Newton Lodge secure unit, he will initiate an inquiry into security at Newton Lodge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: This is a local matter for the health authority concerned. I have written to Sir Bryan Askew, chairman of Yorkshire regional health authority, to alert him that the hon. Member may contact him.

Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prosecutions have been undertaken under the Surrogacy Arrangements Act for negotiating commercial arrangements contrary to section 2.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what records and information he has of the surrogacy arrangements reached between interested parties.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Her Majesty's Government propose any amending legislation to the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985; and whether he is prepared to put into regulations the ethical guidelines issued by the British Medical Association.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill currently before Parliament contains an amendment to the Surrogacy (Arrangements) Act 1985 to make surrogacy contracts unenforceable, an issue referred to in the ethical guidelines recently issued by the British Medical Association. Matters of this kind are generally best left to codes of practice such as that which clause 25 of the Bill will require the new authority to prepare.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies he has commissioned into the relative energy conservation merits of (a) pre-world war one, (b) inter-war, (c) post-war and (d) new hospital buildings; what further studies he will commission into this subject; and if he will publish any available information or figures.

Mr. Freeman: The monitoring of energy efficiency in NHS hospitals in England and Wales is a continuous process. The data produced by the NHS does not distinguish between the variety of buildings within the estate.

Studies in England have majored on the development of low energy hospital buildings with the object of minimising energy consumption. The results of these studies are being used to promote energy efficiency in all new buildings and where appropriate in existing buildings. In 1985 the Welsh Office assumed responsibility for energy matters in Wales.

Dentists

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement outlining the guarantees which dentists are required to provide to patients on National Health Service work; and if he will further state any conclusions from these responsibilities in respect of dentures.

Mr. Freeman: If after investigation by its dental services committee a family practitioner committee considers that a dentist has acted in breach of his terms of service, it may recommend the recovery from the dentist of any expenses reasonably and necessarily incurred by the patient as a result of the dentist's failure, and pay such sum to the patient.

Any complaint relating solely to the fit and efficiency of a denture may be considered by a denture conciliation committee set up by the FPC. This committee may eventually recommend that the contribution made by the patient to the cost of the denture should be repaid, either wholly or in part, where expenses have been incurred in obtaining dentures from another dentist.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had recently with the British Dental Association and the Dental Laboratories Association in relation to dentures and denturism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We have not had any recent discussions with the British Dental Association or the Dental Laboratories Association about the provision of dentures or denturism, nor have we been requested to do so.

Junior Hospital Doctors

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what currently are the hours of work of junior hospital doctors in each regional health authority area in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information is not readily available in the form requested and I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 8 February at column 770. I shall be meeting representatives of the Joint Consultants Committee, the British Medical Association and NHS management before Easter to consider how to take this important issue forward.

Neuroblastoma

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, Official Report, 12 December 1989, column 631, what is his estimate of the cost of producing the requested information on the number of deaths from neuroblastoma.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Approximately £1,600. National mortality statistics do not routinely identify neuroblastoma as a cause of death, and this figure represents the estimated staff cost of identifying and extracting this information from the death certificates of all children who have died from cancer.

DHA Chairmen

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library for each chairman of each district health authority, including new appointments, the curriculum vitae and relevant qualifications submitted in relation to their appointment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 15 March 1990]: District health authority chairmen are appointed on the basis of their personal qualities and experience. We do not look for any specific qualifications. We look for people of ability with the knowledge and drive to provide leadership to the officers of their authority. They must also hold a deep commitment to the NHS. The chairmen's curricula vitae are submitted to us in confidence.

ENVIRONMENT

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated value of the work the Property Services Agency and the Ministry of Defence have guaranteed to award TCS over the next three years.

Mr. Chope: Neither Department has given any guarantees to the Crown Suppliers in relation to future purchases from it of supplies, although PSA is discussing with the Crown Suppliers a commercial agreement which would involve PSA undertaking to buy routine furniture and furnishings for PSA's own offices subject to the requirements of the EC and GATT rules and to PSA's continuing satisfaction on service and prices. The estimated value of such an undertaking is estimated to be £1 million in each of the years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93. The Ministry of Defence's plans are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the Property Services Agency and the Ministry of Defence were asked to guarantee TCS work.

Mr. Chope: The Property Services Agency and the Ministry of Defence were not asked to guarantee TCS work. They are each discussing commercial agreements with the Crown Suppliers because agreements were considered likely to be to the mutual advantage of the parties involved.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the expenditure of the Dorset county council and Bournemouth borough council for 1989-90 and 1990-91; what the domestic rate poundage and average rate for the Bournemouth ratepayer was for 1989-90 and what it would have been for 1990-91; what the community charge for Bournemouth would have been for 1989-90 and what it is for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement on the outcome taking account of the revenue support grant for both authorities.

Mr. Chope: Paragraphs 3.1(i) to (v) of the Revenue Support Grant Transition Report (England) explain the calculation made of the amount of income received by each local authority in 1989-90 comparable with 1990-91 levels. The calculation produces a 1989-90 income of £257·3 million for Dorset county council and £15·6 million for Bournemouth borough council.

In 1989-90 the average domestic rate poundage in Bournemouth was 219·5p, producing an average domestic rate bill—before any allowance for rebates—of £480.

Illustrative 1989-90 community charges were published in July 1989 and showed a figure of £234 in Bournemouth, after taking account of the transitional arrangements.

Information for 1990-91 based on returns received from local authorities will be placed in the Library shortly.

It is our intention, when community charges are finally set, to say what the increase would have been in domestic rates had that taken the place of the community charge.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will set out a table showing for Hertfordshire county council (a) the budget for net expenditure for 1989-90, (b) the budget for net expenditure for 1990-91, (c) the increase in net expenditure between 1989-90 and 1990-91, (d) the net addition to balances budgeted for 1990-91 and (e) the percentage rate increase that would have occurred had the domestic rating system still been in place and no change in domestic rateable value occurred;

(2) whether he will set out a table showing (1) for Durham county council and (2) for Darlington borough council (a) the budget for net expenditure for 1989-90, (b) the budget for net expenditure for 1990-91, (c) the increase in net expenditure between 1989-90 and 1990-91, (d) the net addition to balances budgeted for 1990-91 and (e) the percentage rate increase that would have occurred had the domestic rating system still been in place and no change in domestic rateable value occurred;

Mr. Chope: Net current expenditure in 1989-90 for these authorities is as follows:

Net current expenditure 1989-90

	£ million
Hertfordshire county council	498·786
Durham county council	313·538
Darlington borough council	8·847

Budgeted net current expenditure and budgeted net additions to balances in 1990-91 are not yet available. It is our intention when community charges are finally set to say what the increases would have been if domestic rates had taken the place of the community charge.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Lancashire the estimated percentage of the adult population, including spouses, now paying rates, the percentage expected to be chargeable to the poll tax and the number expected to contribute the same as or less than at present.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the replacement of the community charge with a system of raising local government finance based on a local income tax.

Mr. Chope: I continue to receive representations on a wide range of issues relating to the abolition of domestic rates.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the 10 London boroughs with the largest per capita overspend against his Department's standard spending assessment; and if he will indicate that overspend;

(2) if he will list the 10 metropolitan boroughs with the largest per capita overspending against his Department's standard spending assessment; and if he will indicate that overspend;

(3) if he will list the 10 shire counties with the largest per capita overspend against his Department's standard spending assessment; and if he will indicate that overspend.

Mr. Chope: I intend to place a summary of the information returned from local authorities in the Library of the House after information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each district authority of Humberside (a) the safety net figure, (b) the low rateable value allowance, (c) the increase or decrease of standard spending assessment and grant-related expenditure and (d) the loss or gain from unified business rate, all on a per capita basis.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is shown in the following table:

	Safety net receipt (a)	Low rateable values area grant (b)	Cash change GRE to SSA (c)	Business rate income (d)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each district authority the amount taken out of reserves by that authority and, where relevant, the county authority and per capita effect on the poll tax in that authority area.

Mr. Chope: I intend to place a summary of the information returned from local authorities in the Library of the House after information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the estimated total amount of local government spending per head (a) for 1989-90 and (b) 1990-91 for each of the counties of Somerset, Devon and Dorset, each of the London boroughs of Lambeth, Camden, Islington, Wandsworth and Westminster and each of the metropolitan boroughs of Birmingham, Bradford, Manchester and Sheffield.

Mr. Chope: Following is the available information. I intend to place a summary of the information on 1990-91 budgets in the Library of the House when information has been received from all authorities.

[1] Using Office of Population Censuses and Surveys mid-year estimates of total population to derive per capita values.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he anticipates informing local authorities of his definition of mentally impaired for the purposes of community charge rebates.

Mr. Chope: People who are severely mentally impaired are exempt from the personal community charge providing they are in receipt of one of a number of qualifying benefits and a certificate from a registered medical practitioner, stating that for the purposes of the community charge they are severely mentally impaired.

The Personal Community Charge (Exemption for the Severely Mentally Impaired) Order 1990 was made on 6 March. The order amends the qualifying benefits and the definition of severely mentally impaired, in order to bring in such people as those suffering from Alzheimer's disease and senile dementia. Copies have been sent to charging authorities and placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

People who are exempt from the personal community charge do not need to claim community charge benefit.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department expects to inform local authorities which 19-year-olds are on appropriately defined full-time courses for the purposes of entitlement to community charge rebates.

Mr. Chope: My Department wrote to all charging authorities on 16 November 1989 explaining the range of courses it intends to define in regulations, for the purposes of extending exemption from the personal community charge to certain people under the age of 20 who are in full-time further but not higher education. A copy of the letter is in the Library of the House of Commons. Regulations will come into force by 1 April 1990.

People who are exempt from the personal community charge do not need to claim community charge benefit.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of (a) the national sum to be collected from ministers of religion and their immediate families in respect of the community charge and (b) by how much this is likely to differ from receipts by local authorities from rating demands on them or on church bodies responsible for their accommodation.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each district authority in England (a) the increase or decrease in Government assessment of spending levels, standard spending assessment against grant-related expenditure, for that authority and each authority contributing to the poll tax total, (b) his estimate of the number of households qualifying for transitional relief and (c) the safety net figure for that authority.

Mr. Chope: I have today placed in the Library a table showing the available information. In calculating the change between adjusted grant-related expenditure and standard spending assessment at column (a), the grant-related expenditures and standard spending assessments of precepting authorities have been allocated between their constituent authorities in proportion to relevant population. I have no estimates of numbers qualifying for transitional relief in individual authorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assumptions he made in setting his estimate of the community charge about the size of the standard charge for second homes.

Mr. Chope: In calculating the community charge for standard spending of £278, my right hon. Friend has made no assumption about the standard charge.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, with reference to paragraph 3.29 of his Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England), what effect the choice of the figure of (a) £7·11 and (b) £1·37 has on (i) the level of the standard spending assessment for Humberside and (ii) his estimate of the level of poll tax for Great Grimsby.

Mr. Chope: The figures referred to in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) contributed (a) £9 and (b) £5 per relevant adult to the standard spending assessment for Humberside. On (ii) I propose to place in the Library of the House a summary of the information returned on community charges for individual authorities, when this information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, with reference to paragraph 3.32 of his Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England), what effect the choice of the figure of (a) £1,928·93 and (b) £13·05 has on (i) the level of the standard spending assessment for Humberside and (ii) his estimate of the level of poll tax for Great Grimsby.

Mr. Chope: The figures referred to in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) contributed (a) £28 and (b) £2 per relevant adult to the standard spending assessment for Humberside. On (ii) I propose to place in the Library of the House a summary of the information returned on community charges for individual authorities, when this information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the community charge which each county council would have set if it had been required to do so in respect of (a) a budget set according to his Department's guidelines and (b) the actual budget determined; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: County councils do not set community charges. Revenue support grant and business rates are paid into the collection fund in each non-metropolitan area in support of the expenditure by both the county council and the district council. It is not possible to hypothecate these sums to county council or district council spending. As a result it is not possible to calculate hypothetical community charges for county councils.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many people in Coventry would be eligible for transitional protection on a poll tax of £394 per person; and if he will outline the methodology used to calculate the level of relief.

Mr. Chope: I have no information on the number of people in individual local authorities who are eligible for transitional relief. The basis for calculating the level of relief is set out in the practice note, "Community Charge: Transitional Relief Scheme for England". Copies of the practice note were placed in the Library when it was published in December 1989.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision on the arrangements for reimbursing local authorities for the costs of the community charge transitional relief scheme.

Mr. David Hunt: Local authorities will be reimbursed in full for the estimated £810 million which they would forgo in community charge income as a result of abating personal community charges for some 7·5 million charge payers over the next three years. Authorities will also be reimbursed for their reasonable costs incurred in preparing for and administering the scheme.

Following a study of these costs by KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock, management consultants, I announced proposals for these costs on 15 February. Following consultation with the local authority associations, I have decided to make the following arrangements.

Authorities' preparation costs for the scheme, largely for computer software, will be reimbursed in full on the basis of the actual expenditure incurred as confirmed by the authority's auditor. I estimate preparation costs to be about £7 million in total.

The general administrative costs which authorities will incur as a consequence of the scheme, in particular dealing with inquiries, will be reimbursed by a single flat rate payment of 27p per charge payer, with an allowance for higher costs in London. In inner London the rate will be 31p per charge payer and in outer London 30p per charge payer. The administrative costs grant will be about £9·5 million in total.

Applications by elderly or disabled persons for extra relief will be reimbursed at a rate of £3 per application made, which includes both successful and unsuccessful applications. In inner London the rate will be £3·60 and in outer London £3·45. Where an authority issues a second bill, which does not relate to a substitute charge, it will be reimbursed at a rate of 50p per bill for the cost of printing and postage.

The total cost of this package of grant aid is about £21 million. I believe that it fulfils the Government's commitment to meet in full authorities' reasonable costs incurred in preparing for and administering the community charge transitional relief scheme.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much it would cost the Government to exempt all non-employed status YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements from paying the community charge.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the net cost of exempting all non-employed status YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements from paying the poll tax.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answers 15 and 16 March 1990]: The gross cost of exempting all non-employed status YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements would be about £5·6 million. This assumes a total of 15,500 such trainees liable to pay the charge. The information is not available to give a net cost to the Government. Virtually all non-employed trainees, and a proportion of employed trainees, will be entitled to community charge benefit.

Sports Clubs (Rating)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations made to him by cricket clubs and cricket organisations requesting zero rating of cricket clubs for the business rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the position of sports clubs with additional rating relief in relation to the effect of the proposed business rate; and what action he proposes to take in this matter.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from cricket and other sports clubs requesting relief from rating.

Charging authorities have discretion to grant up to 100 per cent. relief to sports clubs and certain other non-profit making organisations. Seventy-five per cent. of the cost of any relief given is borne by the national non-domestic rate pool. We have issued a practice note which gives charging authorities guidance on the criteria which they should take into account in the exercise of their powers.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect the new business rating system will have on the rate bills for sports facilities.

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the effect of the new business rate upon sport and sports clubs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Contrary to the impression given recently in the press, the great majority of sports facilities will attract lower rate bills in real terms as a result of the introduction of the uniform business rate and the non-domestic revaluation.

There are 25,331 properties included in the category of sports grounds, sports stadia, playing fields and club houses in England in the draft rating lists deposited with charging authorities on 20 December. In 1990-91 average rate bills for these, including inflation but before transition, will increase by just 2·5 per cent. This is a fall of about 5 per cent. in real terms.

Certain kinds of facilities, many provided primarily on a commercial basis, will attract larger rises. There are 3,272 properties in the category of golf courses, swimming pools and tennis courts. Average rate bills for these facilities will rise by 20·5 per cent. and those for leisure and sports centres, of which there are 2,015 properties, by 30 per cent., again including inflation but before transition.

These figures take no account of rate relief: local authorities will continue to have discretion to grant up to 100 per cent. rate relief on property occupied by non-profit-making bodies. Seventy five per cent. of the cost of any relief given is borne by the national non-domestic rate pool. We have given authorities guidance on the criteria they should use in considering applications for relief.

Local Authorities (Staffing)

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out a table showing for each year since 1979 (a) the full-time, (b) the part-time and (c) the total staffing levels of local authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Chope: The information for England is listed in the table. For information on local authority staffing levels in Wales, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the totals of staff in post, expressed as full-time equivalents, in each of the past five years to the latest date for which figures are available for Somerset, Devon, Dorset, Hereford and Worcestershire, Kent, Essex, Lincolnshire and Norfolk; and how many there were in each case per head of the population on the latest census estimates.

Mr. Chope: Information on full-time equivalents at individual authority level is not collected centrally, but local authorities are required to make this information available locally.

County Councils (Staffing)

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the total number of staff employed by each county council in 1981-82 and in 1989-90 or the latest year for which figures are available and the percentage change in the number employed between these dates.

Pollution (North Sea)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he authorised a special briefing for the Sunday Express newspaper on the levels and causes of pollution of the North sea in advance of its issue of 4 March.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: With my approval, officials have given general background briefing on the North sea conference to a wide range of journalists.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the contribution of pollution derived from the United Kingdom to the problem of algal blooms in the North sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Eutrophication and algal blooms are a problem only in certain parts of the North sea along the eastern coastal seaboard, particularly in the Skaggerak. It is generally accepted that nutrients present in local run-off from intensive agriculture and discharges of sewage effluent can be a determining factor especially when receiving waters are shallow and slow moving.

Recent studies carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council's Institute of Oceanographic Science show that the United Kingdom does not contribute to this problem as continental seaboard water is kept separate from the rest of the North sea by more saline water flushing through from the English channel.

In addition, inputs of nitrogen, the most important nutrient to the sea from the United Kingdom, have shown no increasing trend in recent years and the IOS study shows that the central North sea, which would be influenced by United Kingdom nutrient inputs, show low levels, even in winter, when other areas have high levels.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline his Department's responsibilities in respect of the North sea.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 15 March 1990]: The Department has overall responsibility for co-ordinating the Government's policy input to the series of North sea conferences as well as housing the United Kingdom's North sea scientific task force co-ordinator who manages our scientific input into international work in preparing a fully updated quality status report for the North sea. This reflects the Department's general co-ordinating interest in respect of marine environmental matters, including those which lie within the responsibility of other Departments.

In addition, the Department also has specific policy responsibility for the water sewage industry, for bathing waters and for control of waste discharges by pipelines to rivers and coastal waters.

West Country Councils

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was (a) the total spending and (b) the total amount of Government grant in Somerset, Devon and Dorset county councils in each of the past four years; what was the total amount raised in non-domestic rates in those years for each county; and what are his estimates of (i) spending, (ii) the total of Government grant and (iii) redistribution from the national business rate for each in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: The available information is given in the table. Revenue support grant and receipts from the national non-domestic rate pool are not paid to county councils.

	Net current expenditure £ million	Revenue grants[1] £ million	Non-domestic rates[2] £ million

Capital Finance Regulations

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider extending the list entitled "New Land or Building used for the Same Purposes in Schedule 2 of the draft Capital Finance Regulations" to include dwellings with particular reference to dwellings which need to be disposed of to facilitate a commercial redevelopment.

Mr. Chope: No.

Community Charge

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about community charge capping.

Mr. Chope: The Department has received many representations about capping from hon. Members, local authorities and from the public, the vast majority of which have been to urge us to use our capping powers next year.

Red List

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the dangerous chemicals and substances currently on his Department's red list.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following dangerous substances are currently on the red list:

Mercury and its compounds
Cadmium and its compounds
Gamma-Hexachlorocyclohexane
DDT
Pentachlorophenol
Hexachlorobenzene
Hexachlorobutadiene
Aldrin
Dieldrin
Endrin
Polychlorinated Biphenyls
Dichlorvos
1, 2-Dichloroethane

Trichlorobenzene
Atrazine
Simazine
Tributyltin compounds
Triphenyltin compounds
Trifluralin
Fenitrothion
Azinphos-methyl
Malathion
Endosulfan

Radiation (Cumbria)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the environmental consequences in terms of spots of high radiation in Cumbria arising from the uranium fire in B/30 decanners in the 1970s.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The incident and its consequences are described by the National Radiological Protection Board in its report on "The Risks of Leukaemia and Other Cancers in Seascale from Radiation Exposure" (NRPB —171) prepared at the request of Sir Douglas Black's independent advisory group. I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Westminster City Council

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what way Westminster city council's role in funding the English National Opera and English National Ballet is reflected in its revenue support grant and uniform business rate funding in 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The revenue support grant and NNDR entitlements for 1990-91 for Westminster city council have been calculated on the same basis for all other charging authorities. The fact that they fund these two organisations has no bearing.

Mortgaged Property

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to review the rights and obligations of mortgage lenders and borrowers in respect of renting out mortgaged property.

Mr. Chope: No. Arrangements for the letting of mortgaged property are essentially a matter for agreement between lender and borrower.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has plans to bring forward legislation to prevent people from being evicted if they rent houses from others who fail to meet mortgage commitments.

Mr. Chope: No.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the likely impact of the privatisation of the activities of the Property Services Agency on its staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The terms and conditions of service of staff will be protected. Privatisation will not itself affect the number of staff required, and future staff numbers will depend on the success of the company in competition.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will detail the measures being taken to ensure the commercial viability of those activities in which the Property Services Agency is currently involved and which it is the intention of the Property Services Agency Bill to privatise, prior to their privatisation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether any proof of commercial viability is required as a prerequisite to privatisation of the activities of the Property Services Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Departments will be untied from PSA from 1 April 1990. PSA will provide its services in competition with the private sector, and its future success will depend on the work which it wins. When PSA is privatised, any buyer will have satisfied himself that the company has a viable future.

Land Registers (Pollution)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to ensure that local authorities compile comprehensive registers of land contaminated with toxic wastes and polluting chemicals.

Mr. Trippier: I shall shortly have before me a departmental working party report on the feasibility of establishing registers of contaminated land. My assessment of that report will include consideration of any matters that might require legislation.

Lake Baikal

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, following the experience gained in the United Kingdom with the Red List of chemicals developed for pollution control, he has any plans to offer assistance to the Soviet Union in cleaning up Lake Baikal.

Mr. Trippier: The Government share the international concern about the state of Lake Baikal and are well aware of USSR thinking on plans for tackling the problem. A representative from Her Majesty's Government will be attending a meeting in Irkutzk organised by the USSR authorities starting on 5 April. We will be studying the report of that meeting very carefully.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new measures he has taken recently to encourage the safe disposal of chlorofluorocarbons and their containers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside recently visited ICI in Runcorn to launch its nationwide network to recycle the chlorofluorocarbon from the refrigerant in domestic refrigerators.

K factor

Mrs. Anne Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assumptions about infrastructure charges were made for the purposes of setting the K factor for the water and sewerage undertakers.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and Secretary of State for Wales determined Ks for the 10 water and sewerage undertakers on the assumption that infrastructure charges would be payable on all new connections for domestic purposes in accordance with the limits set by the Secretary of State. The infrastructure charge limits for the 10 companies are as follows:

Water services companies: water and sewerage infrastructure charges (at 1990-91 prices)

	Water £	Sewerage £
Anglian Water Services Limited	479	597
Southern Water Services Limited	365	485
Thames Water Utilities Limited	403	337
Yorkshire Water Services Limited	529	626
Northumbrian Water Limited	111	240
North West Water Limited	198	338
Severn Trent Water Limited	498	356
South West Water Services Limited	654	557
Dwr Cymru Cyfyngedig	259	332
Wessex Water Services Limited	551	983

Bristol Channel (Sewage Discharge)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permits for the discharge of new or part-treated sewage into the Bristol channel he has authorised; how long these permits last; and if he has any plans to renew them.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is for the National Rivers Authority to issue consents for the discharge of sewage to the Bristol channel. Details of consents are held on the NRA register established by section 117 of the Water Act 1989.

Local Authority Employees (Pension Rights)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish guidelines governing the treatment of former periods of part-time service in assessing the pension rights of local authority employees.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is expected that draft regulations on this subject will be published for consultation in the next few weeks with the object of making regulations by the summer. The regulations will be retrospective in effect.

Local Authorities (Company Interests)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress his Department has made in preparing for the implementation of part V of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (Local Authority Interests in Companies).

Mr. David Hunt: My Department is today sending to the local authority associations a draft of an order under part IV and an extract of a draft order under part V of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 which deal with the application to companies in which the local authority has an interest of the new capital finance system for local authorities.

These drafts make it clear that the new system of regulation of local authority interests in companies will apply from 1 July 1990, rather than from 1 April 1990 as earlier envisaged.

A draft of the remainder of the order under part V and of the directions for exemption and approval under that part will be sent to the local authority associations for comment shortly.

Estuaries

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies his Department has commissioned into the environmental effects of constructing barrages in English and Welsh estuaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Studies on the environmental effects of constructing barrages in English and Welsh estuaries are being undertaken as part of a wide-ranging programme of research and development related to the proposals for barrages on the Mersey and Severn in England and Cardiff bay and Conwy in Wales. This work is funded by the Government, the electricity industry and the barrage promoters. The Nature Conservancy Council has also undertaken relevant work and my Department is kept informed on the progress of these environmental impact studies.

Eutrophication

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each year since 1987, all the monitoring controls for eutrophication carried out on the coasts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 13 March 1990]: As a consequence of the second North sea conference in London in November 1987, the Department of the Environment and the Scottish Development Department wrote to water authorities in England and Wales and river purification boards in Scotland to establish if evidence of eutrophication could be found in coastal waters. Similar surveys were made by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland. These surveys have shown that evidence of eutrophication is confined to a handful of small, localised inshore locations.

For this reason no regular and formal monitoring of eutrophication—algal blooms—is conducted or planned in the United Kingdom. Attention instead is being focused on trends in nutrients levels in coastal waters and detailed examination of fluxes of nutrients through estuaries. A regular monitoring programme is maintained by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food along the eastern coast of the United Kingdom for paralytic shellfish poisoning in mussels. This is caused by blooms of certain algal species which produce natural toxins. The occurrence of paralytic shellfish poisoning on this coastline has a long but intermittent history and is not believed to be linked to eutrophication.

Caravan Sites Act

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has now received all outstanding views following consultation relating to the application from Bradford council for designation under the Caravan Sites Act 1968; when he expects to reach a decision on the application; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 15 March 1990]: I have now received the views of all bodies consulted as part of Bradford's application for designation and it is my intention to announce my decision very soon.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current and projected carbon dioxide emissions for the United Kingdom, broken down by fuel source, in the sectors (a) industrial, (b) commercial, (c) public sector, (d) residential, (e) transport and (f) other.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 15 March 1990]: Emissions of carbon dioxide by the sectors requested and by fuel type for 1987 are given in the table below. Estimates of carbon dioxide in the future will depend on a large number of factors which are difficult to predict. Forecasting models are being developed by Warren Spring laboratory on DOE's behalf, but no data are yet available.

Genetically Engineered Organisms

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the impact on the environment of releases of genetically engineered organisms in other countries.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 15 March 1990]: Information on such releases is available via the European Communities, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the United Nations environment programme, and other international fora in which the United Kingdom participates. This information is monitored on a regular basis and has been taken fully into account in developing proposals for the control of the release of genetically modified organisms in this country.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had in respect of the plans announced in the Environmental Protection Bill to regulate genetically modified organisms.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 15 March 1990]: A wide range of representations were received in response to the consultation paper on the matters which form part VI of the Bill—genetically modified organisms; hon. Members have made various representations in the course of debates on the Bill; and my Department has continued to benefit from the views of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last discussed the regulation of genetically engineered organisms with his European Community counterparts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 15 March 1990]: My Department has participated fully in discussions on the Council directives on the deliberate release to the environment of genetically modified organisms and the contained use of genetically modified micro-organisms, most recently at the Environment Council on 19 September 1989, at which a political agreement was reached on the deliberate release directive.

Standard Spending Assessment

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library the indicator values used in the calculation of standard spending assessment for 1990-91 for all shire counties in England and Wales.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 16 March 1990]: I have placed in the Library today a set of tables giving the required information for English shire counties. The equivalent information for the shire counties in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to produce a green book on standard spending assessment similar to that for grant-related expenditure assessment.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 16 March 1990]: My right hon. Friend has made no decision yet on this matter. He intends to seek the views of local authority representatives shortly.

Bankside Power Station

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the archaeological significance of the site of Bankside power station.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Discoveries made during the construction of the power station comprised pockets of Tudor debris as well as evidence of leather manufacturing but no finds of significance.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether Bankside power station is a listed building.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 16 March 1990]: No.

Covent Garden

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the possible archaeological significance of works in Covent Garden proposed by the Royal Opera House.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 16 March 1990]: None.

Rugby League (Taylor Report)

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to meet representatives of the Rugby League to discuss the Taylor report.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

We shall be writing to the Rugby League shortly inviting it to discuss the implications of Lord Justice Taylor's recommendations, including those on providing all-seated accommodation at rugby league grounds. We shall also be inviting representatives of other sports to similar discussions.

Hooliganism

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on the policies which he intends to implement regarding football hooliganism and related issues.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The Government are vigorously supporting the police in their operations against football hooliganism. We are developing the full potential of the newly formed national football intelligence unit to enable the police to target more effectively their resources on hooligan ringleaders. We are encouraging the enhancement of optical evidence-gathering systems at football grounds in this country and the training of their operators.

British police have been and will remain in close liaison with the Italian authorities on policing supporters from this country during the World cup in Italy in June and July. Currently about 60 carabinieri are visiting the Police Staff college and local forces to familiarise themselves with the policing of British football supporters.

Part II of the Football Spectators Act 1989 will be implemented shortly. This will enable courts to impose restriction orders on those convicted of football hooliganism to prevent them from travelling to key matches abroad.

In his final report on the Hillsborough inquiry Lord Justice Taylor recommended the creation of some new offences specific to behaviour at football grounds, and recommended that consideration be given to applying attendance centre orders and electronic tagging to convicted football hooligans. The Government are considering these matters urgently and sympathetically.

TRANSPORT

Lighthouse Dues

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Ports Authority is to publish its report on lighthouse dues for yachts; and what representations he has received on the matter.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand the British Ports Federation report will be ready shortly. My right hon. Friend expects to invite views on the report from interested parties before reaching any conclusions.

Network SouthEast

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the Central Transport Consultative Committee: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend is meeting the Central Transport Consultative Committee on 26 March. It was a pity that the report on Network SouthEast did not highlight that British Rail's plans are for an increase in train miles to be operated.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Central Transport Consultative Committee concerning overcrowding on Network SouthEast services.

Mr. Portillo: I have received its recent report on BR's 1990 corporate plan.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the current investment projects in Network SouthEast which have been approved by his Department.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport calls in for approval only a selection of projects costing over £10 million. The remainder are authorised by the board. In the last two years, the Government have approved the following major investment projects for Network SouthEast:

Portsmouth to Southampton electrification
324 class 319/321 electrical multiple unit vehicles
(for services north of the Thames and Thameslink)

Cambridge to King's Lynn electrification
180 class 165 Networker vehicles
(for Thames and Chiltern lines)

400 class 465 Networker vehicles
(a further 276 approved in principle)
(for Kent and inner surburban lines)

Bradford Trolleybus Project

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to consider what assistance he can give to the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority to secure the Bradford trolleybus project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: We have already allocated credit approvals to enable the passenger transport authority to invest in this project, and will consider any further proposals which are put to us on their merits and subject to the availability of resources.

Foreign Railway Systems

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the foreign railway systems on which he has travelled in his official capacity since assuming his present position.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State travelled on the Washington metro in January. I have travelled on the French train à grande vitesse.

Prestwick

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), of 6 March, Official Report, columns 550-51, what indications he has received from the BAA about keeping open the passenger terminal at Prestwick airport.

Mr. McLoughlin: In its response to my Department's consultation document on Scottish lowland airports policy, BAA plc stated its firm intention to keep Prestwick open. Following my right hon. Friend's announcement of a less restrictive policy for the lowland airports, the BAA chairman said that appropriate terminal and passenger facilities would be provided at Prestwick to meet the demands of the airlines.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), of 6 March, Official Report, columns 550-51, whether Prestwick airport will be maintained as a diversion airport beyond 1991.

Mr. McLoughlin: BAA plc has stated its firm intention of keeping Prestwick open. The level of rescue and fire services provided at the airport, which is dictated by the size of aircraft normally using it, will determine its availability to aircraft on diversion.

London Underground

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many incidents have been reported of tube doors opening between stations on each line on the London underground for each of the last 12 months; and what measures exist to prevent this happening;

(2) how many incidents have been reported of tube doors opening on the wrong side of the platform on each line on the London underground for each of the last 12 months; and what measures exist to prevent this from happening.

Mr. Portillo [pursuant to his reply, 23 February, Official Report, column 931]: Railway accidents, and some incidents involving failure of railway works and equipment, are reported to the railway inspectorate within the terms of the Railways (Notice of Accidents) Order 1986. In the case of unintentional door openings, London Underground Ltd (LUL) is required by the order to report cases where any door irregularity results in death or injury. It must also report instances of electrical or mechanical failure which are likely to cause an accident or to kill or injure any person. LUL is not required to report occasions where doors are opened due to staff error and do not result in fatality or injury.

In 1989 LUL reported the one incident referred to in my previous answer because it involved malicious damage. LUL did not consider that any other incident was covered by the requirement to notify the Department but I now understand that there were 32 other other instances when the doors of underground trains opened either on the wrong side or when the train was in motion.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many ET training agents, ET training managers and YTS managing agents have (a) had their contracts terminated and (b) gone into receivership for each year since 1987 and in the case of ET, since the programme started.

Mr. Nicholls: The information for ET is given in the following table:

Year	Training agents		Training managers
	Contracts Terminated	Providers in Receivership	Contracts Terminated	Providers in Receivership
1988	None	None	None	None

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the value of development funding awarded to TECs in England and Wales and LECs in Scotland (a) in total and (b) by each TEC/LEC.

Mr. Eggar: To date, a total of £6·973 million in development funding has been awarded to TECs in England and Wales and to LECs in Scotland. A breakdown by TEC/LEC is given in the table. TECS in their development stage whose funding has not yet been confirmed are not included.

YTS

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the weekly public cost of each YTS trainee in 1989-90; and what it will be in 1992-93.

Mr. Nicholls: The average cost to the Exchequer of YTS in 1989-90 is expected to be £50 per trainee week. New arrangements for youth training will be introduced from 29 May and youth training will increasingly be delivered by training and enterprise councils. As the result of the funding flexibilities which training and enterprise councils will have for youth training, it will be possible to secure higher levels of employer contributions towards training costs than has been the case under YTS. Consequently, by 1992-93, the average cost to the Exchequer of youth training is expected to be £33 per week.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many participants there are in YTS schemes and employment training in the Peterlee and Seaham areas.

Mr. Nicholls: There were 846 people on the youth training scheme at the end of January and 600 on employment training at the beginning of March in the Peterlee and Seaham areas.

Mining Inspectors

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present complement of coal mines inspectors; and if he has any proposals to increase the number of mines inspectors.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive's mines inspectorate inspects all mining operations, including coal mines. On 1 March 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 48 mines inspectors in HSE. The executive has no plans to increase this number.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the change in the number of unemployed males and females over the age of 50 years in the Seaham and Peterlee areas over the last five years.

Mr. Nicholls: The information in the table is also available in the Library.

Unemployed claimants aged 50 years and over—Unadjusted[1]

	Seaham		Peterlee
	Male	Female	Male	Female
January
1985	391	91	555	101
1990	207	55	147	53
Change	−184	−36	−408	−48

[1] Direct comparisons are affected by the changes to the unemployment count over the period.

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed in the Lancashire, West parliamentary constituency in March 1986, March 1987, March 1988, March 1989 and March 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Information about employment in parliamentary constituencies is available only from the census of employment. The most recent figures are for September 1987. There were then 31,000 employees in employment in the Lancashire, West constituency. This compares with a figure of 30,400 in September 1984 when the previous census of employment was taken. These figures exclude the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's forces.

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were unemployed in the parliamentary constituency of Lancashire, West in March 1986, March 1987, March 1988, March 1989 and March 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is available from the Library. March 1990 figures are not available until April. Between March 1986 and February 1990 the number of unemployed claimants fell by 2,932, or 40·6 per cent., in Lancashire, West parliamentary constituency. The table gives the remaining information requested. The figures are affected by seasonal influences as well as by changes to the count over the period.

Unadjusted unemployment in Lancashire, West parliamentary constituency for March of each year

Year	Total
1986	7,225
1987	6,882
1988	5,565
1989	4,293

Earnings

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the proportion of female and male part-time workers in the south-west and in Avon, respectively, whose hourly earnings, exclusive of overtime, fell below (a) £2·80, (b) £3·00, (c) £3·20, (d) £3·60, (e) £4·00 and (f) £4·50 in April 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: The estimated percentages of part-time adult female employees earning below specified amounts in the new earnings survey sample in April 1989 were:

Hourly earnings less than (£)	Avon (per cent.)	South West (per cent.)
2·80	41	44
3·00	48	53
3·20	57	61
3·60	68	73
4·00	78	80
4·50	86	86

Note:
Hourly earnings excluding overtime, earnings not affected by absence.

Equivalent figures for part-time males are not available.

Job Clubs

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give details of the location of existing job clubs available for people living in the Stretford constituency; and if he will make a statement on the future of these clubs.

Mr. Eggar: There are currently two job clubs in Stretford. A number in other parts of Manchester are within easy travelling distance.

There are no plans to change the number of job clubs in Stretford, although the location of one of the clubs will change.

Welding and Fabrication Work

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on proposed changes to British standards and European Community regulations governing welding and fabrication work.

Mr. Nicholls: Discussions are now well advanced within the European Standards Organisation (CEN) in connection with the production of up-to-date standards for welder approval and weld procedure approval. These draft standards, now out for public comment, will be based on United Kingdom standards, as modified to take account of the views of other countries. Although such standards are unlikely to be the subject of a specific EC directive on welding, they may be called up in support of directives where weld quality is important in ensuring the integrity of fabricated components.

Mr. Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the supply of British qualified trainers in welding and fabrication after 1992.

Mr. Nicholls: The supply of British qualified trainers in welding and fabrication after 1992 is primarily for industry and training providers to determine.

The Government are helping to improve the quality of trainers generally by establishing an industry-led group to define the standards of competence required by qualified trainers and by initiatives to improve the quality and development of trainers.

Earnings

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) in which sectors of employment or industries a fixed national minimum wage is existent; and if he will make a statement;

(2) which sectors of employment and industries are covered by wage councils; at what levels the current basic pay is set under the influence of these institutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no national minimum wage in this country which is applicable to all workers. Wages councils set minimum rates of pay in certain trades and industries. The rates apply to all workers covered by the councils. Full descriptions of the relevant industries and operations are listed in statutory instruments. The legal minimum requirements of the councils are set out in wages orders which also contain a summary of the industries and operations covered. Copies of the instruments and current wages orders have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the official definition of low pay in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no official definition of low pay. Pay is relative. At any time, and by whatever measure, some people will always be lower paid than others.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were average earnings by region for the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is available from the annual new earnings survey reports, copies of which are in the Library.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers have died of asbestos-induced diseases attributable to their exposure at work in each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholls: Three diseases are known to be associated with asbestos: asbestosis, mesothelioma, and lung cancer.

The incidence of lung cancer is heavily influenced by other factors, most notably smoking, and it is not possible to give accurate figures for asbestos-related lung cancer deaths. Asbestosis is uniquely caused by asbestos exposure, but it is estimated that about 100 cases of mesothelioma may occur each year from other causes.

The following table lists the number of death certificates mentioning mesothelioma or asbestosis for the years 1979 to 1988. The figures for 1989 are not yet available.

Year	Mesothelioma	Asbestosis	Total
1979	434	102	536
1980	458	102	560
1981	472	137	609
1982	504	128	632
1983	573	121	694
1984	624	129	753
1985	615	140	755
1986	700	166	866
1987	807	144	951
1988	815	146	961

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will initiate a study on the health effects of the use of toxic chemicals in the micro-electronics industry in England.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive is aware of the concerns surrounding the use of hazardous substances in the micro-electronics industry and is working with the micro-electronics semiconductor manufacturing joint working group to develop guidance relevant to the industry. Guidance in special gases has already been published and further guidance on hazardous substances and monitoring is in preparation.

The Health and Safety Executive is also assessing the feasibility of conducting a study of the reproductive health of women working in the semiconductor industry in the United Kingdom including sites in England and Scotland.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many occupational hygiene health audits have been carried out in Wales under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Act since legislation came into force; and how many firms in Wales have yet to conduct control of substances hazardous to health audits.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no requirement under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations for companies to carry out occupational hygiene health audits.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how may control of substances hazardous to health audits have been conducted on companies registered to make micro-electronics in Scotland.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no requirement under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations to notify to the Health and Safety Executive the completion of the assessments required under those regulations. The information requested is therefore not available.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will conduct an investigation into the health effects of use of acids and toxic chemicals at the Seagate Microelectronics plant in Scotland.

Mr. Nicholls: In May 1989, the HSE investigated a complaint about the storage and use of chemicals at Seagate Microelectronics and concluded that the complaints were substantially unjustified. It is not considered that any further investigation outside normal inspection activities at Seagate Microelectronics is appropriate at this stage.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will initiate a study into the health effects on workers of working in the Scottish micro-electronics industry.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive is aware of the concerns surrounding the use of hazardous substances in the micro-electronics industry and is working with the micro-electronics semiconductor manufacturing joint working group to develop guidance relevant to the industry. Guidance in special gases has already been published and further guidance on hazardous substances and monitoring is in preparation.

The Health and Safety Executive is also assessing the feasibility of conducting a study of the reproductive health of women working in the semiconductor industry in the United Kingdom, including the sites in England and Scotland.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Eggar: Total publicity and advertising expenditure figures for my Department in (a) 1979-80 financial year could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The planned expenditure by my Department on total publicity in (b) 1989-90, to include that for the Training Agency, remains as stated in table 7.29 on page 25 of the public expenditure White Paper, CM607, published in January 1989. No further detailed information is yet available.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stretford of 13 March, what leak inquiries have been undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive since 1 January.

Mr. Nicholls: None.

Child Care

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what studies of day care, to enable mothers to take up employment, have been undertaken.

Mr. Nicholls: The Department constantly monitors research in this area and is aware of a number of such studies. Main studies include: (1) Brannen, J. and Moss, P. "New Mothers at work". Unwin, 1988, (2) Cohen, B. "Caring for children". Commission for the European Communities, 1988, (3) Institute of Manpower Studies Commentary number 43 "Retaining women employees, 1990", (4) Institute of Personnel Management "Work and the family, 1990", and (5) Moss, P. "Childcare and equality of opportunity". Consolidated report to the European Commission, 1988.

Journals such as "Equal Opportunities Review" and "Industrial Relations—Review and Report" have also conducted their own small surveys.

Action for Jobs

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much of the expenditure on Action for Jobs in addition to expenditure on television advertising and printed material in 1988-89 was spent through the Central Office of Information.

Mr. Eggar: In addition to Action for Jobs expenditure on television advertising and printed material, £175,000 was spent through the Central Office of Information in 1988-89.

Written Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deputy Secretaries

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the responsibilities of each of the deputy secretaries in his Department and the numbers and ranks of staff reporting to each.

Mr. Waddington: The responsibilities of the deputy secretaries and the numbers of their staff are as follows:

Responsibilities	Number of staff[1]
Broadcasting and miscellaneous department, equal opportunities and general department, immigration and nationality department, and passport department	5,100
Criminal justice and constitutional department, criminal policy department, research and statistics department	500
Establishment department, finance and manpower department, fire and emergency planning department	2,000
Legal adviser's branch	27
Police department	2,400
Prison service	32,400

[1] To the nearest hundred, except for legal adviser's branch.

The deputy secretaries have staff reporting to them in a wide variety of grades; detailed information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Secure Unit, Wakefield

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance has been issued on the practice of courts sending offenders to the Newton Lodge, Wakefield secure unit; what information he has on the current practice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Courts have powers under the Mental Health Act 1983 to authorise the detention of accused and convicted persons in hospital if the relevant requirements of the Act are met. The Home Office has issued circulars on the provisions of the Act in 1983 and 1984, but we do not provide guidance on the use of these powers in relation to individual secure units. We maintain regular contact with the Newton Lodge unit whose management is the responsibility of the district health authority.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests or instructions have been given to the Metropolitan police by the Government concerning development of revenue-earning potential.

Mr. Waddington: No such approach has been made to the Metropolitan police by the Government. However, the Commissioner announced in his strategy statement for 1990 that he has initiated a study of the scope for increasing receipts to the force as part of his concern to see that the best possible use is made of available resources. Any proposals which emerge will be put to me as police authority.

Car Clamps

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis on what steps are being taken to end unlawful parking in Green street and Katherine road in the London borough of Newham and as to how many parking offenders had their cars clamped in the London borough of Newham in the last 12 months.

Mr. Waddington: I understand from the Commissioner that traffic wardens patrol the area daily and these roads are among those in the area targeted for enforcement by the area traffic unit. Vehicle removal teams are also deployed in the area from time to time. Wheelclamping may take place only in areas where it has been authorised by order by the Secretary of State. Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of violence have been reported as having occurred at Wandsworth prison during each of the years 1984 to 1989, inclusive.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not available in the form requested.

The table shows numbers of charges of assault on which prisoners were found guilty on adjudication:

Year	Staff	Assault on inmate	Other	Fighting
1984	151	30	3	—
1985	146	26	1	—
1986	78	31	—	—
1987	61	30	—	—
1988	65	30	—	—
1989	87	17	2	62

The figures include cases of gross personal violence, which ceased to be a separate offence on 31 March 1989, and charges of attempt—and also, since 1 April 1989, incitement and assisting another prisoner—to commit an offence. The new offence of fighting also came into force on 1 April 1989. The 1989 figures are provisional.

In the following numbers of other incidents, acts of violence by a prisoner on a member of staff or another person were reported:

Year	Escape/ attempted escape from escort	Hostage taking	Concerted indiscipline	Miscellaneous other incidents
1984	1	—	—	—
1985	—	—	—	1
1986	1	1	—	—

Private Interest Registration

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the requirements laid down for members appointed by him to bodies such as the Independent Broadcasting Authority to register their private interests; and where the register of interests is kept.

Mr. Mellor: Under parargraph 4 of schedule 1 to the Broadcasting Act 1981, I have to be satisfied, before appointing a person to be a member of the Independent Broadcasting Authority, that he has no financial or other interest likely to prejudice the discharge of his duties as a member. This applies in particular to interests in programme contractors, advertising agencies and manufacture or sale of wireless or other telegraphic equipment.

Assurances are sought from potential new members and repeated annually for existing members. Other broadcasting bodies are generally covered by comparable arrangements.

Uncharged Prisoners

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been placed in custody without being charged with any offence for more than a year in (a) the last five years and (b) the last 10 years, in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: All persons in prison service establishments are held following a charge, conviction or sentence for a criminal offence, except for persons committed to prison for contempt of court and for certain civil debts and those detained under the Immigration Act 1971 and for a maximum of seven days under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1976. Information for all years on non-criminal prisoners held in prison service establishments could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, according to records held centrally no non-criminal prisoners in prison service establishments in England and Wales on 31 December 1979, 1984 or 1989 had been held for more than one year.

The information requested on persons detained under the Immigration Act 1971 in immigration detention centres is not available. However, no person currently detained solely under Immigration Act powers in the United Kingdom has been held for more than a year. Such cases are very rare.

Persons held in police custody prior to charge are subject to the provisions of either the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which places an upper limit of 96 hours on the period of detention; or the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, which enables them to be detained for up to 48 hours on police authority and for up to an additional five days on that of the Secretary of State.

Fire Precautions

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to publish his comprehensive Guide to Fire Precautions in Existing Places of Public Entertainment and Like Premises.

Mr. John Patten: Our "Guide to Fire Precautions in Existing Places of Entertainment and Like Premises" was published on 8 March. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the subject matter of the internal audit report that was drawn to the attention of a Minister in his Department in 1989.

Mr. Waddington: The internal audit report was of a systems review of Her Majesty's fire service inspectorate.

Crime (London)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes involving indecency were reported to the police in London during 1989; and if he will give the number in each of the categories used by the police force;

(2) how many crimes of malicious damage and vandalism were reported to the London police during 1989;

(3) how many crimes of violence against the person (non-sexual) were reported to the police in London during 1989; and if he will give the number in each of the categories used by the police force;

(4) how many drugs offences were reported to the London police during 1989;

(5) how many thefts by housebreaking and attempted housebreaking were reported to the London police during 1989.

Mr. John Patten: Information about crime in London in 1989 will be available later this month when the regular annual statistical bulletin on recorded crime is published. The corresponding information for 1988 was published in table S3.1 of "Criminal statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary tables 1988, Vol.3", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Risley Remand Centre

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the dates on which Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons or any member of his staff has visited Risley remand centre since the inspection of February 1988; what reports were compiled following such visits; and whether copies of such reports have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons has not visited Risley remand centre since his full inspection in 1988. One inspector visited Risley on 20 April 1989 as part of his review of the working of remand centres. He briefed Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons on his return, but no report was submitted either to my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) or to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the pension that an inspector in the police force will receive, having completed maximum years' service, on retirement at the end of March; and what is the pension currently received by inspectors with similar service who retired in March 1980 and March 1970;

(2) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by police of all ranks on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(3) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by fire brigade personnel on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(4) what is the value, at current prices, of the pension received by an ex-police inspector with maximum years' service who retired in (a) March 1970 and (b) March 1980;

(5) what was the average pension paid to fire brigade personnel who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by fire brigade personnel who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(6) what was the average pension paid to police of all ranks who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension received currently by police of all ranks who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969.

Mr. Waddington: Particulars of average police and fire service pensions are not held centrally and this information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information requested about the relative pension position of police inspectors retiring at certain dates is given in the table.

Retirement date	Current annual pension £
31 March 1970	7,337
31 March 1980	9,023
31 March 1990	13,238

Police Consultative Committees

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which London boroughs are not members of the local police consultative committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Five London borough councils have refused to nominate representatives to their local police-community consultative group: Brent, Ealing, Hackney, Haringey and Lambeth.

We deplore the fact that these five groups are obliged to operate without the support of their local council and without the resources which other councils make available. I hope that they will reconsider their position. The fact that these groups nevertheless operate effectively reflects great credit on all of those involved.

HIV

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male and female prisoners in England and Wales have been found to have contracted the human immuno deficiency virus since monitoring commenced in March 1985; and how many prisoners are currently HIV positive.

Mr. Mellor: On 19 March 1990 the prison population of England and Wales included 61 male and seven female prisoners reported as having been identified as HIV antibody positive. On the same date the numbers of identified cases reported since March 1985 were 242 males and 42 females.

Prisons (Syringes)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many needles or syringes, contrary to prison rules, have been found in prison establishments in England and Wales during the past three years.

Mr. Mellor: The following numbers of finds were reported by prison service establishments in 1987-89:

	Needles	Syringes
1987	49	92
1988	77	114
1989	98	187

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Social Services

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what additional funding will be allocated for health and social services boards in Northern Ireland for the financial year beginning on 1 April; what is the basis of the calculation on which the allocations are made to the separate boards; and how much will be allocated to the Eastern health and social services board.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In 1990-91 the health and social services boards will have available to them an extra £55 million. In addition they will have the proceeds of their cost improvement programmes amounting to some £9 million. These resources are being allocated to boards to enable them to cover the forecast level of inflation, to advance services in a number of priority areas and to continue progress towards the regional strategy objectives through their operational plans. The 1990-91 allocations also continue the process of progressive equalisation of resources between boards.

The Eastern health and social services board's allocation for 1990-91 will be £386,804,000. In addition it will receive the major share of some £5·85 million which has been reserved for key developments including regional medical services.

Fair Employment

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the code of practice mentioned in his reply of 21 February, Official Report, column 768, to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East has been agreed with the Fair Employment Commission.

Mr. Cope: Although the code of practice has not been agreed with the Fair Employment Commission, which came into being on 1 January 1990, it was agreed with its predecessor, the Fair Employment Agency in 1985.

Railways

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the cost of police and Army time spent in protecting, checking and clearing explosives from the tracks of Northern Ireland railways in each of the last five years.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 27 February 1990]: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what child care provision his Department provides for pre-school age children of employees; what child care provision for school holidays or after-school care is provided for employees' children aged five years or over; what plans there are for increasing provision in the next five years; and how these are to be funded.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The Northern Ireland Civil Service is considering with the trade unions whether child care facilities for under five-year-olds can be provided for its staff. Two holiday playschemes, which were funded by parental fees and grants from the Northern Ireland Civil Service, were established on a pilot basis during the 1989 summer holidays and one scheme in the 1989 Christmas holiday. These schemes are now being evaluated to gauge their success and to consider if further playschemes should be developed.

The small home Civil Service part of the Northern Ireland Office which comprises about 200 staff divided between London and Belfast, does not provide child care facilities of its own. Staff can, however, link into schemes already set up by larger Departments, both in London and Belfast and we hope to continue to be able to take advantage of any new schemes.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures he has implemented to ensure that recruitment and promotion policy in his Department does not directly or indirectly discriminate against applicants who were mature students or women returning to work following a career break due to child care.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: It is the policy of the Northern Ireland Civil Service and home Civil Service that all eligible persons shall have equal opportunity for employment and promotion on the basis of their ability, qualifications and aptitude for the work.

The detailed policy statement on equality of opportunity issued by the Northern Ireland Civil Service makes it clear that any advertisements, whether internal or external, must not indicate or appear to indicate any intention to discriminate in selection for recruitment and promotion. It also states that opportunities to obtain information on careers in the Civil Service must be readily available to all existing and potential applicants and that the eligibility criteria for recruitment should be formulated to ensure that they are related to job performance and are non-discriminatory.

There is no age limit for recruits except in the case of administrative trainees (age limit 36) and direct entrant executive officers II (age limit 50). These limits are necessary in order that recruits can realise the career expectation associated with recruitment to the grades in question.

There are no age limits which preclude officers from considerations for promotion. In pursuance of its equal opportunity policy, an equal opportunities unit has been established within the Department of Finance and Personnel. The unit has introduced a detailed monitoring system which includes recruitment and promotion. Details of its work are contained within three published reports; copies of which are available in the Library.

Equal opportunity policy in the small home Civil Service element of the Northern Ireland Office is kept under regular review. An equal opportunities guide for staff which emphasises its commitment, is near completion. Internal promotion procedures for this group are also currently under review.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of civil servants in his Department are women at each of the grades (a) seven, (b) six, (c) five, (d) four, (e) three, (f) two and (g) one.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The proportion of staff who are female in each of the following grades in the Northern Ireland Civil Service is:

Grade	Per cent. Female

With regard to the home Civil Service part of the Northern Ireland Office, female staff account for 4 to 5 per cent. of the total at grade 7 level; there are currently no female staff at grades 1 to 6.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each subsequent year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

1979-80	Nil
1980-81	Nil
1981-82	Nil
1982-83	Nil
1983-84	Nil
1984-85	Nil
1985-86	52,380
1986-87	4,298
1987-88	2,411
1988-89	1,549,937
[1]1989-90	2,760,488
[1]1990-91	1,800,000

Q120. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Prime Minister how many quangos were in being in June 1979; and how many there are at the present time.

The Prime Minister: On 1 April 1979 there were 2,167 non-departmental public bodies and on 1 April 1989 there were 1,555.

Zimbabwe

Q192. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister on what occasions since 1980 Her Majesty's Government have made representations of concern to the Zimbabwean Government about the abuse of human rights in Zimbabwe; and what has been the cause of this concern.

The Prime Minister: We are opposed to abuses of human rights wherever they occur. We have made a number of representations since 1980 on behalf of individuals detained without charge in Zimbabwe, including most recently Mr. Lewis-Walker, Mrs. Brown, Mr. Clive Harding and Mr. Ivor Harding, all of whom were subsequently released.

Foreign Bases

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will state the Government's policy in relation to the use of bases in the United Kingdom which are in control of other countries for military purposes elsewhere in the world and on prior consultation concerning such use.

The Prime Minister: Under long-standing arrangements, the use by the United States of bases in the United Kingdom in an emergency would be a matter for joint decision by Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time. No other country has operational military facilities made available to it in the United Kingdom.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure including for privatisation of her Department and public bodies for which she has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure for 1979 is not available except at disproportionate cost. The estimated total expenditure on publicity and advertising by the Cabinet Office and those public bodies for which I am responsible in 1989-90 is £2,543,290. None of it is for privatisation. Over 84 per cent. of the total represents recruitment advertising by the Civil Service Commission.

NHS Hospitals

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister when she next expects to pay an official visit to a National Health Service hospital.

The Prime Minister: I have visited various National Health hospitals eight times during the past year including Dewsbury hospital last month.

New York

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister when she next expects to pay an official visit to New York.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to visit New York.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 March.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

WALES

Cancer

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what target date it is his policy to set for the publication of the figures for the incidence of leukaemia, lung cancer, colon cancer and stomach cancer (a) for Wales generally and (b) for each district in Wales following the end of each year.

Mr. Grist: As indicated in the answer I gave the hon. Gentleman on 15 March there is no set target date for the publication of this data. The Department is, however, considering what steps might be taken to ensure prompt publication of this information in future.

New Dwellings

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of new dwelling units which will be built in 1990-91 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector.

Mr. Grist: No estimates are available for the number of new dwelling units to be built in 1990-91.

Teachers

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will commission a study into the number of mid-career teachers in primary and secondary schools in Wales giving notice of their resignation in 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. The Department of Education and Science maintains records of the number of mid-career teachers in primary and secondary schools in Wales who have actually resigned.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will commission a study into the numbers and percentages of head teachers, deputy heads and teachers in primary and secondary schools in Wales who applied for early retirement in 1990, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. The Department of Education and Science maintains records of the number and percentages of head teachers, deputy heads and teachers in primary and secondary schools in Wales who have actually left on early retirement terms.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will institute a study into the numbers of applications for deputy headships and headships in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Wales in 1990, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the most up-to-date estimates available to him of the numbers of teachers applying for vacant deputy headships and headships in (a) primary and (b) secondary education in Wales covering the period 1985 to 1990.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made on implementing the licensed teachers and articled teachers schemes.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Although education support grant was made available to support the training of licensed teachers in 1990-91, no local education authority in Wales submitted a bid. One authority in Wales has shown an interest in the articled teachers scheme, but it was not possible to support the consortium of which it was a member. We are currently considering whether to make local authority training grant money available to support these schemes in 1991-92.

School Buildings

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what allowance he proposes to make in the setting of tests for children at seven, 11, 14 and 16 in pursuit of the national curriculum where education has been disrupted for six weeks or more by natural or man-made disasters affecting the availability of school buildings.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The School Examinations and Assessment Council is currently considering the range of circumstances in which exceptional arrangements may need to apply and its further advice is awaited.

Flats, Porthcawl

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the Stoneleigh Club and Dunraven Court flats in Porthcawl; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: No representations concerning the Dunraven Court flats in Porthcawl have been recorded since the Dunraven (Porthcawl) Housing Society Ltd. went into voluntary liquidation in July 1984. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the Stoneleigh Club.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many primary school Welsh language units are currently recognised in each county in Wales; and what is his Department's policy relating to (a) Welsh medium units and (b) Welsh medium schools as a means of providing Welsh language education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There is no standard definition of a Welsh language unit. The number of schools having classes where Welsh is the sole or main medium of instruction of first and second language pupils in each county is set out in the table:

	Numbers
Clwyd	32
Dyfed	117
Gwent	6
Gwynedd	138
Mid Glamorgan	29
Powys	20
South Glamorgan	9
West Glamorgan	17

Welsh Office policy on Welsh medium education was set out in the publication "Welsh in Schools" (July 1981) which encouraged local education authorities to make available bilingual education for pupils whose parents desired it for them. The means of making this provision would be a matter for individual local education authorities to determine.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will undertake a review of the funding of Welsh medium schools and units in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Funding of schools is a matter for the LEAs. The publication of school budget and outturn statements under LMS will help in identifying any extra costs associated with bilingual education.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Polytechnic Designations

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which higher education establishments have expressed an interest in receiving polytechnic designation; which are likely to meet the new criteria which he has issued; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has accepted the criteria proposed by the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council for the designation of new polytechnics and has invited the council to advise him before the end of May whether any colleges currently meet, or whether there is a clear prospect that they will meet within the next two years, its criteria for polytechnic designation. It is now for the council to consider evidence from individual institutions and advise my right hon. Friend.

The higher education establishments which, I understand, have expressed an interest in receiving polytechnic designation are as follows:

Anglia Higher Education College
Bolton Institute of Higher Education
Cheltenham and Gloucester College of Higher Education[1]
Derbyshire College of Higher Education
Dorset Institute of Higher Education
Ealing College of Higher Education
Humberside College of Higher Education
Luton College of Higher Education
Southampton Institute of Higher Education
Thames Valley College of Higher Education

[1] To be formed by the merger of Gloucestershire College of Arts and Technology (HE) and the College of St. Paul and St. Mary, Cheltenham on 1 April 1990.

The London Institute has expressed an interest in receiving the status of a polytechnic, but not the name.

Parenting

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the Government's policy on promoting the teaching of parenting skills and the care of children in schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Section 1 of the Education Reform Act places a duty on the Secretary of State, local education authorities, school governors and head teachers to ensure that the curriculum as a whole prepares young people for the responsibilities and experiences of adult life. The science order within the national curriculum, being implemented under the Education Reform Act, requires that pupils should understand the factors necessary for the well-being of young children in the early stages of their development.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken to ensure that there is sufficient time available for schools to include in the curriculum parenting skills and the care of children.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Section 4(3) of the Education Reform Act precludes the Secretary of State from requiring schools to allocate particular periods of time to any aspect of the national curriculum.

Secondary Admissions (Bromley)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will obtain details from the London borough of Bromley of its secondary schools admissions policy.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department has received some details from the London borough of Bromley about its school admissions policy and these are currently under consideration.

Training Grants

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what date in 1989 he published the amount of the training grants available for each local education authority; when he expects to publish the figures applicable to the financial year 1990-91; and what advice he has given to these authorities in respect of determination of their education budgets and related revenue decisions.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Indicative maximum amounts of expenditure which my right hon. Friend had it in mind to support in each priority area in each local education authority (LEA) under the LEA training grants scheme in 1990-91 were first set out in a circular issued on 18 August 1989. Final allocations were notified in letters to each LEA sent on 15 December 1989. The financial arrangements governing the training grants scheme for 1990-91 were explained in the August 1989 circular.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the primary and secondary school pupil-teacher ratio for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year for which information is available; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The pupil-teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools in England in 1979, 1983 and 1987 and 1989 were as follows:

	Primary	Secondary
1979	23·1	16·7
1983	22·3	16·5
1987	21·9	15·6
1989	22·0	15·3

The pupil-teacher ratio in both primary and secondary schools has improved since 1979. It is for local education authorities and schools to make the best use of the available teacher resources.

Nursery Education

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of how much it would cost to provide full-time nursery education for all three and four-year-olds in the United Kingdom in 1991-92.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend's responsibilities for schools do not extend beyond England. The Department has not attempted detailed costings of the introduction of universal, full-time nursery education for three and four-year-olds in England. However, a broad extrapolation from the estimated cost per pupil for all forms of provision made by local education authorities for the under-fives[1] suggests an annual recurrent cost of the order of £1·65 billion in 1989-90 prices. In addition there would be a substantial capital cost; and costs would also be incurred in training or retraining the additional teaching and ancillary staff who would be needed.

[1] Table 11.2, DES Chapter of the Public Expenditure White Paper 1990 (Cm 1011).

Food Research

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has made an assessment of the implications for that element of food safety research, which may be of benefit to the consumer but is unlikely to offer a worthwhile return to industry, of the Government's decision to withdraw from near-market funding.

Mr. Jackson: The policy decision to withdraw from funding near-market research has not altered the Government's commitment to basic and strategic research in the area of food safety. Funding for such research has been increased in real terms.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he held with the Agricultural and Food Research Council in respect of the Bristol laboratory of the Institute of Food Research, prior to the decision by the Agricultural and Food Research Council to close it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Agricultural and Food Research Council is an independent body which is grant-aided by Government. The council announced its intention to concentrate physical restructuring of its institutes, including the Institute of Food Research, in its corporate plan 1989-94, published in February 1989. The council kept the Department informed of its consideration of proposals for restructuring but the evaluation of those proposals and the decisions taken concerning it were entirely a matter for the council.

School Education, Bradford

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total number of children being educated in first, middle and upper schools in the metropolitan district of Bradford in the current academic year.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The number of pupils on roll in January 1989 in first, middle and upper schools in Bradford was 78,555, the latest year for which figures are available.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the subject matter of the two internal audit reports that were drawn to the attention of Ministers in his Department in 1989.

Mrs. Rumbold: The internal audit reports covered controls over adult education grants and education support grants both of which were taken into account in policy reviews.

Middle Schools

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local education authorities intend to retain middle school systems; and which have proposals to change status from middle school systems to transfer to secondary provision at 11 years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The local education authorities that operate middle school systems are listed in the table:

Of these authorities, only Leeds has published statutory proposals to change to a system of primary-secondary provision which are currently under consideration. In addition, the Secretary of State has approved proposals for Shropshire, Humberside, Rochdale and Barnsley LEAs which are still to be implemented, all in September 1990.

University College of Wales (Grant)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is his most up-to-date estimate of the date, terms and conditions of the repayment of the repayable grant made by the University Grants Committee to University College of Wales, Cardiff in 1988;

(2) what representations he has received concerning the date and terms of repayment of the £4·4 million repayable grant made by the University Grants Committee to the University of Wales College at Cardiff in 1988;

(3) if he will review the terms of the special £4·4 million repayable grant made by the University Grants Committee to the University of Wales College at Cardiff in 1988.

Mr. Jackson: A repayable grant of £4·4 million was made available by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Education and Science to University College, Cardiff in September 1988. The covering agreement requires the college and its successor to apply the net proceeds from the disposal of surplus assets towards repaying the grant. To date some £270,000 has been repaid. My right hon. Friend has received no representations about the agreement, and has no plans to review it.

Student Loans

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what he estimates will be the cost of student loans in Scotland in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I have been asked to reply. The estimated cost of loans for Scottish domiciled students is as follows:

	£ million
1990-91	15·7
1991-92	25·5
1992-93	25·6

DEFENCE

Holy Loch

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what approaches have been received from the United States authorities concerning the deployment of a United States Navy submarine tender ship to Holy loch certified to handle, load, store and maintain nuclear and conventional Tomahawk submarine-launched cruise missiles;

(2) what discussions have taken place, or are under way, concerning the continued use of Holy loch by the United States Navy after the date when United States Poseidon ballistic missile-carrying submarines based at Holy loch are decommissioned;

(3) what information he has on the effect of United States plans for the future of its Poseidon SSBNs on the future of the facility at Holy loch.

Mr. Neubert: The long-term use of the Holy loch facility is a matter for discussion between the United Kingdom and United States Governments. No decision has yet been taken.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what facilities exist at Holy loch for the maintenance, repair, storage and transfer of Tomahawk submarine-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Neubert: A normal range of facilities exist at Holy loch for the logistic support of United States Navy nuclear-powered submarines.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if current agreements between the British and United States Governments require the United States authorities to seek permission or inform his Department before a visit is made by a United States Navy attack submarine to the Holy loch submarine facility;

(2) if the current agreements between the British and United States Governments concerning the use of the Holy loch submarine facility require the United States authorities to seek and obtain the permission of the British Government before the replacement of the current submarine tender with another vessel certified to load, maintain and store submarine-launched cruise missiles;

(3) if the United States authorities informed his Department before replacing the previous submarine tender at the Holy loch with the USS Simon Lake.

Mr. Neubert: The Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States maintain the closest links over the use of the facilities at Holy loch.

Nuclear Weapons (Transportation)

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs for the transportation of nuclear weapons in road convoys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: The number of nuclear weapon movements is kept to a minimum. However, it is the long-standing policy of this and previous Governments not to comment on the methods of transportation of nuclear weapons.

Running Costs

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of storing and maintaining the Chevaline nuclear weapon and the air-launched WE177 weapon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: It would not be in the national interest to reveal such information.

Intellectual Property Rights

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place in the Library the relevant extracts of the contracts, or a summary of them, relating to the improved United Kingdom air defence ground environment which relate to intellectual property rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. The contracts are commercially confidential.

Atomic Weapons Establishments

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what date he expects the proposed contractorisation of atomic weapons establishments to commence and to be completed.

Mr. Neubert: The invitations to tender for the interim AWE management contract due to commence later this year will be issued shortly. The timing of the subsequent transfer to full contractorisation is dependent on the passage of legislation but will not be before 1992.

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions his Department has had with the trade unions representing personnel in the atomic weapons establishments; and if he will guarantee their pension rights when these establishments are contractorised.

Mr. Neubert: A consultative document was issued to trades unions on 5 December 1989. Although no formal response has yet been received, a preliminary consultative meeting with the non-industrial trades unions took place on 11 January and joint consultative committees are being set up to discuss the Government's proposals for the future of AWE.

Staff who are transferred out of the Civil Service cannot remain in the principal Civil Service pension scheme (PCSPS). It is the Government's intention to make available to AWE staff at the time of contractorisation new pension arrangements which would provide benefits which, taken as a whole, would be no less favourable than those of the PCSPS. Proposals for future pension arrangements will be subject to full consultation with trades unions.

MOD Vehicle (Road Accident)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the accident in January between a Ministry of Defence vehicle carrying radioactive material and a bus on the Dumfries-Annan road.

Mr. Neubert: We have no knowledge of any such incident.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Test Ban

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current proposals there are for hearings on a comprehensive nuclear test ban in the United Nations permanent conference on disarmament.

Mr. Waldegrave: Discussions are under way at the conference on disarmament about the possible establishment of an ad hoc committee on a nuclear test ban.

Namibia

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the extent to which the Namibian independence constitution abides by the principles formulated by the western Governments on 12 July 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have only just received a copy of the constitution as passed by the Namibian constituent assembly and are still studying it. The United Nations Secretary-General reported to the Security Council on 16 March that he was satisfied that the constitution complied with the constitutional principles.

Sudan

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what diplomatic exchanges have taken place with the Government of the Sudan on humanitarian matters.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are in frequent touch with the Sudanese Government about humanitarian issues. We continue to press, together with other donors, for an early and effective resumption of the relief operation in Sudan.

Coto Donana National Park, Spain

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the EEC infraction proceedings against Spain in relation to the Coto Donana national park.

Mr. Maude: We strongly support the work of the European Commission in ensuring that EC environmental legislation is respected throughout the Community. We welcome the recent decision to publicise the record of member states in this area. But, except where United Kingdom interests are directly at stake, we would not wish to comment on individual cases.

European Bank

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total capital investment currently proposed for the European bank for reconstruction and development; and when it is expected to commence operations.

Mr. Maude: We hope that the articles of the bank will be agreed in the near future and that the bank will commence operations as soon as possible thereafter. The size of the capital stock is still under discussion, but the figure currently under consideration is 10 billion ecu, 30 per cent. of which might be paid in.

Privatisation (Eastern Europe)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the progress of privatisation of industries in (i) Poland, (ii) Czechoslovakia and (iii) Hungary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We understand that legislation is in place in Hungary enabling state enterprises to be transformed into private companies: some privatisations have taken place. In Poland privatisation legislation has been approved by the Government and is now being considered in parliamentary committee prior to submission to the full Parliament. The Czechoslovak Government are considering legislation.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the subject matter of the internal audit report that was drawn to the attention of a Minister in his Department in 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: The contents of the report are the subject of investigations which are not yet complete.

THE ARTS

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister for the Arts what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his office and its predecessor and public bodies for which his office, and its predecessor, has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Luce: Press and publicity work for the Office of Arts and Libraries and the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service is carried out by the Cabinet Office press office, whose budget for 1989-90 is £205,650. My office did not incur any expenditure on advertising in 1989. Comparable information is not available for 1979. Nor is such information available for public arts bodies.

CIVIL SERVICE

Obligations to the Crown

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, what action he is taking on the issue of the obligations to the Crown in Parliament, as a result of the meeting on 7 February, when the head of the home Civil Service met the Civil Service unions.

Mr. Luce: No such action is necessary. The constitutional position of civil servants remains unchanged; civil servants are responsible to Ministers and Ministers are responsible to Parliament.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Allowances

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the tax relief granted on capital allowances granted in the financial year 1987-88 on (a) plant and machinery, excluding private use motor vehicles, and (b) in respect of investment incurred in the first year for which capital allowances were due.

Mr. Lilley: The direct revenue cost of capital allowances for plant and machinery, including vehicles, claimed in accounting periods ending in 1987-88 is provisionally estimated at £6·6 billion. No separate estimates are available for private use motor vehicles, or for new investment in the year.

Beaulieu Group of Companies

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply of 27 February, Official Report, column 104, what stage proceedings against four directors of the Beaulieu Group of Companies have reached; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Jan De Clerck, Dominiek De Clerck, Luc De Clerck and Francis De Clerck are next due to appear upon a remand before the Harrogate justices on 26 April 1990. The prosecution will seek to pursue committal proceedings on a date to be fixed by the court following representations by the parties at the remand hearing.

European Investment Bank

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 13 March, Official Report, column 160, to whom the European investment bank loan was made.

Mr. Ryder: The European investment bank loan, referred to in my reply of 13 March, was made to Eurotunnel Finance SA and Eurotunnel Finance Ltd.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether European investment bank loans which are not repaid can be written off against tax as bad debts.

Mr. Lilley: The European investment bank is exempted from all direct United Kingdom taxes by virtue of articles 3 and 22 of the protocol on the privileges and immunities of the European Communities. The question of relief for bad debts does not therefore arise.

Czechoslovak Finance Minister

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to meet Mr. Vaclav Kaus, Czechoslovakian Finance Minister.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has no plans to meet the Czechoslovak Finance Minister.

Rateable Values, Lancashire

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information was collected for each of the Lancashire district councils at the last revaluation on the number of rateable domestic dwellings at rateable values of (i) up to £50, (ii) £51 to £75, (iii) £76 to £100, (iv) £101 to £125, (v) £126 to £150, (vi) £151 to £175, (vii) £176 to £200, and up to (viii) £250, (ix) £300, (x) £350, (xi) £400, (xii) £450, (xiii) £500, and (xiv) £500 plus.

Mr. Lilley: This information could not be produced without a disproportionate expenditure of time and resources.

Civil List

Mr. Hague: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the total amount payable under the Civil List Acts to the royal family in the calendar years 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Major: The information on amounts payable to the royal family in the present and previous calendar year is as follows:

	1989 £	1990 £
The Queen's Civil List	4,658,000	5,090,000

Mortgages

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total loss or gain to the average mortgagor who is (a) a one-earner couple with two children and (b) a two-earner couple with two children claiming mortgage interest relief resulting from changes since the 1988 Budget in (i) direct taxation, (ii) increases in the rate of interest on mortgages and (iii) interest payments net of mortgage tax relief in all cases counting child benefit as a negative tax.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 March 1990]: Information for a one-earner married couple with an average mortgage was given in my reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 26 February, Official Report, column 13. The changes in income tax and NIC for a two-earner married couple with an average outstanding mortgage of £17,000 in 1987-88 and with average gross earnings of £22,500 are given in the table on the same basis as my previous reply. There has been no change in child benefit since the 1988 Budget.

	[1] 1987-88	1989-90	£ per year change
Income tax and NIC[2]	6,141	5,444	−697

[1] After indexation.
[2] Before relief due under MIRAS and assuming that the income is all earned with the husband earning £18,000 and the wife £4,500, that no allowances or reliefs are available other than the married man's allowances and the wife's earned income allowance, that they are both contracted into SERPS and that the post-October 1989 NIC rates and limits apply for 1989-90.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total loss or gain to the average new mortgagor in 1988 claiming mortgage interest relief resulting from changes since the 1988 Budget in (a) direct taxation, (b) increases in the rate of interest on mortgages and (c) interest payments net of mortgage tax relief.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 March 1990]: I regret that information is not available on the changes in taxation of the average new mortgagor in 1988. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 26 February, Official Report, column 13, for the gain to the average mortgagor.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the gain to the average family on an average mortgage from changes made in the Budgets of 1988 and 1989; and what is their estimated increase in mortgage repayments, on the basis of the same assumptions used in the answer to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, of 13 February, Official Report, column 128.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 26 February, Official Report, column 13.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in tabular form and at constant prices the amounts which would be payable each month at 15·4 per cent. on a standard repayment mortgage repayable over 25 years of each of the regional average new mortgages listed in his answer of 19 February, Official Report, column 518 to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The monthly interest payments, after deduction of basic rate tax relief, are given in the table.

Region	Average new mortgage[1] £	Monthly payment[2] 15·4 per cent. interest rate £

Taxation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what level of income (a) a single person and (b) a married man currently pays a greater proportion of their income in income tax and national insurance contributions than they did in equivalent circumstances in 1978-79.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 13 March 1990]: Since income tax rates have been reduced and the main personal allowances increased by substantially more than the rate of inflation, taxpayers will now pay a lower proportion of their income in tax than in 1978-79 unless their incomes have risen even more rapidly than allowances. Average earnings have risen rather more than this.

For taxpayers of working age whose incomes have increased in line with average earnings, average rates of income tax and national insurance contributions are lower than in 1978-79 for everyone except some married men with earnings up to and including three quarters of the average. On the same basis, real take-home pay is higher than in 1978-79 at all levels of earnings.

Company Cars

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on (a) company car taxation and (b) company car parking places taxation.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 19 March 1990]: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on the taxation of the benefit to employees of the private use of a company car and the use of company car parking places.

BES Tenancies

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what monitoring his Department conducts of the (a) range and (b) average rental cost of BES tenancies per month; and what information he has on the proportion of tenants in BES properties who receive housing benefit (a) in inner London, (b) in outer London, (c) in other metropolitan areas and (d) in the country as a whole.

Mr. Chope: I have been asked to reply.

This information is not available at present. The Department has, however, commissioned research into BES funded assured tenancy schemes, which will investigate, inter alia, the rents charged and the characteristics of tenants, including their incomes, savings and the benefits they receive.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

County Courts

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Attorney-General what financial resources will be made available to the county courts to enable them to take over High Court work under the Courts and Legal Services Bill.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has already announced his intention to increase the number of court staff by around 350 in the next financial year and subsequently by up to a further 100 during the transitional period while new initiatives are being introduced. In addition the introduction of a computerised summons production centre in January and, from next month, the curtailment of the county court banking function will, over time, release staff time savings equivalent to around 350 staff.

The injection of resources will take place during 1990-91 and will put the courts in a strong position to implement from 1991 onwards the new case allocation arrangements, and other reforms flowing from the civil justice review and the Children Act.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of the Overseas Development Administration and public bodies for which it has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are as follows:

	1979-80	1989-90
ODA	215,000	820,000
Crown Agents	—	95,000
CDC	—	267,000

EC Aid

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by how much has the European Community aid to developing countries increased from the 1989 to the 1990 budget; how much European Community food aid has been provided to eastern Europe in that period; and from which budget it was taken.

Mrs. Chalker: Provision for aid spending in the 1989 European Community budget was just under 980 mecu (about £660 million). The corresponding figure for 1990 was 1,102 mecu (£742 million). These figures exclude aid to developing countries under the Lome convention, which is financed direct by member states and not from the Community's budget. This rose from 1,299 mecu (£875 million) in 1989, to 1,319 mecu (£888 million) in 1990.

In 1989 and 1990 the European Community has also provided free food worth 158 mecu (£106 million) to Poland and 40 mecu (£27 million) to Romania. This has been financed from the agricultural guarantee fund of the European Community budget.

UNHCR (Budget)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees budget in the period 1980 to the nearest available full year.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are as follows:

	US$ million
1980	497
1981	474
1982	407
1983	398
1984	444
1985	458
1986	441
1987	460
1988	552
1989	570

Source: UNHCR.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the British contribution to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are as follows:

	£ million
1980	6·98
1981	9·21
1982	7·50
1983	10·80
1984	13·52
1985	15·24
1986	16·90
1987	17·72
1988	21·94
1989	19·37

TRANSPORT

East London Assessment Study

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he has made in collating and analysing the (a) letters, (b) petitions, (c) signatures on those petitions and (d) other representations he has received about the east London assessment study; and when he expects to be able to report how many were in favour and how many against.

Mr. Atkins: The responses on all four assessment studies are being reviewed as quickly as possible and an announcement on the way forward will be made soon.

Transport Infrastructure

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals have been made by the European Community Commission for (a) railway policy, (b) combined transport and (c) transport infrastructure.

Mr. Portillo: The European Commission's most recent proposals for railways policy and combined transport are contained in its document COM(89) 564 final (Council reference 4478/90), "Commission Communication on a Community Railway Policy", dated 5 February 1990.

For transport infrastructure, the latest proposals are set out in COM(89) 238 (Council reference 7435/89), "Communication on the concentration of budgetary means in the field of transport infrastructure, including a modified Proposal for a Council Regulation for an action programme with a view to the completion of an integrated transport market in 1992", dated 16 June 1989.

Copies of both of these papers have been deposited in the Library.

Channel Tunnel

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will institute a noise standard level for existing railways, before the opening of the Channel tunnel and the Channel tunnel links.

Mr. Portillo: I am about to establish a departmental committee to recommend a noise insulation standard for new railways which is comparable to the standard currently set by regulation for new highways. The aim is to provide equity of treatment for those affected by noise from railways and those affected by noise from roads. Since noise insulation is not provided for intensification of use in the case of roads, the committee's terms of reference will not take in the intensification of use of existing railways.

A6 Disley-High Lane Bypass

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many objections he has now received from individuals and organisations who are opposed to the line of route of the A6 Disley-High Lane bypass.

Mr. Atkins: Some 250 representations have been received from local councils and members of the public. Most expressed concern about the decision to proceed with the shortened brown route.

East London Roads

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make it his policy urgently to implement and finance traffic calming and displacement measures in Bow, east London, proposed by his consultants in the east London assessment study;

(2) what discussions he has had with the emergency services in London with regard to their policies on traffic calming and displacement measures in residential areas; and what were the results;

(3) what funds he will make available for traffic calming and displacement measures in Bow, London E3.

Mr. Atkins: All these matters must await decisions on the assessment studies.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on morning peak traffic flows westbound leaving the northern Blackwall tunnel approach road at its junction into Tredegar road.

Mr. Atkins: My Department does not collect data on the numbers of vehicles making these turning movements. However, the relevant local authority (Tower Hamlets) has estimated that in the morning peak period about 1,000 vehicles per hour turn from the Blackwall tunnel northern approach road, A102(M), into Tredegar road.

A580

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) by how much it is intended to widen the A580 east Lancashire road envisaged in the recently published roads report;

(2) what is the objective of the plan to widen the A580 east Lancashire road as outlined in the recently published roads report.

Mr. Atkins: We are considering widening the surface of each carriageway by about 1·5 m, without taking extra land, as one element of the £15 million improvement scheme. The other element covers work on improved drainage, lighting and accesses, further safety fencing, and refurbishment of the central reservation and the cycleway/footpath.

The objective of these various improvements is to bring this heavily trafficked major route up to modern day standards and to improve its safety and traffic flow, particularly during maintenance operations.

Roads, Greater Manchester

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the road schemes for which he has responsibility in the Greater Manchester county, and the stage which each has reached.

Mr. Atkins: The information is as follows:

	Scheme	Stage reached
M56	Widening between junctions 4-6	Early stage of preparation
M62	Widening between junctions 12-17	Preferred route announcement soon

Company Cars

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the results of his commissioned research concerning the proportion of car miles travelled in central London roads where costs are met by sources other than the taxable income of their owners or drivers referred to in his reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 13 January 1989 on traffic in London, Official Report, column 800; and what information he possesses on that matter.

Mr. Atkins: I expect to receive the final report on the research into company-assisted travel within the next few months, and to publish the results shortly thereafter.

A428, Bedford

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the most recent figures available about the number of vehicles using the A428 in Bedford and destined (a) to pass through the town for destinations elsewhere and (b) to move within the town itself; and if he will publish similar figures for the A6.

Mr. Atkins: The one-way traffic flows in autumn 1989 were of the order shown in the following table:

Trunk road	Vehicles per day: Through Bedford (all exits)	Vehicles per day: With destination in Bedford
A6: from north	2,600	7,600
from south	2,200	5,900
A428: from east	4,500	5,500
from west	2,200	3,100

Learner Drivers

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what figures he has for the number of (a) fatal road accidents and (b) other road accidents involving learner drivers where the supervising driver has been (i) under 21 years of age, (ii) in possession of a full driving licence for less than three years or (iii) both.

Mr. Atkins: The police records of accidents, on which national statistics are based, do not include information on the qualifications of supervising drivers. However, I continue to receive letters about accidents involving learner drivers who were under the supervision of young and only newly qualified drivers.

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he received in response to his consultation document on the qualifications of those accompanying learner drivers; and when he expects to bring forward proposals for a change in the law.

Mr. Atkins: I have received over 230 responses. I am now considering my proposals in the light of all the comments received from interested organisations and individuals.

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies have been undertaken by his Department as to the practice adopted in other European Community countries for the supervision of learner drivers.

Mr. Atkins: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply given on 21 December 1989 (Official Report, Vol. 164, column 359).

Local Traffic Area Offices

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to reach a decision on the future of the Leeds local traffic area offices and other such offices; what representations he has received expressing opposition to the closure of local traffic area offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any proposals to close the Birmingham local traffic area office at Five Ways, Birmingham.

Mr. Atkins: In view of the reducing workload for traffic area offices, the organisation is under review. Decisions on individual offices will be based on the need to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the organisation as a whole. A number of representations have been received about particular offices and I have explained that decisions are expected after Easter.

Road Building Programme

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has made a quantifiable assessment of the increase in road traffic likely to result from the improved road conditions arising from the Government's road building programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Increased traffic demand is primarily a function of economic growth rather than road building. Given an established road network, the total amount of traffic growth is unlikely to be influenced measurably by road improvements. However, there will be redistribution effects as traffic transfers to the improved routes from other, less suitable roads.

British Rail (Grant)

Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make an announcement about the public service obligation grant to the British Railways Board for 1989-90.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail's 1989-90 claim for public service obligation (PSO) grant, which constitutes the central Government support for Network SouthEast and provincial services, has been settled at £488 million before adjustment. The cash ceiling on the final grant settlement for 1989-90, announced last April, will be increased from £496 million to £504 million. This additional £8 million will be available only to accommodate the grant-aided sectors' share of additional safety-related expenditure, particularly that arising from Sir Anthony Hidden's report on the Clapham Junction rail accident.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many residential properties his Department has so far acquired in connection with the east London river crossing; how many are currently in use; and how many more will need to be acquired before construction can be started.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: By 14 March 1990, the Department had acquired 111 residential properties in connection with the east London river crossing scheme. Of these 102 are currently let to local councils, housing associations and individual tenants. The Department is in the process of acquiring a further 11 properties. Another 150 will need to be acquired to enable construction of the scheme to start.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the most up-to-date estimates of the cost of the east London river crossing for each of the individual elements of the project.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The latest estimate of the total cost of the scheme at average 1984 prices is approximately £195 million, of which the Thames bridge would cost approximately £62 million. When converted to mid-1989 prices the estimates become £300 million and £98 million respectively.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest anticipated starting date for the construction of the east London river crossing.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: Assuming the remaining statutory procedures are completed satisfactorily and without undue delay, construction could start in autumn 1992.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the second public inquiry into the east London river crossing to be opened; and how long he anticipates it will last.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The public inquiries into the proposed design changes to the section of the east London river crossing between the A13 and A2016, including the proposed changes in the design of the Thames bridge, are planned to begin on 3 July 1990. The inspector plans to hold two pre-inquiry meetings in April and May to consider procedural and other arrangements for the inquiries. It would not be appropriate for me to speculate how long the inquiries will last.

"Action for Cities"

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report for each of the "Action for Cities" target areas the amount of transport supplementary grant allocated for schemes in those areas in 1990-91.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The amount of transport supplementary grant (TSG) allocated for major schemes over £1 million in each of the "Action for Cities" target areas in 1990-91 is given in the table. TSG for programmes for minor works is also listed.

Cars (Pollution)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department's representatives at the recent Geneva motor show obtained any new technological information on the use of electronic controls to reduce pollution discharges from cars.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The Department was not formally represented at the Geneva motor show, although officials did visit while in Geneva on other business. No new technological information on this subject was obtained. However, electronic controls are likely to be used extensively in the future to reduce emissions, in conjunction with catalysts.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many people in his Department are involved in planning and safety issues in (a) roads and (b) railways;

(2) how many people in his Department, including regional officers, are involved in all matters relating to (a) roads, (b) railways and (c) other.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I regret that the information is not available in precisely the form requested. However, the Department's staff are deployed broadly as follows:

	Staff
Highways (including Buses/Taxi Policy)	550
Road Safety	100
Freight (including Traffic Examiners)	300
Regional Offices	1,500
Traffic Area Staff (excluding those counted elsewhere, for example driving examiners)	1,000
Railways (including Railway Inspectorate)	200
Transport and Road Research Laboratory	600
Driving Standards Agency	2,000
Vehicle Inspection Agency	1,600
Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency	5,500
Aviation	350
Shipping	950
Others (includes senior staff; management support services, personnel, economics and statistics, international work etc.)	1,800
Broad Total[1]	16,500

[1] Rounded to nearest 500.

The numbers of staff engaged in safety or planning-related work cannot readily be assessed. However, it should be borne in mind that in addition to its general policy responsibilities the Department has an executive function in relation to trunk roads which it does not have for railways and other forms of transport, for which the operators are themselves responsible.

Consultation

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the organisations which he or his officials regularly meet to discuss road transport matters.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: Road transport matters concern a wide range of interests, with which there are regular contacts. The list of such interests is long but includes industry associations such as the Bus and Coach Council, CBI, freight transport, motor manufacturers, road haulage and chemical industries associations, the police, British Standards Institution, trade unions, training board and the local authority associations, various road safety and environmental organisations and the motoring associations.

Road Tolls

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which European countries have implemented a policy of charging tolls for use of public roads.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: European countries which have recently constructed toll-financed roads, bridges or tunnels, or are planning to do so, include Austria, France, Irish Republic, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. In Switzerland, access to the motorway network requires a supplementary licence (vignette), which may be regarded as a form of toll.

Road Numbers

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will take urgent steps to ensure that all road signs indicating the former A361 road from junction 25 of the M5 through Taunton to Barnstaple now show its new road number of B3227.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: Following the completion of the new north Devon link road in July last year, the fomer A361 trunk road from junction 25 on the M5 through Taunton to Barnstaple was reclassified and renumbered B3227. Signs on this road are the responsibility of the highway authorities—Devon and Somerset county councils—which assure me that all signs on it now show its new number.

Speed Limits

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects a decision to be taken on Essex county council's highway committee's application of October 1988 to extend the 30 mph and 40 mph speed limit zones in Danbury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: Following a protracted correspondence with Essex county council we now have all the information that we require. We expect to be able to process the application shortly.

Road Programme

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding funding of his Department's road programme.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: We received a steady stream of representations about the programme and its funding, and the Transport Select Committee has commented on the subject in its recent report, "Roads For the Future".

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent studies his Department has undertaken on the possibility of transferring vehicle excise duty to petrol.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The arguments for and against replacing vehicle excise duty with an additional duty on fuel are well understood and are kept under review.

HEALTH

Abortifacient Drug

10. Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received concerning the abortifacient drug RU486.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Some in favour, some against and nearly as many seeking information.

103. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy not to license for use in the United Kingdom the abortifacient drug RU486.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All medicinal products in the United Kingdom are subject to the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968. Before licensing any individual product the licensing authority must be satisfied as to its safety, quality and efficacy.

Dental Charges

26. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for dental checks.

64. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for dental checks.

107. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for dental checks.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy).

104. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received about charges for dental treatment.

Mr. Freeman: Over the period from December 1989 to the end of February 1990, we have received 32 letters from Members of the House raising questions about charges for dental treatment, and have answered six questions in this House. In the same period, we have received 15 letters from members of the public on the same subject, and one from the chairman of the general dental services committee of the British Dental Association.

Residential Care

16. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of local authority residential care for the elderly.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of local authority residential care for the elderly.

45. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of local authority residential care for the elderly.

140. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of local authority residential care for the elderly.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have always stressed that we are seeking a mixed economy of care and within that local authority residential care for the elderly has a vital part to play. With private and voluntary residential accommodation, this will provide a wide choice for clients and a value for money service.

70. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that individuals in need of care are not asked to leave residential homes because of their inability to meet the required fees.

76. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that individuals in need of care are not asked to leave residential homes because of their inability to meet the required fees.

109. Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that individuals in need of care are not asked to leave residential homes because of their inability to meet the required fees.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that individuals in need of care are not asked to leave residential homes because of their inability to meet the required fees.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: For people under pension age, local authorities can already top up other sources of income to meet fees in independent residential homes. They can also at present sponsor people of any age and meet the full fees in such homes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced in the House on 13 March that he is considering whether there are further steps he could take in relation to social security payments towards the cost of residential care in independent homes.

GP Budgets

18. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what indications he has as to the proportion of eligible general practices which is applying for budget-holding status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over 850 practices have registered their interest in the practice funding scheme. While not all of these practices are likely to meet the full eligibility criteria and opt to take part in the scheme, we are clearly on course to meet our target of a few hundred practices choosing to participate from April 1991.

134. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of general practitioners have applied to manage their own indicative budgets; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All general practitioners are intended to have indicative prescribing budgets from 1 April 1991 unless they choose to become practice fund holders and meet the eligibility criteria for that scheme.

Competitive Tendering

19. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on competitive tendering within the National Health Service.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on competitive tendering within the National Health Service.

127. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on competitive tendering within the National Health Service.

139. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on competitive tendering within the National Health Service.

Mr. Freeman: Over 40 per cent. of support services in the NHS—to a value of £1¼ billion a year—are now routinely subject to some form of competitive tendering. The White Paper "Working for Patients" provides a framework for further widening the scope for competition. Within that framework it is for each health authority to determine where the most fruitful opportunities arise for using competition to achieve increased effectiveness and value for money at local level.

35. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many contracts awarded through the competitive tendering process within the National Health Service have not been renewed at the end of the period concerned.

56. Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many contracts awarded through the competitive tendering process within the National Health Service have not been renewed at the end of the period concerned.

62. Mr. James Lamond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many contracts awarded through the competitive tendering process within the National Health Service have not been renewed at the end of the period concerned.

117. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many contracts awarded through the competitive tendering process within the National Health Service have not been renewed at the end of the period concerned.

Mr. Freeman: Information is not held centrally on the results of routine renewal of the wide range of NHS contracts which are subject to competitive tendering. This is a contractual matter for the health authority concerned.

Cervical Cancer Screening

20. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on cervical cancer screening.

36. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on cervical cancer screening.

66. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on cervical cancer screening.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) earlier today.

Portsmouth and South East Hampshire DHA

21. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to visit Portsmouth and South East Hampshire district health authority.

Mr. Freeman: Not at the present time. I am, however, always willing to consider an invitation.

Core Services

22. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out his powers in relation to core services provided by National Health Service trusts.

122. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his powers in respect of specifying the core services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I do not anticipate any need to use powers of compulsion to secure the provision of necessary local services by National Health Service trusts. Nevertheless, as a last resort, paragraph 6(1) of schedule 2 to the National Health Service and Community Care Bill provides me with the necessary powers of direction to secure contractual provision.

Huddersfield Health Authority

23. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total amount of money allocated to the Huddersfield health authority in 1979 and 1989; and what was the percentage change in that period.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally. Only expenditure figures are available to the Department centrally. These can be obtained from annual accounts. My hon. Friend may wish to contact the chairman of the Yorkshire regional health authority for the proper answer.

The Huddersfield health authority was established on 1 April 1982. Total revenue expenditure recorded in the authority's annual accounts for 1982-83 was £36·3 million and in 1988-89 was £52·4 million representing an increase in real terms of 7 per cent. (measured at 1988-89 prices by the use of the gross domestic deflator).

Hospital Medical Staffing

24. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the contents of the interim report on patterns of hospital medical staffing.

77. Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the contents of the interim report on patterns of hospital medical staffing.

81. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the contents of the interim report on patterns of hospital medical staffing.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No written representations have been received regarding the contents of the interim report on patterns of hospital medical staffing, but reference has been made to it in recent meetings I have had on the subject of junior doctors' hours.

Wessex RHA

25. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what increase there has been in resources to Wessex regional health authority since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: Total revenue expenditure recorded in the annual accounts of the health authorities comprising the Wessex region increased in cash terms from £223·6 million in 1978-79 to £671 million in 1988-89, representing an increase in real terms of 36·5 per cent. (measured at 1988-89 prices by use of the gross domestic product deflator). The figures exclude expenditure on family practitioner services which is accounted for by family practitioner committees and which cannot strictly be attributed to particular regions.

British Medical Association

27. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the British Medical Association; and what subjects were discussed.

84. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of the British Medical Association; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave the hon. Members for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey), for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy), for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) and for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 20 February at column 1172.

AIDS

28. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what current action is being taken in the fight against AIDS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government continue to attach great importance to action to prevent the spread of HIV infection. We are supporting a wide range of programmes to achieve this through local authorities and health authorities, voluntary bodies and the Health Education Authority, whose latest mass media campaign was launched on 14 February 1990. Further details of the Government's approach can be found in "AIDS: Response by the Government to the Seventh Report from the Social Services Committee Session 1988-89" (Cm 925), published last November, a copy of which is available in the Library.

NHS Trusts

29. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on developments in hospital independent trust proposals within the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A total of 191 National Health Service units have, to date, expressed an interest in National Health Service trust status and I understand that some 80 units are currently undertaking preparatory work with a view to submitting applications for National Health Service trust status at an early stage. Subject to the passage of the necessary legislation, we intend to invite formal applications for trust status shortly after Royal Assent. We intend that the first trusts should become fully operational in April 1991.

78. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how may district health authorities have resolved to have a ballot on the question of the formation of self-governing trusts.

120. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities have resolved to have a ballot on the question of the formation of self-governing trusts.

138. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities have resolved to have a ballot on the question of the formation of self-governing trusts.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities have resolved to have a ballot on the question of the formation of self-governing trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Formal consultation on proposals to establish NHS trusts cannot take place until applications are made; that is after the necessary legislation has received Royal Assent. I am aware that self-governance and other NHS review issues will have been discussed by health authorities, but the results have not been formally requested or recorded by the Department. When details become available and formal applications are prepared, regional health authorities will ensure that they are given local publicity and will seek the views of all those with an interest including health authorities, staff, patients, GPs, CHCs, and the local community. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State shall consider these views alongside the application. However, no one group will have a veto.

98. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many units have now expressed interest in becoming National Health Service hospital trusts.

143. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many expressions of interest he has now received from hospitals or units wishing to obtain National Health Service hospital trust status.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A total of 191 units have, to date, expressed an interest in NHS trust status.

99. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the status of National Health Service trusts within the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The National Health Service and Community Care Bill provides for NHS trusts to be established as separate bodies corporate. They will remain an integral part of the NHS.

Newcastle DHA

30. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next proposes to meet members of the Newcastle district health authority; and what he proposes to discuss.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to meet members of Newcastle district health authority.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the availability of day care facilities for the mentally handicapped.

31. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the availability of day care facilities for the mentally handicapped.

105. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the availability of day care facilities for the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the availability of day care facilities for the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Freeman: Over the last 10 years there has been a 26 per cent. increase in the number of day centre places for people with a mental handicap. We look to a continued expansion of such places as resources allow and commend to social services authorities the recent social services inspectorate report "Inspection of Day Services for People with a Mental Handicap" as a useful guide to good practice.

48. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in the provision of services for the mentally handicapped since 1978-79.

72. Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in the provision of services for the mentally handicapped since 1978-79.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the availability of day care facilities for the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Freeman: Considerable progress has been made in developing community-based services for mentally handicapped people.

Net expenditure by local authorities on residential accommodation and adult training centres increased by 88 per cent. in real terms to £271 million in 1987-88, and overall the number of places in residential homes, including those provided by the private and voluntary sectors, has doubled over the period (to 28,500), while the number of places in adult training centres and day centres has increased by 26 per cent. (to 53,000). The number of mentally handicapped people in hospital fell from 46,900 in 1978 to 27,700 in 1989 and by that year 11 out of the 14 regions had no mentally handicapped children in long-stay care in hospital. Despite this reduction, expenditure on hospital and community health services had grown by 11 per cent. in real terms (to £497 million) by 1986-87, the last year for which information is readily available, reflecting improved standards.

83. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any assistance will be given to health authorities for the provision of community services for the mentally ill and handicapped.

Mr. Freeman: Regional health authorities will make provision for community health services for the mentally ill and handicapped from within their main allocations together with any resources made available from the planned run down and closure of long-stay mental hospitals.

NHS Reform

32. Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether there will be any changes in doctors' rights to refer patients for treatment as a result of the proposals in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

115. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what effect the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill will have on general practitioners' freedom to refer patients for the most appropriate treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill will allow the introduction of contract funding of health care. This will bring GP referrals and the allocation of resources more closely into line. For example it will avoid problems that arise currently where the choices open to GPs may be constrained if the preferred hospital is a victim of its own success and cannot accept additional patients because of budgetary constraint.

In future district health authorities will be expected to let contracts which secure the referral patterns which their local GPs prefer, unless there are compelling reasons for not doing so. In this way resources will be directed to the units which GPs and their patients wish to use.

GPs who take part in the new practice funds scheme will have resources for certain hospital procedures which they can deploy directly.

42. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made in implementing the National Health Service review changes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: For a detailed explanation of all the progress we have made in putting into action the changes outlined in the White Paper "Working for Patients" I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him and my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) on 20 February at columns 714-15.

Since then, other important steps have been taken towards implementing our proposals. First, on 27 February I announced the funding of a further 65 consultants for the NHS between now and 1992. This fulfils our commitment in the White Paper to the creation of 100 new consultant posts over three years. These posts will help reduce waiting times in districts and specialities with particularly long waiting lists. They will also help reduce the working hours of junior doctors, and improve the career structure in the respective specialities.

On 1 March, further information was published about how the new contracting system will operate.

On 14 March, Duncan Nichol, NHS chief executive, launched a new management development drive for 80,000 NHS managers and professionals, including doctors and nurses, with management responsibilities. The 14 regions are committed to developing their own support programmes with particular emphasis on improving the skills needed to implement the major changes that will be required in the post-reform NHS.

The chief executive also announced the next phase of the management communication programme to improve communications with staff. This is based on the results of a survey of communications carried out among general managers with particular emphasis on those at unit level where most staff ar employed and most patients are treated.

60. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received from the British Medical Association on the implementation of his White Paper.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have not received recent representations from the British Medical Association on the White Paper "Working for Patients". There is, however, a growing understanding among the medical profession and others of the positive benefits to patients that will flow from these reforms.

68. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of local authority associations to discuss the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

102. Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of local authority associations to discuss the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

111. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of local authority associations to discuss the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

129. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of local authority associations to discuss the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I met with representatives from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities (AMA) and Association of County Councils (ACC) on 5 February to discuss implementation of community care. Officials have also been meeting with officers of the local authority associations over recent months to discuss a range of community care issues. We shall continue to engage in consultation with the local authority associations as we carry forward our plans for implementation.

86. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors in Cornwall have indicated their support for the Government's National Health Service reforms.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received many comments on the Government's proposals to improve the Health Service from a wide variety of sources. Many ask questions, many support all or some of the proposals, and some only refer to specific points. It is not possible to distinguish them in the way the hon. Member requests.

136. Mr. Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what effect the proposals in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill will have on the distances patients will travel for treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Surveys have shown that a majority of patients are willing to travel to get earlier or better treatment. Under the new funding arrangements for hospital services, the financial problems previously associated with accepting patients from outside the home district will be alleviated because hospitals will be funded directly for the patients they treat, wherever they come from. No patient will be made to travel long distances for treatment against his will.

141. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications the National Health Service and Community Care Bill will have for current prescribing policies by general practitioners.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: When the proposals for indicative prescribing budgets contained in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill are implemented, GPs will remain free to prescribe all medicines which are clinically necessary for their patients. Indicative prescribing budgets will encourage GPs to examine their prescribing habits and costs more closely and to prescribe more effectively.

Regional Chairmen

33. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met regional chairmen; what matters he discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I last met regional health authority chairmen on 17 January. I shall be meeting them again tomorrow morning for our regular bimonthly meeting when we shall be discussing a range of Health Service issues, including the ambulance dispute, rehabilitation services, income and expenditure in the NHS and the continuing progress of the NHS reforms.

Prescription Charges

34. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to include cancer sufferers within the categories of people exempt from prescription charges.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Over 75 per cent. of prescriptions are now dispensed free. The Government's policy is to direct help with prescription charges to those who are likely to have difficulty in paying charges on financial grounds. To extend the small list of medical conditions which confer exemption from charges would not be making the best use of NHS resources.

58. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends to make any further increases in prescription charges.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I announced on 1 March that the NHS prescription charge will be increased to £3·05 with effect from 1 April. There are no immediate plans for a further increase in the charge.

133. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on the level of prescription charges.

Mr. Freeman: A number have been received from hon. Members and others.

69. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of a prescription in 1979; how many subsequent increases there have been; and what has been the percentage increase overall.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Currently over 75 per cent. of all items dispensed in the National Health Service are free from prescription charges. In 1979, the figure was around only 60 per cent. The number of items attracting the standard prescription charge has fallen from around two in every five items to less than one during this time. In 1979, a total of 304·6 million items were dispensed at an ingredient cost of £592·1 million. In 1989, some 352 million items were dispensed at a cost of around £1,883 million. The average cost per item rose during this time from £1·94 to about £5·35.

On 16 July 1979, the National Health Service prescription charge was increased to 45p. Since then the charge has been increased on 10 occasions to its present level of £2·80. This represents an increase of 522 per cent. in cash terms or 209 per cent. in real terms.

Childhood Immunisation

37. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of childhood immunisation; and if he will make a statement.

61. Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of childhood immunisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) on 8 March at columns 825-26.

General Practitioner Contracts

38. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from general practitioners and the British Medical Association on effects on general practitioner services arising from contractual charges in general practitioner conditions of service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There have been some 4,000 letters concerned with the general practitioners' new contract. No accurate breakdown of this total can be provided, but most of these representations have been made by general practitioners.

73. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to revise the general practitioner contract in the light of representations he has received from doctors and patients regarding the cost of long-term care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We received no representations dealing directly with the effect of the general practitioners' new contract on the cost of long-term care. However, if the hon. Member has in mind the supply of medicines to patients under the general medical and pharmaceutical services, I can assure him that prescribing budgets will not prevent general practitioners prescribing all the medicines needed by their patients, including those requiring long-term care.

93. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the new general practitioner contract on services will affect patients.

142. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what effects the new general practitioners' contract will have on services to patients.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The general practitioners' new contract will promote higher standards, a wider range of services and more choice for patients in the family doctor services. Specific changes which will improve services include regular check-ups, particularly for children and people aged 75 and over, greater emphasis on preventative care such as childhood immunisation and screening for cancer of the cervix, more health promotion clinics, more minor surgery in the general practitioner's premises to save patients having to attend hospital and the extension of practice teams to include the services of counsellors, chiropodists, physiotherapists and other health professionals.

Hospital Meals

39. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost per day of a patient's meals in hospital; what was the comparable figure for each of the last two financial years; and how much Bexley health authority is spending per patient per day at the present time.

Mr. Freeman: It is for individual health authorities to determine how much they will spend per day on feeding patients. Information on health authorities' catering costs is not collected in-year. The following information is derived from annual financial returns submitted to the Department:

Total cost of meals per patient day[1]

	1987-88 £ (Cash)	1988-89 £ (Cash)
Bexley Health Authority
Bexley Hospital	2·87	3·47
Queen Mary's Hospital	4·25	5·22
England
Average for hospitals	3·45	—[2]

[1] Catering costs include provisions, labour and energy.
[2] Not yet available.

Medical Care

40. Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department has taken to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology: "Priorities in Medical Care".

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government published their response to the Committee in December 1989. This announced the creation of a new post of chief of research and development for NHS and Department of Health research. An advertisement for that position has recently been published.

Nurses and Midwives

41. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses and midwives were working for the National Health Service in March 1990 and May 1979.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There were 241,800 wholetime equivalent qualified nurses and midwives (excluding agency staff, learners and unqualified staff) employed in the National Health Service in England in September 1988. This compares to 192,000 wholetime equivalents at 30 September 1979. The 1979 figure has not been adjusted to take account of the reduction in the nurses' working week from 40 to 37·5 hours introduced during 1980-81.

71. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes have been made in the provision of training for nurses and midwives since 1978-79.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On training for nurses, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 20 February 1990 at column 701. There have also been important changes in the education and training of midwives. In 1981, as a result of the implementation of EC midwives directives, post-registration midwifery training was lengthened from 12 to 18 months, and pre-registration midwifery courses from two to three years. The Department has provided pump-priming funds for the development of more pre-registration midwifery courses; it is hoped that seven schemes will begin in the autumn of this year. The last decade has also seen the establishment, at Oxford, of the first pre-registration degree course for midwives.

Ambulance Dispute

43. Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the ambulance dispute.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am very pleased that the ambulance dispute has now ended. I would like to pay tribute to the chief ambulance officers and those of their staff who remained in post, the armed forces, the police and voluntary services who have helped to maintain accident and emergency services for the public in many parts of the country during this difficult period.

The cost of the settlement can be afforded by the National Health Service without damage to the continued expansion of patient services. It widens the differential between paramedically trained staff and other staff which is a sensible improvement in the pay structure that the management wished to introduce. The settlement will also make it easier for management to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the service at local level by introducing local pay flexibility that will enable managers to devote part of savings actually achieved to improvements in local pay.

Child Care

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that social workers are allocated to all statutory child care cases.

44. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that social workers are allocated to all statutory child care cases.

101. Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that social workers are allocated to all statutory child care cases.

108. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that social workers are allocated to all statutory child care cases.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the responsibility of local authorities to ensure that their statutory duties in relation to child care cases are properly fulfilled. The social services inspectorate monitors the situation and offers advice and assistance where difficulties arise.

Home Helps

46. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the home help service.

87. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the home help service.

106. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the home help service.

146. Mr. Wall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the home help service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The home help service is already being developed by some local authorities into a home care service which can provide more personalised care adapted to the needs of the individual.

These services will continue to be an important part of the range of domiciliary and day care services needed to enable people to continue to live in the community.

As the White Paper "Caring for People" said, there is great scope for establishing clear policy framework and guidance for resource use, and for increasing the provision of more flexible and intensive personal care services for people who would otherwise need institutional care.

The social services inspectorate's report "From Home Help to Home Care", a copy of which is in the Library, includes useful guidance on the development of home care services.

GPs (Computers)

47. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish his proposals relating to the ownership of data held on computer by general practitioners.

Mr. Freeman: We plan to issue a health circular for consultation at the beginning of April.

135. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the recently announced scheme to provide reimbursement for computers in general practice.

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to tell my hon. Friends and hon. Members that the new direct reimbursement scheme which I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) on 28 November 1989, at columns 228-31 will commence from 1 April 1990. From that date, general practitioners will be able to claim up to 50 per cent. direct reimbursement of the costs of purchasing, leasing, upgrading and maintenance of their computer systems, together with 70 per cent. of the initial costs of setting up the systems. These payments will be subject to upper limits based on a sliding scale according to practice list sizes and will take account of systems obtained in 1989-90. The balance of these costs will be reimbursed indirectly. An advance copy of an amendment to the statement of fees and allowances payable to general practitioners giving details of this scheme has been placed in the Library. Additional assistance will be announced shortly for GPs who choose to be fund holders to reflect their special computer needs.

Sheffield Health Authority

49. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Sheffield health authority; and if hospital closures will be discussed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to meet the chairman of Sheffield health authority.

Community Health Councils

50. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future role of community health councils.

54. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future role of community health councils.

65. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future role of community health councils.

113. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future role of community health councils.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We see no fundamental change in the future role of community health councils. We are considering how that role should be clarified following the proposals for change in the White Paper.

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total annual cost of community health councils in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: The summarised accounts of regional and district health authorities in England for 1988-89 record revenue expenditure on community health councils totalling £8,004,257. The information relating to Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Smoking

51. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current annual number of deaths attributed to smoking.

Mr. Freeman: It is not possible to be precise. Most deaths associated with smoking arise from three diseases: lung cancer, chronic bronchitis and "heart attacks" due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart. However, the proportion of deaths attributable to smoking from each of these diseases varies. Furthermore, smoking is also implicated in certain other conditions where no estimate of the numbers of the deaths caused by smoking is available —for example, obstruction of the arteries of the lower limbs. It is estimated that at least 90 per cent. of deaths from cancers of the lung, lip, oesophagus and larynx, and 90 per cent. of deaths from chronic bronchitis, obstructive lung disease, chronic pulmonary heart disease and aortic aneurysm are attributable to smoking. The total number of deaths from these conditions is given in the table.

England and Wales—1988

ICD[1] code	Cause	Deaths
162	Malignant neoplasm of trachea, bronchus and lung	35,302
140-149	Malignant neoplasm of lip, oral cavity and pharynx	1,687
150	Malignant neoplasm of oesophagos	4,884
161	Malignant neoplasm of larynx	844
416	Chronic pulmonary heart disease	695
441	Aortic aneurysm	7,914
490-492, 496	Bronchitis and emphysema, chronic airways obstruction, not elsewhere classified	25,993

[1] International Classification of Diseases (ICD) 9th revision.

In 1983, the Royal College of Physicians in its report "Health or Smoking" estimated that perhaps 20 per cent. of deaths due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart were related to smoking. The medical term for this condition is "ischaemic heart disease", but it is commonly referred to as "coronary heart disease". The total number of deaths from this condition for England and Wales is as follows, but the proportion directly attributable to smoking is less certain as this is only one of a number of causes that give rise to obstruction of the arteries of the heart.

England and Wales—1988

ICD[1] code	Cause	Deaths
410-414	Ischaemic heart disease	153,084

[1] International Classification of Diseases (ICD) 9th revision.

Supra-regional Funding

52. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on implementation of the increase in supra-regional funding.

Mr. Freeman: In 1990-91 we are allocating approximately £61 million to the supra-regional services in England, a cash increase of over £10 million on the current financial year. As in earlier years, funds will be allocated as earmarked amounts within health authority cash limits. A copy of the announcement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has been placed in the Library.

Drug Budgets

53. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health under what circumstances a general practitioner will be penalised for exceeding his or her indicative drug budget.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: General practitioners who exceed their indicative prescribing budget will not face sanctions on that fact alone. Only where, as now, there is clear evidence of excessive prescribing will the matter be referred for consideration by a professional committee. If the professional committee decides there has been excessive prescribing, the FPC will decide what, if any, financial withholding should be applied. We expect that the application of sanctions will be a process of last resort and will not be commonplace. We intend to publish shortly a second document about the operation of indicative prescribing budgets. This will include detailed information on the sanctions process.

132. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent the costs of elderly and chronically ill patients will be reflected in the proposed indicative drug budgets.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Indicative prescribing budgets will take full account of the costs of elderly and chronically sick patients. Indicative prescribing budgets will, initially, be set largely on historic prescribing patterns which already reflect the fact that elderly and chronically sick patients need greater quantities of medicines than others. Practices will be able to discuss their individual budget requirements, including the needs of their elderly and chronically sick patients, with the FPC's medical adviser in advance of the budget being set. This will ensure that the budget is set at a level which takes full account of the needs of the practice and its patients. There will be no financial disincentive for practices to treat such patients or to accept such patients on to their lists.

Demographic Changes

55. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received about the need to have more up-to-date information on demographic change to areas served by district health authorities when assessing their funding needs.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend the Minister for Health met my hon. Friend and the chairman of Hereford health authority earlier this month to discuss population estimates, among other issues relating to that health authority's funding. Additionally, the Department has received a small number of letters on this subject.

Hospital Waiting Lists

57. Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to reduce the length of hospital waiting lists in England and Wales.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) on 18 January at columns 403-4. The information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

89. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made in reducing patient waiting lists in the northern region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Waiting lists in the northern region have fallen from 47,000 in 1979 to 36,800 in March 1989, a fall of just under 22 per cent.

Next year northern region has been allocated £1·45 million from the waiting list fund. This is in addition to the £5·362 million in the three years to March 1990, which has been used to treat an additional 16,000 in-patients and day cases and 48,000 additional out-patients.

A management team led by John Yates of Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy is examining waiting lists in three northern districts (Newcastle, Durham and East Cumbria). If the team recommends additional funding, allocations will be made in 1990-91 from the £12 million reserved for problem waiting lists.

In addition, we have approved and funded five new consultant posts in northern region from the 100 new consultant posts targeted at districts with long waiting lists.

South West Thames Regional Health Authority

59. Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the level of funding of the South West Thames regional health authority.

Mr. Freeman: South West Thames regional health authority's initial revenue cash limit for 1990-91 is £932,831,000, representing a cash increase of 7·7 per cent. over 1989-90.

HIV Infection

63. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on compensation for patients who are not haemophiliacs who have been affected by HIV through National Health Service treatment.

90. Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on compensation for patients who are not haemophiliacs who have been affected by HIV through National Health Service treatment.

95. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on compensation for patients who are not haemophiliacs who have been affected by HIV through National Health Service treatment.

114. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a further statement on his policy regarding non-haemophiliac National Health Service patients who acquired the AIDS virus through routine blood transfusions during surgery.

128. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on compensation for patients who are not haemophiliacs who have been affected by HIV through National Health Service treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The basis for seeking compensation for injuries alleged to have been suffered through medical treatment is through litigation in the courts. There has never been in this country under successive Governments a general scheme of no-fault compensation for such cases.

The ex-gratia payments for haemophiliacs with HIV recognise the exceptional combination of circumstances of those persons. There are no plans to extend those arrangements to others infected with HIV.

Medical Services Contracts

67. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in the introduction of contracts for medical services within the National Health Service.

Mr. Freeman: The introduction of contracts for services provided by National Health Service hospitals and community units is one of the most significant reforms proposed in the White Paper "Working for Patients". Good progress has been made in preparing for the implementation of this major change once it has been approved by Parliament. On 1 March, I announced the publication of "Contracts for Health Services: Operating Contracts". This builds on and supplements guidance issued in September last year in "Contracts for Health Services: Operational Principles". In particular it contains specimen contracts which have been developed within the National Health Service, largely with financial support from the Department. These specimens show what can be achieved already in specifying the nature and quality of services to be provided for patients. Publishing them with the guidance will assist clinicians and managers across the country to develop useful forms of contract for every part of the service. We intend contracts to be in general use from April 1991.

Health Authorities (Resources)

74. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give further details of the operation of the new system for distributing resources to health authorities.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr.

Shepherd) on 23 January at columns 673-74. Copies of the exposition booklet giving details of the calculation of 1990-91 allocations to regional health authorities have now been placed in the Library.

Eye Tests

75. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for eyesight checks.

145. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for eyesight checks.

147. Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now review his policy of charging for eyesight checks.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no plans to change the current policy on entitlement for free NHS sight tests. We believe it right that those people who can afford to do so should pay for their optical costs. Provision has been made for the more vulnerable in the community, such as children, those in receipt of income support or family credit and people with special medical needs to continue to receive free sight tests under the NHS.

Clinical Regrading

79. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to meet with the chairman of the North West Thames regional health authority to discuss clinical regrading.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

Northumberland Health Authority

80. Mr Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairman of Northumberland health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. and learned Friend has not yet met the chairman of Northumberland health authority.

Information Technology

82. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on working paper No. 11 on information and information technology in the National Health Service.

Mr. Freeman: Seven written responses have been received to date to the consultation, which closes on 30 March 1990. In addition, since publication of the working paper and the associated consultation documents, officials have given a series of presentations in the regions at which views generally supportive of the proposals have been expressed by NHS staff attending. These views will be taken into account in reaching conclusions on the way forward for information systems post-NHS review.

Mental Health Care

85. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give details of the central bridging funds provided for health authorities to provide new community services for the mentally ill and handicapped.

88. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the capital loan fund for mental health projects.

Mr. Freeman: Details of the £50 million capital loans fund were announced by me on 23 January 1990 at column 672. Health authorities have been invited to bid by 30 March for the first tranche of £10 million in the coming financial year (1990-91). Additional sums of £15 million and £25 million will be made available in the second and third years of the rolling programme. To date there have been 14 informal inquiries.

Committee on the Safety of Medicines

91. Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the Committee on the Safety of Medicines.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The names of the committee members are as follows:

Chairman
Professor A. W. Asscher

Members
Professor C. L. Berry
Professor S. S. Bleehen
Professor T. G. Booth
Professor A. M. Breckenridge

Health Authority Deficits

92. Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities expect to be in deficit at the end of the current financial year.

124. Mr. Rees: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities expect to be in deficit at the end of the current financial year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information about the financial position of individual district health authorities centrally.

Cochlear Implants

94. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about progress on the recently announced cochlear implant programme.

Mr. Freeman: Health authorities were asked to submit applications for funding of up to six centres overall for cochlear implants by 28 February. Fifteen applications have been submitted, and are now being considered. I wo[illegible]pe to be able to make an announcement about whi[illegible]tres have been chosen early in April.

Alcoholics

96. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received to ring-fence community care funding for the rehabilitation of alcoholics; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a number of representations about the special needs of problem drinkers within the proposed community care arrangements including a paper from Alcohol Concern, the national voluntary agency on alcohol misuse. Local authorities will be responsible for drawing up plans to meet community care needs of all groups requiring such care; where appropriate we would expect them to include problem drinkers as one of these groups. Effective planning will require that local authorities respond flexibly to local needs and circumstances.

Inflation

97. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate for the level of inflation which will be experienced within the National Health Service in 1990; and what funding will be available to cover the additional costs incurred.

Mr. Freeman: The Government do not make estimates of inflation in the National Health Service before the end of the financial year concerned.

Funding for the NHS, as for most other areas of public expenditure, is based on cash plans agreed in the context of the public expenditure survey and detailed subsequently in the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93" (Cm. 1013).

In 1990-91 the NHS in England alone will have additional resources equivalent to nearly £2·5 billion compared with 1989-90; this includes an extra £166 million announced on 1 February to help meet the additional costs of the 1990 review body pay awards for doctors and dentists and nurses and midwives.

DHA Contracts

100. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposals for contracts within the National Health Service on services to patients.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on provisions for new district health authority contracts with hospitals outside their area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The proposals for contract funding for hospitals by district health authorities within the National Health Service will result in better standards of care and more choice for patients. They will enable the district health authorities to use their resources to obtain the best value for money in terms of high quality consumer-responsive services for their population. Districts will have a clear responsibility to ensure that a full range of health care services is available. They will specify the services required from each hospital or other unit, whether or not it is under their direct managerial control. More important, they will also specify the quality standards expected and ensure that these are met.

Social Work

110. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has not yet met the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work. However, I met the chairman and director on 27 November 1989 at the annual review meeting of the council.

Hospital Projects

112. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital capital projects have been completed or programmed since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: Information held centrally shows that 448 health building schemes each costing over £1 million have been completed in England since 1979. There are currently 516 such schemes in regions' capital programmes with a total value of over £5 billion of which 141 are under construction. This represents the largest sustained capital investment ever in the NHS.

Resource Management

116. Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made on the implementation of resource management.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) on 20 February at column 695.

NHS Service

118. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on action being taken to improve the quality of service being given by the National Health Service.

125. Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken to improve the quality of service being given by the National Health Service.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to improve the quality of care given by the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 20 February at column 712.

Voluntary Groups

119. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what help is being given to voluntary groups working with under five-year-olds.

137. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what help is being given to voluntary groups working with under five-year-olds.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) earlier today.

Intensive Care

121. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he directs regional health authorities to maintain a ratio of intensive care beds per thousand of their population.

Mr. Freeman: No. It is for health authorities to determine the facilities required in the light of local needs.

Hepatitis B

123. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any proposals for the future funding of an educational campaign for hepatitis B high-risk groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The Department recognises the seriousness of hepatitis viruses. A new edition of the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisations' memorandum "Immunisation Against Infectious Disease" will be published shortly and this includes advice on hepatitis B. The Health Education Authority is also reviewing its educational material about sexually transmitted diseases, including hepatitis B.

We are pleased to note a welcome decline in the incidence of hepatitis B from 1,785 reported cases in 1985 to approximately 600 cases in 1989.

Medical Audit

126. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made on the proposals for medical audit.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Good progress is being made towards medical audit with the support of the profession. A total of £31 million has been allocated to the National Health Service and national professional bodies.

Draft health circulars setting the organisational framework required for the successful implementation of medical audit programmes in hospital and general practice have been widely circulated for consultation.

Crown Immunities

130. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the removal of Crown immunities in the National Health Service.

Mr. Freeman: Crown immunity was removed from hospital kitchens and the health and safety legislation was applied to the National Health Service in 1986. We are committed to the extension of this policy to other areas of National Health Service activity wherever it is practicable to do so and provisions to this effect are contained in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

The Government propose to retain Crown immunity in only a few areas relating to insurance and finance matters, where it makes sense to do so and, where abolition would impose an additional administrative burden on the Health Service without any extra benefit accruing to patients or staff. In all other matters, for example relating to building standards, health authorities and National Health Service trusts will be legally obliged to meet legal standards and requirements.

Health Care (Southend)

131. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is Southend health authority's budget for health care; what is the average for other health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The initial revenue allocation to Southend health authority for 1989-90 was £57,555,200. The district's gross revenue expenditure rose by over 66 per cent. in cash terms between 1982-83 and 1988-89, equivalent to 23 per cent. in real terms. Financial allocations to district health authorities are decided by regional health authorities. Overall, resources for the National Health Service have risen by £2·5 billion this year. Next year they will rise by nearly £3 billion more. That is a 20 per cent. cash increase in two years, bringing the total spending on the Health Service up to £29·1 billion for 1990-91. This includes £19 billion for hospital and community health services throughout the United Kingdom—some £15·2 billion in England alone.

Speech Therapists

144. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve the recruitment and maintenance in post of speech therapists.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Improving recruitment and retention are essentially local issues, but health authorities have been encouraged to consider part-time employment, flexible hours and job sharing. The recent pay settlement gives across the board increases of 9 per cent. over an 18-month period commencing 1 April 1989 and provides for a review of the grading structure to be brought forward with any changes to be implemented from 1 October 1990.

Health Authorities (Finance)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will publish for each health authority in Humberside and Yorkshire (a) the net income from private patients and clinics and (b) the amounts written off as bad debts in each year since 1979;

(2) if he will publish for each Yorkshire health authority (a) the net income from private patients and clinics and (b) the amounts written off as bad debts in each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: Following are figures recorded in the 1985-86 to 1988-89 annual accounts of the district health authorities providing health services in Yorkshire and Humberside. The income shown arises from charges to private patients under sections 65 and 66 of the National Health Service Act 1977 and is recorded under each heading net of sums written off in each financial year (which sometimes include amounts due from earlier years). Separate write-off figures for income due under sections 65 and 66 were not collected centrally.

Notes to the table:

1. The table includes all the district health authorities comprising the Yorkshire health region with the addition of Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham and Sheffield health authorities which form part of the Trent region.

2. The table excludes income due under Section 58 of the NHS Act 1977 (which arises mainly from services provided to private health care establishments) and which for the authorities shown totalled some £236,800 in 1988-89. Separate write-off figures for this category of income are not collected centrally.

Disabled People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations he has received from Act Now on full implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986;

(2) what representations he has received on full implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 and in particular on section 3 of that Act.

Mr. Freeman: Since the beginning of this year hon. Members have addressed five parliamentary questions on this issue to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. In addition, an amendment to the National Health Service and Community Care Bill was put down in Committee, the effect of which would have been to implement the remaining sections of the Act. Over this period, the Department also received four letters on the subject, one from Act Now. In two instances, representations made particular mention of section 3.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to complete his consultation on sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: It is too soon to give a precise date. Officials wrote to the local authority associations, asking for their comments by 31 May. This will be followed by discussions, the number and length of which will depend on the initial response.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which Minister in his Department is responsible for full implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will take steps to ensure that all correspondence and representations concerning the Act reach the same section of the Department.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has ultimate responsibility for decisions on implementation of legislation relating to health and personal social services. Correspondence and representations concerning the Act are normally directed to designated officials within the Department.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health with which organisations he is consulting on implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: We are currently consulting the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, and the Association of Directors of Social Services.

Dental Health

Mr. Marland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the chief medical officer's annual dental health report published last month.

Mr. Freeman: In the dental section of his annual report the chief medical officer noted that in common with many other industrialised countries, a substantial improvement in dental health had taken place in the United Kingdom in recent years. This had been manifested particularly in children where a marked decline in dental caries had occurred since the early 1970s. The report went on to detail the changes that had occurred and to consider demographic variations in current levels of disease. Reasons for the changes were discussed and some international comparisons on caries levels were presented. In discussing future prospects for further improvements in the dental health of the population, the report stressed the importance, among other things, of the dissemination of more information to guide the public on dental care, including the labelling of food products to show their sugar content.

Mr. Marland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to what national or international medical studies on dental caries have suggested concerning (a) the frequency of sugar consumption and (b) the amount, in contributing to tooth decay; and which studies have recommended a reduction in sugar consumption.

Mr. Freeman: Scientific literature on the relationship between sugar and dental caries was extensively reviewed by an expert panel of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy in its report "Dietary Sugars and Human Disease" which was published in late 1989. The section devoted to sugars and dental caries contained no fewer than 61 references to world literature. We are not aware of any official report which has not recommended a reduction in sugar consumption.

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Freeman: The Department of Health is not organised on a regional basis. Three functions are, however, provided from a number of locations across England chosen so that the functions may be performed effectively and economically. These are the regional medical service (RMS 170 staff), provided by senior medical officers and medical officers; social services inspectorate (130 staff) provided by assistant chief inspectors and inspectors: and NHS audit (about 200 staff) provided by 10 statutory auditors at principal level and scheduled to become part of the Audit Commission at 1 October 1990. All of these functions are also supported by administrative staff who are included in the figures quoted. The functions of the RMS will progressively be transferred to regional health authorities, family practitioner committees and the Department of Social Security from 1 April 1990. The transfer of responsibility will be complete by 1 April 1991.

In addition some 700 DH headquarters staff work outside London. The regionally based staff account for approximately 12 per cent. of the DH's manpower budget. Non-manpower costs are not identified separately.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has received from the medical profession on measures to reduce infant mortality at birth.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government's reply to the first report from the Social Services Committee Session 1988-89 on perinatal, neonatal and infant mortality (Cm 741) reflected medical advice. The main measures announced in the report were:

(i) the establishment of a working group to report to the Chief Medical Officer on introducing a form of confidential inquiry into stillbirths and infant deaths;

(ii) a requirement for all Regions to have at least one paediatric pathologist in post by April 1991 and to have reviewed their need for further posts by 1992;

(iii) the introduction in all regions where they do not already exist of epidemiological surveys of stillbirths and neonatal deaths;
(iv) The Medical Research Council to undertake a major review of the literature relating to Sudden Infant Death Syndrome and advise on what new research is needed.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies, funded by his Department, are being undertaken into infant mortality.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Medical Research Council, which receives grant in aid from the Department of Education and Science, is the Government agency responsible for the promotion of bio-medical research.

In addition, the Department of Health funds research on public health and health management issues. Expenditure from these funds on maternity and neonatal services is currently running at about £400,000 per annum. The largest single allocation is to the national perinatal epidemiology unit at Oxford whose programme of research consists of three main elements:

(i) surveys to describe the characteristics of people using the perinatal health services, the care they receive and the mortality and morbidity they experience;
(ii) randomised control trials to assess the relative merits of alternative forms of perinatal care;
(iii) formal syntheses and dissemination of the results of research evaluating the effects of care.

Health Authorities (Capital Charges)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is now in a position to publish updated estimates of the capital charges for health authorities under his Department's proposals.

Mr. Freeman: Health authorities are still making good progress in compiling asset registers in preparation for capital charging. Estimates of capital charges will be available when these have been completed and valued, which should be early in the next financial year.

NHS Employees (Outside Interests)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Bridgend may expect to receive a substantive reply to his letter of 8 February to the Minister of State in his Department concerning the answers given by her on National Health Service employment on 5 February, Official Report, column 489.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As the hon. Member will know, I passed his letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and a reply was sent on 12 March. I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave on 5 February at column 489 and on 16 March at column 383 concerning further guidance.

Psychiatric Care

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are in psychiatric care (a) currently, (b) five and (c) 10 years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: It is estimated that there were 56,200 in-patients under the care of consultant psychiatrists in National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units in England on 31 March 1989. This compares with 77,300 at the end of 1979 and 66,000 at the end of 1984.

Management Consultants

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on management consultants by (a) the Department of Health and (b) National Health Service regions and districts in England in each of the 10 years 1979-89; and what quality controls were used by (a) the Department of Health and (b) the National Health Service to ensure that these expenditures are good value for money.

Mr. Freeman: We cannot apportion expenditure between the Departments of Health and Social Security prior to 1985-86. The estimated expenditure for each succeeding financial year from 1985-86 on fees and expenses for management consultants on health matters is as follows:

	£ million
1985-86	0·479
1986-87	2·103
1987-88	1·244
1988-89	1·584
1989-90	4·870

The figures are approximate since expenditure up to and including the 1988-89 year was from a joint health and social security budget. In some cases expenditure has been apportioned where consultants have been engaged on both health and social security matters. The figures also include social services consultancy and some computer consultancy where these cannot be identified separately.

The figure for 1989-90 is estimated expenditure.

The Department of health controls and monitors the use of management consultants in line with the requirements laid down from time to time by the Treasury.

The employment of management consultants by the NHS is a matter for individual health authorities. Their accounts do not separately identify any expenditure incurred.

Breast Cancer Screening

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in the light of clinical and economic evidence produced since the publication of the Forrest report on breast cancer screening, what is the current cost/quality adjusted life year estimate for this procedure.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 16 November at column 432. We have received the report describing the computer model that has been developed as part of the economic evaluation of the United Kingdom trial of the early detection of breast cancer. We understand that one further specific report is planned: on the use of diagnostic resources and costs of treatment. The various elements will then be incorporated into a final report on the economic evaluation of the trial.

In the interim the Department has been looking at the mortality reductions reported in the trial. These suggest that the cost per quality adjusted life year quoted in the Forrest report was of the correct order.

Pensioners (Monitoring)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been undertaken and what conclusions reached on whether annual monitoring of the over 75-year-olds is cost effective.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There is wide support for the over-75s being seen regularly, at least once a year and preferably in their own homes; the objective being to establish whether there are any medical or social conditions which would otherwise go unreported, but are easily remediable.

Such interventions are intended to minimise disability and hence improve the quality of life and to attempt to avoid "crisis" admissions to hospitals.

There are clear cost-effective benefits if the well-being of patients is maintained or improved as a result of the marginal costs involved.

In introducing the requirement in the new contract for general practitioners to offer an annual check-up and a home visit for their patients aged 75 and over, we considered the extensive literature in the field of care of the elderly that is available both in this country and internationally.

Mersey Regional Health Authority

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to increase the budget of Mersey regional health authority.

Mr. Freeman: Mersey regional health authority's initial revenue cash limit for 1990-91 is £722,571,000. This is an increase of £42,291,000 over that authority's initial 1989-90 revenue cash limit.

"Working for Patients"

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on press and public relations and publicity material in connection with "Working for Patients" (a) since it was launched and (b) estimated for 1990-91.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 9 March 1990]: We spent £138,000 on the production of leaflets informing the general public about the White Paper. No further expenditure on public information has been incurred since. The press office of my Department has handled press relations on the subject as part of its ordinary responsibilities.

I do not regard expenditure on communications with and information for the staff of the National Health Service about the implications of the proposed changes for them and their hospitals, as expenditure on press and public relations or publicity.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has about the presence of benzene in irradiated beef.

Mr. Maclean: Benzene is present quite naturally in a wide range of common foods. Information on its presence in irradiated food is limited to one report on beef, which found minute quantities to be present. The levels reported were not only well below those occurring naturally in other foods but were found in a study using a much higher dose level than is proposed for the commercial treatment of foodstuffs.

Animal Medicines

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it remains his policy not to charge industry for the EEC review of the pre-1984 product licences for animal medicines.

Mr. Maclean: No licence fee is charged for a veterinary medicinal product submitted for re-assessment under the terms of the licence review, but the cost of ensuring that these older products meet current standards is recovered through the graded annual fee.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial resources are presently devoted to each environmentally sensitive area in England and Wales; and what is the annual expenditure on the scheme.

Mr. Maclean: Total payments to farmers throughout the United Kingdom under the environmentally sensitive areas schemes (ESAs) in the financial year 1989-90 is forecast to be £12·6 million. The total costs of agreements signed by 31 December 1989 in individual ESAs in England and Wales are:

England
Broads	1,741,000
Pennine Dales	946,000
Somerset Levels and Moors	814,000
South Downs	578,000
West Penwith	340,000
Breckland	457,000
North Peak	687,000
Shropshire Borders	555,000
Suffolk River Valleys	871,000
Test Valey	26,000
Wales
Cambrian Mountains	646,000
Lleyn Peninsula	249,000

Total financial resources devoted to the schemes are a combination of payments to farmers and administration costs. The latter, which include a substantial element attributable to ADAS advice, cannot be calculated separately for each ESA without disproportionate effort.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many of his Department's and Agricultural Development Advisory Service staff are allocated to each environmentally sensitive area in England and Wales; and what is the total staff allocation for the scheme nationally.

Mr. Curry: None of our staff is wholly allocated to a specific environmentally sensitive area. Details of the total manpower expected to be deployed (in man years) in 1989-90 is shown in the table:

MAFF Unit	ESAs Designated in Region	Man years Admin	Man years ADAS
Eastern Region	The Broads Suffolk River Valleys Breckland	5·9	12·5
Midland and Western Region	North Peak[1] Shropshire Borders	3·2	10·3
Northern Region	North Peak[1] Pennine Dales	3·2	10·9

MAFF Unit	ESAs Designated in Region	Man years Admin	Man years ADAS
South East Region	South Downs Test Valley	3·5	8·9
South West Region	West Penwith Somerset Levels and Moors	6·4	10·5
Wales	Lleyn peninsula Cambrian Mountains	[2]—	11·2
Sub-total		22·2	64·3
Headquarters	aspects of all ESAs	6·0	4·7
Total	—	28·2	69·0

[1] The North Peak ESA is administered by two MAFF regions.
[2] Administrative staff in Wales are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales.

British Nutrition Protection Board

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the role and functions of the British Nutrition Protection Board.

Mr. Maclean: I have no knowledge of this organisation, its membership, its role or its functions.

Salmon Dealers

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the Government's reasons for not introducing a salmon dealer licensing scheme in Great Britain.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 6 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) Official Report, column 575.

Agro-food Industry Conference

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department participated in the conference on energy innovation and the agro-food industry, in Amiens on 21 to 23 March.

Mr. Curry: No.

Biotechnology

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implications for the farming industry of the legal protection afforded to biotechnological inventions.

Mr. Maclean: Discussions are still taking place on the European Community proposal for a directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions. We expect consumers and the food and farming industries to benefit from the introduction of such inventions in the same way as they have already benefited from other new technology.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the appearance of symptoms similar to those exhibited by cattle affected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy in antelopes in British zoos; and if he has any plans in the light of this development to take further action to eliminate bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: Five antelopes in British zoos have been confirmed as being affected by a spongiform encephalopathy. The disease occurred in a nyala in 1986 and a gemsbok in 1987, both of which are mentioned in the published report of the Southwood working party on BSE, and in an oryx, a kudu and an eland in 1989. The probable source of infection was via commercial feedstuffs. The use of ruminant protein in ruminant (which includes animals of this kind) feedstuffs has been prohibited since July 1988.

Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for amending the dairy produce quotas regulations.

Mr. Gummer: I have laid before Parliament today the Dairy Produce Quotas (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1990.

The regulations provide a basis for making additional allocations of milk quota to producers with outstanding tribunal awards, small family farms and producers in remote areas, as described in the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) on 13 March (Official Report, columns 192-93). These allocations are intended to help those categories of producer who have suffered disproportionately from the introduction of quotas and subsequent cutbacks in production.

The proposals which we originally put to the Commission contained provision for the loan of quota to new entrants. The Commission's view, however, is that no satisfactory basis exists in Community law for the issue of quota to new entrants on temporary and conditional terms. We have considered whether quota should instead be granted outright to new entrants but have decided against this course. In reaching this conclusion we took into account the strong opposition of the National Farmers Union to the gift of quota to new entrants. We have therefore decided to allocate the 22·5 million litres of quota originally earmarked for a new entrants scheme to family-type farms, which will now receive an increase of 4 per cent. of their existing wholesale quota, and to holders of development awards, which will be made up to approximately 80 per cent. of the original figure after abatement to take account of subsequent across-the-board quota cutbacks.

By ensuring that almost all of the quota is allocated before the end of the current quota year we shall also reduce the potential burden of supplementary levy on all over-quota producers. This represents a potential saving to the industry of £29 million.

The amendments also provide for priority treatment to be given to producers affected by restriction orders served because of the lead contamination of animal feed. Many of those affected will have had to keep animals on farm longer than they otherwise would and their milk production will have increased accordingly. Provision is made for them to receive a priority reallocation of unused quota at year-end subject to the same conditions as producers affected by restriction orders served for animal health reasons.

EMPLOYMENT

Respiratory Illness

148. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information his Department has on the connection between work within the steel industry and development of chronic respiratory illness.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive is aware of reports suggesting a link between work in the steel industry and the development of chronic respiratory disease, but is not satisfied that there is conclusive evidence that the link is causal rather than due to other non-occupational factors.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about his draft proposals to cut funding for training allowances paid in respect of training and enterprise council allowances.

Mr. Eggar: I have received a number of representations from training and enterprise councils (TECs) on general funding issues. TECs will receive agreed resources to carry out their plans and my officials are currently in discussion with individual TECs about the resources that will be made available.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people working in education have been appointed to the board of training and enterprise councils; and if he will list them.

Mr. Eggar: A number of people working in education have been put forward as prospective training and enterprise council (TEC) board members. Each TEC will list in its corporate plan its final board of directors and this will be a public document once the plan is approved.

Skills Training Agency

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much Deloitte Haskins and Sells was paid for work in connection with the sale of the Skills Training Agency.

Mr. Eggar: The amounts, paid to Deloitte Haskins and Sells as at 16 March 1990 were £132,425 for the initial feasibility study, £124,229 for work by Deloitte Corporate Finance as the Secretary of State's main sale adviser, and £42,903 for accountancy work by Deloitte Haskins and Sells. The figures exclude expenses and VAT.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response the Minister of State has had about his offer to meet representatives of the trade unions about position papers prepared by bidders for the Skills Training Agency, together with assessments by the Government Actuary's Department of the successful bidders' pension proposals.

Mr. Eggar: Representatives of the STA trade unions have indicated they would like to take up my offer to meet them. I hope that a date for a meeting can be fixed very shortly.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many young people aged over 18 years are on YTS with special needs (STN) endorsements;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce an increase in the YTS allowance, age-related for 18-year-olds and over, in line with the principle set in April 1988 for income support claimants when rates liability was introduced.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a reply that I gave to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 15 March 1990, Official Report, column 340.

Workplace Health and Safety

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many accidents involving three or more days off work due to back strain or injury were recorded in each year from 1979 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. Nicholls: The available information is given in the table:

Numbers of reported[1] occupational back injuries[2] to employees and self employed persons in Great Britain resulting in absence from work for more than three days[3]

	Number
1979	44,012
1980	37,746
1981	74,097
1982	66,634
1983	[5]
1984	[5]
1985	[5]
[4]1986-87	29,635
[4]1987-88	30,002
[6] [4]1988-89	29,783

[1] Injuries reported to Health and Safety Executive's factory and Agricultural Inspectorates for the years 1981 to 1988-89 and to the factory inspectorate only for 1979 to 1980.

[2] Injuries notified under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980 (NADOR) for 1981 to 1982, and the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985 (RIDDOR) for 1986-87 onwards. Data for the years 1979 to 1980 are based on reports made under various legislation. Because of the changes in reporting arrangements data for these three periods are not directly comparable.

[3] Includes non-fatal major injuries as defined under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations and the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations which are assumed to involve absence from work for over three days. Also includes other injuries causing absence from work for more than three days reported directly to enforcing authorities for the years 1979 to 1980 and 1986-87 onwards, and injuries resulting in claims for industrial injury benefit for the years 1981 to 1982. Figures for 1983 to 1985 not available owing to the cessation of industrial injury benefit.

[4] Years beginning 1 April.

[5] Not available.

[6] Provisional.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will introduce legislation to remove the discrepancies between maximum weights lifted by agricultural workers and textile workers; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on the position regarding manual handling guidance notes; when he expects these to be issued by the Health and Safety Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Commission issued a consultative document in October 1988 proposing new regulations and guidance to protect all workers from injury during manual handling of loads. The effect of these proposals would be to remove discrepancies between the treatment of workers in different industries.

Also in that year the Commission of the European Communities published a draft directive to set minimum standards of protection for workers engaged in manual handling. The directive reached common position on 30 October 1989 and adoption is expected during 1990. The consultation on its proposals helped the Health and Safety Commission in formulating a view on the draft directive and it has now incorporated its own work, including the preparation of guidance, into its plans for implementation of the directive which the current draft requires by 31 December 1992.

Skill Centres

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money has been paid by Astra Training Services Ltd. to the Government for skill training centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The sale of the training business to Astra Training Services Limited will involve a payment from the Government to Astra of some £11 million. This is a price determined in the sale process after open competitive bids and subsequent negotiations. It reflects the costs of turning around a business which is currently unprofitable and creating training businesses with good prospects of viability.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment under what terms of the information memorandum issued by Deloitte Corporate Finance on his behalf the skill centres have been disposed of by his Department; what revenue is expected from sites in the three categories A, B and C; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Under the agreed terms of sale, at 42 skill centres and the Sheffield head office the training business purchaser will take the Government's interest in the site, or a new lease from the landlord. At 10 skill centres the purchaser will take a type A, B or C lease along the lines set out in appendix IV of the information memorandum (a copy of which was placed in the Library on 19 December). These leases will provide for rents to be phased in as set out in the information memorandum, with the total rent for all 10 leases reaching £1,098,600 p.a. in year three. I propose to sell the Government's interests in these 10 sites, subject to the leases to be granted to training business purchasers, later this year, so expect to receive the rental revenue from the leases for only a period of months.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the cost of advertising and securing the sale of skill centres; what fee was received by Deloitte Corporate Finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The cost of advertising the offer for sale of the Skills Training Agency was £13,337. Fees paid to Deloitte Corporate Finance as at 16 March 1990 were £124,229 for its work as the Secretary of State's main sale adviser. In addition, fees of £132,425 had been paid to Deloitte Haskins and Sells in respect of the initial feasibility study, and £42,903 in respect of accountancy work associated with the sale. The figures exclude expenses and VAT.

Figures for the total fees payable to Deloittes and other advisers in respect of the sale will become available once the sale has been concluded and final invoices have been agreed.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when those directors of Astra Training Services Ltd. who are civil servants will be expected to assume full-time duties with the company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The three directors of Astra Training Services Limited who are civil servants will cease to be civil servants and assume full-time duties with the company at the time the sale to Astra is completed. I expect this to be in April or May.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment who conducted negotiations with his Department for the purchase of skill centres by Astra Training Services Ltd.; and if they were civil servants at the time of the negotiations.

Mr. Eggar: Negotiations for the purchase of a training business by Astra Training Services Limited were conducted between Astra's professional advisers and the Government's main sale advisers, Deloitte Corporate Finance. At the time of the negotiations the directors of Astra were civil servants; their professional advisers were not.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the subject matter of the three internal audit reports that were drawn to the attention of a Minister in his Department in 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The three areas drawn to attention of Ministers through senior management were the accuracy of payment of unemployment benefit, employment training overpayments and section 4 tourism grants.

Schools (Wood Treatment Chemicals)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will review the guidelines for the use of lindane, tributyltin, and other anti-rot wood treatment chemicals for use in the construction of schools and other buildings for subsequent occupation by children, subsequent to the problems at Ysgol Gymraeg Treganna, Radnor road, Canton, Cardiff in 1989;

(2) if he will issue new guidelines to education authorities in Wales regarding the use of lindane, tributyltin and other similar anti-rot wood treatment chemicals in the refurbishment of the timbers of old school buildings, following the problems at Ysgol Gymraeg Treganna, Radnor road, Canton, Cardiff in 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: Wood preservatives are approved by Ministers subject to rigid conditions of use which appear on the label of the product. Ministers are advised by the independent advisory committee on pesticides, which, as part of an on-going programme, is currently undertaking reviews of lindane and tributyltin oxide in wood preservatives. I understand that investigations at Ysgol Gymraeg Treganna were unable to establish a link between incidences of sickness and the use of wood preservatives at the school.

SCOTLAND

Law Courts (Television Links)

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he is giving to the provision in Scottish courts of law of live television links from abroad.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate has recently carried out a consultation on whether a provision should be enacted for Scotland to enable evidence to be given in Scottish criminal trials direct from other countries by live television links. There was general support for this proposal. Accordingly an amendment enabling this procedure was tabled on 15 March for consideration at the Committee stage in the House of Lords of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Fish Farms (Crown Estate)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Crown Estate Commissioners fish farming advisory committee was established; when it was first convened; how many times it has sat; how many cases it has heard; what the outcome of those cases has been; and how many times statutory bodies have called for a case to be referred to the advisory committee.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend announced the establishment of the fish farming advisory committee by way of written reply on 19 December 1988. He announced the appointment of the chairman and vice-chairman in May 1989. I understand from the Crown Estate Commissioners that the advisory committee was formally constituted in December 1989 following the nomination of representatives by the statutory authorities in Scotland, and will meet on 19 March to agree procedures. I also understand that there were requests for cases to be referred to the committee before it was formally constituted but none since.

Lowland Airports

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the effect of the change in Scottish lowland airports policy on economic development in Scotland; and if he will make available the evidence on which it is based.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Many of the responses to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport's consultation paper on Scottish lowland airports policy addressed in detail the possible economic effects of the policy options. All points made were assessed and taken fully into account in the review, and it was concluded that the "open skies" decision as subsequently announced would offer greatest benefit to the Scottish economy.

We do not intend to publish the submissions made in response to the consultation paper.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what planned improvements in road and rail services to Prestwick airport he had approved before 6 March; and whether any changes are now being considered.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend gave approval, in September 1989, to proposals for the Ayr road route scheme. This is a joint project between Strathclyde regional council and the Scottish Development Department and, when it is complete, it will be possible to drive from Edinburgh and Glasgow to Prestwick airport entirely on motorway, dual carriageway or four-lane carriageway. I understand that Strathclyde regional council plans to start advance works on its section in June this year. Two further schemes are planned which will upgrade the remaining four-lane sections to dual carriageway.

Discussions will continue between the Scottish Office, Strathclyde passenger transport executive and British Rail about the possibility of building a new station at Prestwick airport. No decision will be taken, however, on whether such investment would be justified until we are in a position to assess the trends in passenger numbers at Prestwick in the light of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport's recent announcement of the outcome of the review of Scottish lowland airports policy.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the figure for the estimated yield of 1p on the basic rate of income tax for Scotland used in the written answer on local income tax to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on 27 February, Official Report, columns 117-19.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The figure was £106 million.

General Practitioners

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those general practitioner practices which have declared an interest in applying for budgetary status.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Forty-one practices in Scotland have so far indicated an interest in the GP funding scheme. Detailed information is not centrally available but the breakdown by health board is given in the table. This is firm evidence that this policy initiative is widely supported by the profession at large.

Health Board	Number of Expressions of Interest

Argyll and Clyde	4
Dumfries and Galloway	2

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the subject matter of the internal audit report produced in the Lord Advocate's Department and drawn to the attention of the Minister in 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The subject matter of the internal audit report which was drawn to the attention of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate was the revision of procedures for the collection of and accounting for fines and fixed penalties imposed in Scottish district courts.

New Dwelling Units

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of new dwelling units which will be built in 1990-91 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No such estimates are made by the Scottish Office. Regional and islands councils in Scotland are responsible for making forward projections for housing in their areas through their structure plans.

Western Scottish Omnibuses Limited

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Clydewest 2000 employee buyout group is treated as a legitimate potential bidder for Western Scottish Omnibuses Limited; and whether it is allowed the same free access to financial information for the employee buyout bid as is being allowed Western Scottish Omnibuses Limited.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is the responsibility of the Scottish Transport Group to implement the Scottish Bus Group disposal programme. After Western Scottish Omnibuses Limited is advertised for sale in due course, an information memorandum, which will include financial information, will be made available to all prospective purchasers of that company who can demonstrate that they have sufficient financial backing, or the prospect of sufficient backing, to mount a serious bid and provided that they have signed and returned a confidentiality undertaking in relation to the use of the information memorandum. I understand that Clydewest 2000 has registered its interests in Western Scottish with the Scottish Transport Group, and the group will therefore contact Clydewest 2000 when the company is being offered for sale.

EC Aid for Rural Areas

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has received from the European Economic Community Commissioner about the levels of aid for rural areas after 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him today by my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for industry and enterprise. The Scottish rural areas eligible for assistance are the Highlands and Islands and Galloway. My hon. Friend the Minister and I will make further representations as necessary in an effort to secure adequate and acceptable EC funding for the areas concerned.

Schools (Assisted Places)

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce the statistics for the assisted places scheme in the 1989-90 school session in Scotland and the income scale which will apply to the scheme in school session 1990-91.

Mr. Lang: At the beginning of the current school session there were 2,689 pupils receiving assistance under the assisted places scheme. Additional pupils will be admitted to assisted places throughout the 1989-90 session and I expect that the final total will be about 2,800. This is in line with our plans to increase the total number of pupils benefiting to about 3,000 by the 1991-92 school year. Eighteen new schools were admitted to the scheme in the current school session, which has widened significantly the choice of school available to parents seeking assistance from the scheme.

The scheme continues to concentrate assistance on lower-income families. In 1989-90 1,106 pupils (41 per cent. of those in the scheme) will be receiving full fee remission because they have a family income of £7,584 per annum or less. A further 179 pupils (7 per cent.) have family incomes between £7,585 and £8,500 per annum and 183 (7 per cent.) between £8,501 and £9,500.

For school session 1990-91 I propose to lay regulations before the House in due course providing for progressive parental contributions for one assisted pupil in relation to family income as follows:

Part of relevant income to which the specified percentage applies	Parental contribution (percentage)
That part (if any) which exceeds £8,034 but does not exceed £8,735	9
That part (if any) which exceeds £8,735 but does not exceed £9,449	12
That part (if any) which exceeds £9,449 but does not exceed £10,865	15
That part (if any) which exceeds £10,865 but does not exceed £13,043	21
That part (if any) which exceeds £13,043 but does not exceed £15,885	24
That part (if any) which exceeds £15,885	33

The relevant income scale is open ended, but the remission can of course be given only where the parental contribution is less than the school tuition fee.

Earnings

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish tables showing the proportion of (i) manual, (ii) non-manual and (iii) all full-time employees earning less than (a) £160, (b) £150, (c) £170, (d) £120 and (e) £110 per week for (1) men, (2) women and (3) all full-time employees, excluding overtime pay, in Scotland.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for improving the supply of speech therapists in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: A new manpower planning steering group has been set up; regular staffing surveys are undertaken; employment initiatives to improve the retention and recruitment of staff are being developed; limits on the recruitment of students have been lifted and the provision of places is regularly monitored; refresher courses for returners are planned. Regular meetings are held with the profession about training and other manpower issues.

Gaelic Language

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information is available, following analyses of the 1981 census on (a) the marriage of Gaelic speakers and non-Gaelic speakers to Gaelic-speaking and non-Gaelic-speaking partners, (b) the incidence of Gaelic-speaking ability amongst the children of Gaelic and non-Gaelic-speaking parents and (c) the incidence of Gaelic language speaking abilities in each socio-economic group; and what plans there are to publish such information.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 19 March 1990]: Information from the census is either included in reports laid before Parliament and subsequently published or is produced at the discretion of the Registrar-General in response to a request from a customer, who is required to pay the cost of production.

No information of the type mentioned was included in the published Gaelic report and there are no plans for further publications. I understand that the Registrar-General has received a customer request for such information and is currently considering the technical and resource implications. Provided there are no insuperable difficulties and agreement can be reached on the cost, the Registrar-General will provide the information.

District Councils (Borrowing Powers)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on increasing the borrowing powers of district councils which have no further disposable assets to sell.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 March 1990]: In determining non-housing capital allocations to district councils my right hon. and learned Friend takes into account all factors known to him, including councils' patterns of receipts raised in recent years and their own forecasts of receipts likely to be raised in future.

Glasgow District Council

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from Glasgow district council seeking further general services capital allocation to meet commitments given by the council at the request of the Office of Arts and Libraries.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 March 1990]: My officials have received a letter from the City of Glasgow district council about its general services capital consent allocation which mentions, among other things, commitments made by the council in 1986 when it accepted nomination as the European City of Culture.

Education Spending

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money would not have been spent on Scottish education if regional councils had kept to Government guidelines in each of the years since 1979-80.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The guidelines which the Government issued to local authorities for the greater part of this period were in respect of their total expenditure. Spending decisions on individual services, such as education, are as they always have been entirely a matter for local authorities themselves.

Child Care Facilities

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to make extra child care facilities available in Scotland to meet the need for extra women workers.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The Government are encouraging employers to consider provision of child care as part of their measures to attract women into employment, as numbers of young people becoming available for work decline. Private sector employers may themselves provide child care facilities, which are allowable against corporation tax, or act in partnership with other employers, public authorities and voluntary organisations.

We continue to give grants to voluntary organisations concerned with child care and through revenue support grant we contribute to the provision made by local authorities.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inspectors' Reports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make it his policy to include in the annual report published by his Department in accordance with section 729 of the Companies Act 1989 (a) details of the non-departmental inspectors appointed by him and (b) the cost of each published report.

Mr. Redwood: I have no objection in principle to including in the companies annual report the names of inspectors appointed by me, in those cases where the appointment is announced, together with the cost of each published report. Such information will be considered for inclusion in the next report.

Company Accounts

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to amend section 15 of the Companies Act 1989 to require all summary financial statements to include a warning to investors that such financial statements cannot be relied upon for making investment decisions.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to regulation 5(e) and (f) of the Companies (Summary Financial Statement) Regulations 1990 (SI 1990/515) which were laid before Parliament on 9 March.

Accounting and Auditing

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration his Department has given since June 1979 to setting up an independent body to regulate the accounting and auditing industry.

Mr. Redwood: A comprehensive review of departmental papers since June 1979 has not been attempted. However, in 1986 the Department issued a consultative document which made a number of suggestions on how the eighth EC company law directive on the qualifications of auditors might be implemented in the United Kingdom. Among these was the possibility that a statutory body broadly along the lines of the General Medical Council might be created and have conferred upon it the task of supervising professional accountancy bodies and ensuring that they complied with the directive.

In the light of the responses to that document, the Government decided that the legislation implementing the directive should confer the necessary powers on the Secretary of State, but that he should be able to set up a statutory body and transfer to it many of those powers. Part II of the Companies Act 1989 provides for this arrangement. As the Government made clear during the passage of the Companies Bill, however, we have no present intention to set up a statutory body.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to bring into operation section 121 of the Companies Act 1989.

Mr. Redwood: Section 121 will come into force on 1 April. We plan to make regulations under the new section 390B of the Companies Act 1985 (which is inserted into that Act by section 121) in the summer.

Waste Water and Waste Disposal

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department will be represented at the international trade fair on waste water and waste disposal on 22 to 26 May.

Mr. Forth: There will be no ministerial visit to the ninth international trade fair for waste water and waste disposal: sewage, refuse, recycling, public cleansing, street maintenance and winter road service (IFAT '90), Munich, 22-26 May 1990. However, official representatives from my Department will be attending.

House of Fraser

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to (a) clear demarcation of responsibility, (b) knowledge of one's client, (c) appropriate procedures for advisers, (d) relationships with the media, (e) relationships with the regulatory authorities and (f) loopholes in the code: 25.1.3 (p503).

Mr. Ridley: I refer the hon. Member to the answers to her questions Nos. 111 to 134 and 137.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to false evidence to inspectors: 1.29, p. 11.

Mr. Ridley: The giving of false evidence orally on oath or under affirmation is an offence under section 1 of the Perjury Act 1911. Similarly where false information has been submitted in written form but is subsequently adopted under oath, there is also an offence under section 1 of the Perjury Act 1911.

There is no present need to amend the legislation.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the Companies Act 1985 as amended that the statutory language needs to be reconsidered in the context of the power to require oral evidence: 1.26 p. 10;

(2) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the powers of inspectors to require the production of documentary evidence: 1.26. p. 10;

(3) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the powers of inspectors to require the production of documentary evidence.

Mr. Ridley: Contrary to the implications of these questions, the concerns expressed by the inspectors in paragraph 1.26 of their report have been met by section 56(3) of the Companies Act 1989.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to take any action in response to the House of Fraser Holdings plc report which —25.1.2 p. 503—concluded that to give Government clearance to a controversial bid, such as that for the House of Fraser, put intolerable strain on the Office of Fair Trading and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Ridley: I am satisfied that under present legislative and administrative arrangements both my Department and the Office of Fair Trading are equal to the demands placed on them in scrutinising mergers, controversial or otherwise, which qualify for investigation.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to advisers who give evidence or references to the Office of Fair Trading and the Department of Trade and Industry: 25.6.3. p. 515;

(2) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the role and responsibilities of parties appearing before the Office of Fair Trading: 25.6.3. p. 515;

(3) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the Office of Fair Trading time and limits for the provision of evidence on identified public interest issues: 25.6.3. p. 515.

Mr. Ridley: With regard to the recommendation on time limits in paragraph 25.6.3(ii), there is always a balance to be struck between allowing enough time to weigh up the facts and acting quickly to remove market uncertainty. Within these constraints, it is for the Director General of Fair Trading to determine when he is in a position to submit his advice to me. New procedures under the Companies Act 1989 are to come into force next month under which companies which voluntarily pre-notify mergers can usually expect a decision from the Secretary of State within 20 days of notification.

The recommendation in paragraph 25.6.3(iii) relates to the role and procedures to be followed by advisers. It contains good advice which I am sure advisers will wish to consider and act upon.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the procedures available to inspectors to ensure the confidentiality of their proceedings: 1.30, p. 12.

Mr. Ridley: Experience shows that the circumstances which can arise vary widely from case to case and the need for legislation is not readily apparent and in any event might be difficult to enforce. However, in the light of the inspectors' comments, the position will remain under review.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the role of the Secretary of State: 25.6.3. p. 516.

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree with the suggestion that I should reach my decisions on merger situations on the basis of facts found by others. That is what already happens.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the need for a practice note by the takeover panel on the standards of care in the preparation of offer documents: 25.7.9, p. 517;

(2) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to standards of care in the preparation of offer documents: 25.7.9, p. 517.

Mr. Ridley: One of the general principles set out in the takeover code states that any document about an offer must, as is the case with a prospectus, be prepared with the highest standards of care and accuracy. This is supplemented by specific rules about offer documents. These rules are clear and are well understood, including by financial advisers. The question of an additional practice note is a matter for the takeover panel.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the giving of false evidence to Companies Act inspectors: 1.31, p. 12.

Mr. Ridley: Where, under section 8 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, a court has to determine whether a person's conduct in relation to a company makes him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company, the court will have regard to the matters mentioned in part I of schedule 1 to that Act. Among the matters there mentioned are "any misfeasance or breach of any fiduciary duty or other duty by the director in relation to the company".

However, schedule 1 is not an exhaustive list of categories of unfitness and the court could also take other conduct in relation to the company into account in determining a person's unfitness.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations of the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the internal procedures to be followed by financial advisers: 25.4.6. p.511;

(2) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the position of a financial adviser acting on his client's behalf—specifically: 25.3.7. p.508;

(3) why he has decided not to implement the House of Fraser Holdings plc report on the recommendations relating to the financial advisers' acceptance of instructions from clients: 25.4.5 p.510;

(4) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations of the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the process of taking on new clients: 25.4.2 p.509;

(5) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations of the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the acceptance of written material from other advisers: 25.4.4 p.510;

(6) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations of the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the process of financial advisers taking on clients' references: 25.4.3 p.509;

(7) why he has decided not to take any action to implement the House of Fraser Holdings plc report which concluded—25.2.6 p.506—that more care will have to be given in future to defining more clearly the respective roles and responsibilities of each adviser, and to define more clearly what is, or what ought to be, expected of them in the role, in relation to the City code and the interaction with the regulatory authorities and more generally;

(8) why he has decided to take no action to respond to the conclusion in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report —25.3.3 p.507—that there is a need for a clear definition of the extent of the responsibilities of the financial adviser to be sure of his facts before he makes such statements in the name of his bank.

Mr. Ridley: These recommendations are not addressed to the Government. They concern the role and procedures to be followed by professional advisers in relation to their clients. They contain good advice which I am sure advisers and those responsible for setting standards of conduct for advisers will wish to take into account.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the Office of Fair Trading: 25.6.3. p.515 and public interest issues, other than competitions, in a proposed merger.

Mr. Ridley: It is already the practice of the Office of Fair Trading to discuss with the parties any public interest issues relevant to a merger, not just competition aspects.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the need for the City code to apply to non-corporate owners of shelf companies: 25.7.2 p.516.

Mr. Ridley: The takeover code does not lay down specific rules for offers by non-corporate owners of shelf companies. However, following a review of the provisions of the code, the takeover panel has for some time in practice required non-corporate offerers to provide more information about their finances and the key individuals. I understand that the panel's existing guidance on this will shortly be reflected in amendments to the code.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the powers of inspectors to have access to private bank accounts in order to trace money which has gone out of or into a company: 1.28, p. 11.

Mr. Ridley: Contrary to the implications in this question, the concerns expressed by the inspectors have been met, so far as is possible under United Kingdom law, by amendments to section 434, 436 and 452 of the Companies Act 1985 introduced by section 56(3) and (6) and section 69(3) of the Companies Act 1989 and by the repeal of section 435 of the 1985 Act.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations of the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the need for a code of standards of responsibility to be observed by advisers appearing before the Office of Fair Trading: 25.6.2. p. 514;

(2) why he has decided not to implement the recommendations in the House of Fraser Holdings plc report relating to the operation of the Office of Fair Trading: 25.6.2. p. 514.

Mr. Ridley: Section 151 of the Companies Act 1989, which will come into effect on 1 April, makes it a specific criminal offence to mislead the competition authorities. This should strengthen the position of the Office of Fair Trading. The question of a code of standards is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading.

Additionally, as paragraph 25.6.3 of the report makes clear, it is the duty and responsibility of advisers to give evidence or references only about facts of which they have knowledge. I am sure that they and their professional bodies will wish to consider and act upon this advice.

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he gave in deciding not to use his discretionary powers under section 8 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 against the directors of House of Fraser plc to whether the public interest aspects were affected by the absence of outside shareholders in that company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 15 March 1990]: I gave appropriate consideration to the shareholder position and to other factors.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions and for what role Kleinwort Benson has been commissioned by his Department since he received the report on the House of Fraser.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: None.

Unit Trusts

Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to be able to publish revised proposals for new kinds of authorised unit trusts.

Mr. Redwood: A further consultation document including revised draft regulations was published yesterday. Comments are invited by 30 June 1990.

The draft regulations take account of comments received since proposals for new kinds of funds were announced in 1987. In particular, the earlier proposal for "mixed funds" is to be delayed until experience in operating futures and options and properties funds has been established. Further views are being sought on the scope of the provisions dealing with efficient portfolio management, the idea of two classes of futures and options funds (low and high exposure funds), and a new class of fund investing in warrants.

EC Aid to Rural Areas

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice he has received from the European Economic Community Commissioner about future levels of aid for rural areas after 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The European Commission has proposed a total "indicative appropriation" of 335 mecu for 1989-1993 grants to United Kingdom rural areas from the Community's three structural funds under their "objective No. 5(b)" (the development of rural areas). The proposal implies in particular that the United Kingdom rural areas concerned would receive no new European regional development fund assistance after their present programmes of grant from that fund expire in 1991 or 1992.

The Government have therefore asked the Commission to reconsider its proposal. Discussions between Government Departments and the Commission are continuing, and I cannot predict the outcome. My right hon. Friends and I will make further representations to the Commission, as necessary, at the appropriate stage.

Grants under the funds' objectives Nos. 3 (combating long-term unemployment), 4 (integration of young people into employment) and 5(a) (adjustment of agricultural structures) are also available in the areas concerned, and are not at issue.

Eastern Europe

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, during his recent visit to Poland, he raised the potential for the United Kingdom to provide pollution abatement technology and technical advice of how to clean up polluted land and water.

Mr. Forth: Yes. This issue was raised by the director of my Department's east European branch during a meeting with Mr. Kwiat Kowski at the Ministry for Environmental Protection and Natural Resources. The problems are daunting, but we made the Polish authorities aware of particular ways in which British companies could contribute to cleaner industrial processes. Both the Davy Group and John Brown plc were represented.

Aircraft Radios

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the percentage increase in the charges most recently announced by his Department in respect of the licensing of aircraft radios; and why it was decided not to increase the charges in line with inflation.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 15 March 1990]: For nearly 4,000 aircraft the Wireless Telegraph Act licence fee remains unchanged at the level set in 1986 (£25). For about 400 aircraft with maximum approved take-off weights between 2,730 and 5,700 kg the fee was increased by 1,000 per cent. on 1 November 1989, and for about 1,000 larger aircraft an increase of 2,000 per cent. was made.

These increases were introduced to ensure recovery of the full costs of the work done by my Department for civil aviation use of radio. The needs of commercial aircraft operators account for a large share of these costs. It was therefore considered that those best placed to meet these costs would be the operators of larger aircraft. Because there are relatively few aircraft in these categories the sum of money involved, though small in itself (some £600,000 a year), necessarily involved large increases when shared among only 1,400 aircraft.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the reply by the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North on 2 March, Official Report, column 345, what legal basis in the example given the European Commission has to approve or disapprove the sale of land other than the shipbuilding site where closure aid has been allowed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The wider remedial package for Sunderland was approved under the Commission of the European Communities' sixth directive on aid to shipbuilding and under articles 92-93 EEC. It is under these instruments that the Commission may reach a view on the use of land for shipbuilding in Sunderland outside the immediate confines of the former shipbuilding site.

Investment

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, area by area and industry by industry, each case where Her Majesty's Government have a policy of opposing investment in a specific industry in a specific area.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Subject to observance of the United Kingdom's EC or other international obligations, Her Majesty's Government have no such policy, although planning requirements may impact upon specific developments in specific areas.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Charge

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland who are eligible for a rebate of the community charge will not receive the rebate because it falls under the minimum amount payable; and what is the total sum involved in 1989-90.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is estimated that 23,000 additional benefit units (approximately 32,000 individuals) might receive community charge rebate in Scotland in 1989-90 if there was no minimum amount payable, at a total cost approaching £450,000.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the amount and (b) the proportion of net incomes after rebates, adjusted for family size, which households paid in domestic rates in 1987-88; and what estimates he has made of what these figures would be if the community charge were in operation in 1987-88, broken down into decile groups.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Figures are not available for Scotland alone. The information for 1987-88, on a Great Britain basis, is set out in the table. The figures requested by the hon. Member for the community charge are not available.

Average weekly equivalised household rates by decile of equivalised household income
1987

Decile	Average household rates	Percentage of net income paid in rates
Lowest	3·30	8·2
2	4·20	7·9
3	4·90	7·9
4	4·80	6·8
5	4·30	5·3
6	4·30	4·6
7	4·50	4·1
8	4·70	3·7
9	5·20	3·3
Highest	6·90	2·5
Total	4·70	4·4

Notes:
1. Household income is defined as income from all sources less income tax and national insurance contributions.
2. Values are of equivalised household rates, ie adjusted for household size and composition, and scaled so that the rates for a single person household remain the same. Thus the cash figures, though averaged across the whole population, are equivalent to £ per week for a single adult household.

War Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individual claims for war pensions are currently outstanding; what is the average interval from receipt of application to decision; and what was the comparable figure in each of the previous five years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: At 9 March 1990 there were 20,418 claims for war disablement pension outstanding. The average time taken to clear a claim at the end of February 1990 was 35·5 weeks. War pensions work is complex and it takes time to gather the necessary evidence often going back over 40 years; the obtaining of service documents and consultants' reports in particular take considerable time. Comparable figures for each of the previous five financial years were:

	weeks
1988-89	29·5
1987-88	27·3
1986-87	42·4
1985-86	22·6
1984-85	20·8

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what compensation other than backdated payments is available to those allocated a war pension after more than two years has elapsed between applications and decisions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There is no statutory provision for compensation when payment of a war pension or a social security benefit has been delayed. However, ex-gratia compensation can be considered in certain circumstances where there has been clear and unambiguous departmental error.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what happens to the backdated payments of war pensions if the person to be in receipt of such payments dies while his Department is processing the application.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: If a claim for war pension is under consideration when a claimant dies the arrears of any subsequent award are normally paid to his next-of-kin.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the longest time his Department has taken between receipt of a war pension claim and final decision to award a war pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that the information is not available.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when his Department received the 13 May 1988 application for war pension of Mr. Joseph Davies of 30 Aspley Park Drive, Aspley, Nottingham; and when he will give Mr. Davies his reply.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Mr. Davies's claim for a war pension was received on 19 May 1988. The Department's doctors advised that in order to give a decision on his claim it would be necessary for Mr. Davies to be examined by a consultant. Unfortunately, considerable difficulty has been experienced in arranging a consultant's examination, but I understand that he is now due to be seen next month. Mr. Davies will be given a decision as soon as possible after the examination. The delay in bringing this matter to a conclusion is very much regretted.

Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the numbers and percentages of (a) women and (b) men in receipt of one-parent benefit (i) in 1979 and (ii) in 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Before 1981 one-parent benefit was known as child benefit increase. The information requested is set out in the table.

Child Benefit Increase/One Parent Benefit: Male and Female Claimants

	Women		Men
	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.	Total
1979	334,000	87	50,000	13	384,000
1989	637,000	91	60,000	9	698,000

Notes:
1. Figures are for 31 December of each year and are rounded.
2. Source Departmental records.

Hospital Visits (Travel Costs)

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effect on parents of recent changes in the social fund and community care grants reimbursement of travel costs to parents of children in hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: There have been no such changes.

Social Security Spending

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to give a substantive answer to the questions of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, tabled for priority written answer on 5 March, on information on (a) the percentage of and real terms increase in spending on benefits attributable to an increase in the number of beneficiaries and (b) the total number of benefit claimants between 1979-80 and 1989-90.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to him today.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 64, what information on the percentage of real terms increase in spending on benefits attributable to an increase in the number of beneficiaries is available to him without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 March 1990]: Increases in the numbers of beneficiaries for particular benefits may have a simple demographic origin, but when more money is spent as a result of a policy change or through a longer effect such as the growth of additional pensions or increasing entitlements to income-related benefits, the extra costs often cannot be attributed simply and straightforwardly to changes in numbers of benefit units. Prior to 1989-90 for instance, real terms increases in expenditure on retirement pension, other than additional pension, will have been primarily attributable to the demographic trend of an aging population whereas for a period from October 1989 changes will have been significantly affected by the abolition of the pensioners earnings rule. Similarly, the introduction of family credit has been associated with a 50 per cent. increase in the number of recipients compared with family income supplement, but it is not easy to categorise the 100 per cent. increase in expenditure that occurred. Full analyses along these lines for individual benefits would involve many arbitrary judgments, and no such analyses are available.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) when he expects to give a substantive answer to the question of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, tabled for priority written answer on 8 January, about the basis of his calculation that average incomes of pensioners had increased by about 23 per cent. since 1979;

(2) when he expects to provide substantive replies to the questions tabled by the hon. Member for Oldham, West for priority written answer on (a) 26 February about the proportion of women pensioners receiving national insurance pensions on their husband's contributions and an income support pension; (b) 9 February about the savings as a result of the break in the pension uprating and earnings link; (c) 23 January about the additional gross and net cost of uprating the basic national insurance pension and (d) 22 January about the cumulative increase above inflation on the basic national insurance pension in specified periods;

(3) when he expects to provide substantive replies to the questions of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, tabled for priority written answer on 26 February on (a) pensioners' income after the deduction of housing costs and (b) net income at 1986 prices of pensioner tax units who obtained all their income from state benefits.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I am answering today the hon. Member's question about the proportion of women pensioners receiving pensions on their husbands' contributions, and about the costs of uprating the basic national insurance pension in line with earnings rather than prices over the period 1980 to 1989. I expect shortly to be able to give him a comprehensive answer covering the available information on his question concerning changes in various components in pensioners' incomes, including state benefits, broken down where possible to deciles of income distribution, using the latest information drawn from the 1987 family expenditure survey data now available.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he has any figures available to show the additional gross and net cost of uprating the basic national insurance pension in line with average earnings in each year from 1980 to 1989, inclusive;

(2) what have been the savings each year to the Government since 1979 as a result of the break in the pension uprating and earnings link both at current prices and at constant 1990 prices; and what has been the cumulative saving over the whole of this period.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answers 23 January and 9 February 1990]: The table shows the gross additional cost of uprating retirement pension in line with average earnings since 1980-81. It is not possible to provide net costs for each year, but in 1989-90 the net cost would have been £3·28 billion allowing for reduction of £130 million in income support and £770 million in housing benefit.

It should be noted that any such cost would attract consequent increase in the national insurance contribution. It is estimated that the necessary increase in contribution rate to support the additional cost in 1989 if divided equally between employers and employees would be 1·15 per cent. on the basic rate of both employers' and employees' contributions, increasing them to 11·6 per cent. and 10·15 per cent. respectively. This would have meant for example a contribution increase for an employee on average earnings of £2·70 per week, together with an additional contribution of £3·20 per week for his employer.

Gross cost—1989 prices

	£ billion
1980-81	0·01
1981-82	0·31
1982-83	0·44
1983-84	0·47
1984-85	1·10
1985-86	1·24
1986-87	2·28
1987-88	3·10
1988-89	3·86
1989-90	4·17

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) on 24 January, Official Report, column 702, what was the equivalent increase in pensioners' income after the deduction of housing costs.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 26 February 1990]: I regret that information is not available in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of women pensioners receive (a) a national insurance pension on their husband's contributions and (b) an income support pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 26 February 1990]: Latest available information shows that in March 1989 24·1 per cent. (1,549,080) of women pensioners received a national insurance pension on the basis of their husbands' contributions. In May 1988 18·5 per cent. (1,185,000) of single women aged 60 and over were in receipt of income support.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the percentage increase in the total number of benefit claimants between 1979-80 and 1989-90; and if he will break this down to give the figures for (a) the elderly, (b) the sick and disabled, (c) families, (d) unemployed people, (e) widows and orphans and (f) others.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 5 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 12 February at columns 84-85. Information is not available in the form requested, since claimants may receive more than one benefit at any one time.

ENVIRONMENT

Property Services Agency

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenders the Property Services Agency has been invited to submit for work at 10 Downing street; and what is the number of contracts arising from those tenders which were secured.

Mr. Chope: PSA is responsible for building works and maintenance services to No. 10 Downing street. Since 1984, Departments have been free to undertake at their expense some minor work including internal decoration using contractors of their choice. PSA has not submitted tenders for such work.

Recycled Newsprint

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has received to his letter to the proprietors of national newspapers on the percentage of recycled paper in newsprint used by them.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have received responses so far from the following:

Today
The Guardian
The Daily Telegraph
The Sunday Correspondent
Daily Mail and General Trust
Associated Newspapers
Express Newspapers
Lonrho
News International

The responses to date indicate that there is a substantial variation in the use of recycled paper by newspapers, although differences of definition do not facilitate direct comparisons. We intend to follow up these and any further responses with the proprietors of the newspapers concerned and with the Newspaper Publishers Association and the Newspaper Society.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the safety net figure for (a) Grimsby and (b) Hull on a per capita basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Charge payers in Grimsby will each receive £46 from the safety net. Charge payers in Kingston upon Hull will each receive £74. The difference in the receipts reflects the different effects on the domestic sector in each authority of the changes in local government finance from 1 April. The details of the calculation are set out in the Revenue Support Grant Transition Report (England) made on 21 December 1989 and approved by the House on 18 January.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to substitute a single community charge or a single business rate when the proprietor of a small business lives on the business premises as part of the duties involved in the business.

Mr. Chope: The community charge and the uniform business rate are distinct forms of charging; the former relates to individuals and the latter to the use of non-domestic property. There should be no difference in principle between a proprietor of a business who lives away from his workplace paying the community charge at one address and business rates at another, and that of a proprietor who lives and works at the same address. In the latter case rates will be charged only on the non-domestic use of the property, not on any living accommodation.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 7 March, whether he will give the information requested by the hon. Member for Tiverton on 7 March for the financial year 1990-91 only, in respect of (a) England and (b) Devon.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 14 March 1990]: When setting the level of total standard spending (TSS) and RSG for 1990-91, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State took into account our best estimates of the costs of the new burdens falling on local authorities as a whole in 1990-91, as well as all other relevant factors. Neither the total for TSS nor that for RSG separately identifies an amount for these costs.

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of exempting all non-employed YTS trainees with STN endorsements from paying the community charge.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 19 March 1990 (Official Report, Volume 169, column 482).

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his current estimate of the number of districts and the number of households in each that will qualify for rebate of poll tax under the Government's undertaking that couples will not be asked to pay more than £156 more than they were paying in rates.

Mr. Chope: I have no estimates of numbers qualifying for transitional relief in the areas of individual local authorities.

My right hon. Friend did not give the undertaking mentioned. With transitional relief two-adult households will pay no more than £156 extra if their community charge is set at or below the assumed charge for their area, set out in the Community Charge Transitional Relief Report (England). Local authority spending decisions may lead households to have larger increases in bills.

Cycling (Royal Parks)

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on making cycle routes across London's royal parks part of the 1,000-mile strategic cycle route network in London.

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to consider proposals from the relevant authorities for including the existing cycleways in the royal parks in the strategic cycle route network.

Liverpool (Funding)

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been awarded in grants to Liverpool under estate action in each of the last three years.

Mr. Chope: In the last three years no grants, only additional housing investment programme resource cover, have been awarded to Liverpool under the estate action programme. The total amount is £6,642,008 split 1987-88 nil; 1988-89 £200,000; 1989-90 £6,442,008.

Building Regulations

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to review building regulations to provide better protection for buildings from damage from high winds.

Mr. Chope: The Building Research Establishment has been asked to investigate the damage caused to buildings during recent gales, as a specific task under the research programme sponsored by the Department. A detailed BRE report on this subject will be produced in the near future and BRE has already published guidance on inspection and appraisal of buildings with lightweight roofs with a pitch of 25 deg or less. If the BRE investigations indicate that amendments may be required to the building regulations, proposals will be issued for consultation in the usual way. The Department has also been in touch with the British Standards Institution about the implications for codes relating to the structural stability of buildings.

New Dwellings

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of new dwellings units which will be built in 1990-91 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector.

Mr. Chope: The Department does not make forecasts of house building completions.

Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by local government officials on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(2) what was the average pension paid to local government officials who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by local government officials who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This information is not available centrally.

Housing Starts

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new housing starts there were in the York parliamentary division for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: A total of 209 dwellings were reported as started in the York district council area in 1989. Figures for 1987 and 1983 appear in tables 1.8 and 1.4, respectively, of "Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Areas: 1980 to 1988"; those for 1979 appear in "Local Housing Statistics No. 59" table 4(b). Copies of both publications are in the Library.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to ensure that the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 are consistently applied in accordance with directives 84/661/EEC and 86/297/EEC.

Mr. Trippier: The Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 implement the provisions of Council directives 84/631/EEC and 86/279/EEC and two related Commission directives. Enforcement of the provisions is primarily a matter for waste disposal authorities and comprehensive advice is contained in circular 16/89 issued by the Department.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to revise the operation of the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988; what discussions he has had; and with whom.

Mr. Trippier: The Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 will need modification in due course to implement future changes in Community law which, inter alia, will enable member states to ratify the Basel convention. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has raised the matter in the EC Environment Council and detailed discussions within the Community are under way.

Sports Clubs (Rates)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to give mandatory rating relief for local sports clubs.

Mr. Chope: No.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has commissioned any studies into the effects on local sports clubs of the uniform business rate.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer which I gave on 19 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess).

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to issue advice to local authorities as to how they should exercise their discretion to give rating relief to local sports clubs.

Mr. Chope: A practice note on the operation of discretionary rate relief, which included suggested criteria for use by local authorities in considering applications for relief, was issued to authorities in England and Wales in November 1989. A copy is in the Library.

Ballykelly Army Base

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on his response to representations that a paramilitary fraud ring has been operating in Ballykelly army base in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chope: This case is being investigated by the police.

Hindu Temple, Hertsmere

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue his decision on the appeals by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) against planning decisions by Hertsmere borough council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: After carefully considering the reports of the inspector following two public inquiries, I have accepted his conclusion that the current use of Bhaktivedanta manor at Letchmore Heath for large-scale public worship and religious festivals is not appropriate in that location, where the local residents can rightfully expect a way of life without such intrusion and disruption. I have also decided that the much larger facilities proposed at Elstree would not be appropriate in that very vulnerable part of the metropolitan green belt. Those decisions do not of course affect ISKCON's existing entitlement to use Bhaktivedanta manor as a residential college with its own shrine.

I fully support the aspirations of members of the Hindu community to worship in their own way and in fitting conditions. I also recognise the religious importance of the temple at Bhaktivedanta manor for the Hindu community. I have therefore been concerned that ISKCON shall have ample opportunity to identify a suitable alternative, either on a new site or by conversion of existing buildings elsewhere. Exceptionally, therefore, I have decided to extend the period recommended by the inspector for compliance with the council's enforcement notice to cease using Bhaktivedanta manor for public worship and religious festivals from six months to two years. That period will also provide added assurance to the residents of Letchmore Heath that the disturbance to their way of life will come to an end within a reasonable time.

I expect ISKCON to make every effort to take advantage of this opportunity to find an alternative which would be more in harmony with its surroundings. I see no reason why such an alternative, with good transport access and satisfactory car parking, cannot be found. It is not open to me as Secretary of State to indicate where such an alternative might be found, but I can assure ISKCON that any application which needs to be referred to me under planning legislation will be considered expeditiously, and with due regard to its special needs. My formal decision is being issued to the appeal parties today.

Councillors (Employment)

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether under part V of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 a sitting member of a local authority who is employed by a local authority-controlled company will be able to serve his full time on that local authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 12 March 1990]: Further to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on Monday 26 February, I have today written to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), to say that transitional arrangements will be made to allow members employed by a local authority-controlled company who are elected members of that authority when paragraph 21 of schedule 11 to the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 comes into force, to remain in office until the end of their elected term.

River Systems

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what has been the general rate of improvement or decline over the last 10 years in (a) the north-west river systems and (b) the south-east river systems; and if he will make a statement about his additional plans for clean-up and tightening of regulations;

(2) which pollutants were present and at what level in the River Mersey system (a) in 1980 and (b) at the present time;

(3) which pollutants were present and at what level in the River Thames (a) in 1980 and (b) at the present time.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 19 March 1990]: General trends in river water quality between 1980 and 1985 can be established from the report of the 1985 river quality survey of England and Wales, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. More recent information on a directly comparable basis is not currently available, although the National Rivers Authority (NRA) will be conducting another national survey during 1990, the results of which will be published in 1991.

The classification system used for recent river quality surveys gives an overall measure of the levels of pollution in a river: detailed information on levels of individual pollutants can be obtained from the public registers maintained by the National Rivers Authority. These include the results of the analyses carried out of routine samples taken of river water, and the registers available for inspection at the National Rivers Authority's Thames and North West regional offices contain data obtained from sampling at many sites on the Thames and the Mersey respectively.

The responsibility for maintaining and improving river quality now rests with the National Rivers Authority, which will be advising my right hon. Friend on the statutory quality objectives he will be setting in 1992. It will then be for the National Rivers Authority to see that these objectives are achieved.

River Mersey (Pollution)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which companies have consent to pollute the River Mersey; what pollutants they are empowered to discharge and at what levels; and what fines were levied on companies and individuals responsible for polluting the River Mersey over the past 10 years.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The responsibility for issuing consent to discharges of effluent into the River Mersey now rests with the North West region of the National Rivers Authority (NRA). The particulars of discharge consents granted, including details of substances and quantities which may be discharged, are held on the public register maintained by the NRA and available for inspection at the North West regional office, New Town House, Buttermarket street, Warrington.

Enforcement of water pollution controls under the Water Act 1989 is primarily the responsibility of the NRA. I understand that of those cases brought to court since the NRA's establishment on 1 September 1989, the following fine has been imposed for the offence of polluting the River Mersey:

Offender	Conviction Date	Fine £	Costs £
Shell UK Ltd	22/23 February 1990	1,000,000	6,573·79

(Offence committed under part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.)

The following fines were imposed for cases of water pollution in the Mersey catchment that were brought to court by the former North West water authority, between 6 April 1987 and 31 August 1989:

Housing Associations (Water and Sewerage)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total cost to housing associations of the new infrastructure charges for water and sewerage.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 19 March 1990]: A reliable estimate of the total cost to housing associations of the new system of infrastructure charges is not available.

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the firms which have now made bids for the Crown Suppliers.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 March 1990]: No; to do so could prejudice the outcome of the sale competition.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultants have been engaged by the Crown Suppliers for the last 12 months; and if he will list the directorships currently and recently held by each individual engaged as a consultant.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The consultants employed during the past 12 months by the Crown Suppliers are listed in the table. Information on the directorships held by their staff is not collected.

Steelcase

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from Steelcase Stafor concerning Government supply.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 March 1990]: None.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those firms which have been subject to or threatened with compulsory purchase order by Leeds development corporation; what are the numbers employed by those firms; and what is the consultative process which took place in each case.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 15 March 1990]: Urban development corporations have compulsory purchase powers under section 142 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. Procedures for making and processing compulsory purchase orders are described in DOE circular 6/85—"Compulsory Purchase Orders: Procedures." Particular advice on CPOs promoted by UDCs is also contained in DOE circular 23/88, "Compulsory Purchase Orders by Urban Development Corporations." In addition to the statutory procedures Leeds development corporation is offering a personal visit to all parties to explain procedures; is willing to be flexible in giving firms time to relocate; is making land acquired by the corporation available for relocations; and is developing a relocation package to assist companies in their move.

I am informed that 67 firms, employing 445 people, have been subject to compulsory purchase orders made by Leeds development corporation. Of these firms, 17 have already reached a settlement with the corporation, safeguarding 114 jobs. Negotiations with the remainder are proceeding. I will write to the hon. Member listing the firms.

Parliamentary Estate

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many requests for minor repairs to the parliamentary estate were outstanding at 31 December 1989.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I regret that this information is not available.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 21 March 1990

EMPLOYMENT

Accountants and Engineers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the number of (a) qualified accountants and (b) qualified engineers in Britain.

Mr. Nicholls: It is estimated from the preliminary results of the 1989 labour force survey that in Spring 1989 there were 139,000 accountants with professional qualifications and 382,000 engineers who performed work normally requiring training of university degree standard in Great Britain, who were either in employment, or were not in employment but had been employed in these occupations in their last job, and had left that job less than three years prior to the survey.

Disabled Workers

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of employers with over 20 employees have fulfilled their 3 per cent. quota of disabled workers in each of the last five years.

Mr. Eggar: The percentage of employers with 20 or more employees employing their 3 per cent. quota of registered disabled workers in each of the last five years is as follows:

	Per cent.
1985	28·1
1986	26·8
1987	25·3
1988	23·9
1989	22·8

Employment Training

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many filled employment training places there are in the constituency of Ogmore; and what percentage this represents of the original departmental projections;

(2) what was the total number of unemployed receiving enterprise training within employment training between September 1988 and December 1989 for the Ogmore constituency.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available for the Ogmore constituency and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure on the £10 employment training trainee allowance in December 1989 for the Ogmore constituency.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

East European Countries

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any information regarding reform of the internal security forces in (i) Poland, (ii) Czechoslovakia, (iii) Hungary, (iv) Bulgaria, (v) the Soviet Union, (vi) Romania and (vii) the Baltic states.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information will take a little time to assemble. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

UNESCO

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the reasons the United Kingdom left UNESCO; and whether any of them have been resolved.

Mr. Sainsbury: When the United Kingdom left UNESCO we set out in detail the reasons for our withdrawal. Both at the time and since we have made clear that UNESCO should concentrate on the objectives set out in its constitution; it should cut back its proliferation of programmes, alter or abolish those which are inimical to democratic values (such as press freedom and individual human rights), make its delivery of technical assistance more efficient and overhaul its administration.

We are curently conducting a review to consider to what extent these problems have been resolved.

Lithuania

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on any proposals to privatise industry in Lithuania.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are not aware of specific proposals for the privatisation of industry in Lithuania. A law on property was adopted by the Lithuanian supreme soviet on 12 February 1990 which provides for private, collective and state property, but does not describe how state property may be transferred to private ownership.

Colombia

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any information as to whether British mercenaries are operating in Colombia.

Mr. Sainsbury: There have been unconfirmed reports that at least one British citizen has renewed an association with drug traffickers in Colombia. We have discussed the matter with the Colombian authorities and reaffirmed our willingness to co-operate with them in their investigations.

Libya

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Soviet and German Democratic Republic Governments urging them to withdraw all technical support from the Libyan military immediately.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our position on Libya is already abundantly clear to these and other Governments.

CIVIL SERVICE

Agencies

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service whether any agency chief executives have been selected from the private sector.

Mr. Luce: Yes. Ten agency chief executives or chief executives-designate were appointed following open competitions and came from outside the Civil Service. This figure includes some who were already in post before the agency was established.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many next steps agency chief executives are women.

Mr. Luce: I have recently appointed the first woman chief executive, Miss Marianne Neville-Rolfe, who is principal and chief executive of the civil service college.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Valuation Offices

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost of running the Inland Revenue's valuation offices in England and Wales; and what is the expected reduction in (a) cost and (b) staff in the valuation offices as a result of introducing the community charge.

Mr. Lilley: The cost of running the valuation offices in England and Wales for the current financial year 1989-90 is £125 million.

(a) When all outstanding domestic rating work has been cleared, the reduction in annual cost, in real terms, as a result of introducing the community charge is expected to be of the order of £17 million;

(b) £17 million represents a saving of about 1,300 clerical staff.

German Economy

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the principal economic data of (a) the Federal Republic of Germany and (b) a merged Germany.

Mr. Ryder: A wide range of economic data for West Germany are published each month in the IMF's international financial statistics and the OECD's main economic indicators. Data for a merged Germany are not available.

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the current expenditure of the Federal Republic of Germany on research and development with separate assessments for the public and private sectors.

Mr. Ryder: Data on research and development expenditure in West Germany are available biannually in the OECD's main science and technology indicators.

European Monetary System

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received regarding the impact on the European monetary system of currency union between East and West Germany.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has received no representation on the impact on the European monetary system of the proposed monetary union between the two Germanies.

European Community

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the level of United Kingdom net contributions to the European Economic Community in 1989, following the appraisal by the Community; and if he will express the sum in sterling per household in the United Kingdom per week;

(2) what were the consequences for the United Kingdom of the appraisal by the European Economic Community of United Kingdom contributions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The latest published estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1989, which appeared in the "Statement on the 1989 Community Budget" (Cm. 680), is £1,966 million. This figure is the equivalent of £1·73 per household per week, on the basis of the estimate of 21·816 million private households in the United Kingdom in 1986 which is contained in "Eurostat: Basic Statistics of the Community" (26th edition). A revised estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution in 1989 will be published shortly in the "Statement on the 1990 Community Budget", and will be based on a full analysis of all items of revenue and expenditure including the European Commission's reappraisal of the United Kingdom's contributions to the Community budget.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has made of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the EEC in 1989; and what were the totals for each of the previous five years;

(2) if he will make a statement on the nature of the deficit with EEC institutions of £2,301 millions on the balance of payments transfers sheet in the paper issued by the Central Statistical Office; and in what respect this figure differs from the previous figures published in the United Kingdom's net contribution for 1989.

Mr. Ryder [holding answers 19 and 20 March 1990]: The latest published estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1989 which appeared in the "Statement on the 1989 Community Budget" (Cm 680), is £1,966 million. The coverage of that figure differs from the coverage of the figure for the United Kingdom's net contribution to EC institutions published by the CSO. The two numbers are not therefore directly comparable.

A revised estimate for 1989, comparable with the figure of £1,966 million and based on a full analysis of all items of revenue and expenditure will be published shortly in the statement on the 1990 Community budget.

The net contribution to the Community budget for each of the previous five years were as follows:

Net contribution to European Community budget

	(£ million)
1984	656
1985	1,808
1986	572
1987	1,721
1988	1,362

Tax Debts

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many petitions have been presented by HM Customs and Excise in each of the last three years; and what percentage of these were to secure the repayment of value added tax debt.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The total number of petitions presented by the Customs department, as Commissioners of Customs and Excise, in each of the years specified in the table is as follows:

Number of petitions presented in the English and Northern Ireland jurisdiction

Year ending 31 March	Number
1987	3,616
1988	3,098
1989	3,862

Number of petitions presented in the Scottish jurisdiction

Calendar year	Number
1987	120
1988	109
1989	153

It is not possible to state precisely what percentage of these petitions relate to value added tax, because separate records are not maintained.

Relocation

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each year since 1979 the number of civil service jobs which have been transferred from the south-east to areas of high unemployment, and the departments responsible for these transfers; and what plans the Government has over the next five years for a further transfer of work, and which Departments are concerned.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The information requested is not held centrally in the form requested, but I would refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 17 January, 1990, Official Report, columns 289-90.

Inland Revenue Staff

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is (a) the total cost of the administration and collection of income tax in 1989-90, (b) the number of people employed in the collection and administration of income tax and (c) the estimated receipts from income tax in 1989-90.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The total cost of the administration and collection of income tax in 1989-90 is estimated at £1,070 million. The manyear usage of staff directly employed in the administration and collection of income tax in 1989-90 is about 48,000. For part (c) of the question I refer the hon. Member to table 1.2 of the 1990-91 Financial Statement and Budget Report published yesterday.

Civil Servants, Northern Ireland

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the number of United Kingdom civil servants employed at present and in 1985 in each council area in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 20 March 1990]: At 1 April 1989 there were 5,185 civil servants in Northern Ireland. This compares with 5,168 at 1 April 1985. These numbers exclude staff in the Northern Ireland civil service. The table shows the distribution of non-industrial civil servants in the following areas. No information is available about the location of industrial civil servants.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Namibia

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to provide assistance to independent Namibia; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I am delighted to inform the House that following successful implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 435, Namibia has today achieved independence, and has become the 50th member of the Commonwealth. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is representing Britain at the independence celebrations in Windhoek and will today announce a bilateral aid package of £10 million for commitment over three years.

Our aid will focus on technical co-operation and rehabilitation. Precise details will be agreed with the new Government, but I expect the sectors in which we will provide assistance to include public service reform, education, police training and fisheries management. Following discussions with the Namibian authorities we have already financed initial advisory visits by British experts to see how we might best help, and our assistance with police training and with education is already underway. Namibia will be a high priority for projects jointly funded with British voluntary agencies and Voluntary Service Overseas will also be discussing priorities with the new Government. In addition to our bilateral aid we will be providing substantial assistance through multilateral channels including the European Community and the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation.

I have authorised the Commonwealth Development Corporation to begin operations there, and it will send an exploratory mission in April.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Accounting and Auditing

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, since June 1979, any of his Department's Ministers or senior civil servants have had any business connections with accountancy firms or the accountancy bodies.

Mr. Redwood: One senior official in my Department is the chairman of the disciplinary committee of the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants. The official holds this position in a private capacity and with the approval of the Department, as there is no conflict of interest. I am aware of no other business connections between the accountancy profession and Ministers and senior officials of my Department. I do not know the interests of all DTI Ministers prior to their appointments.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, further to the reply that he gave to the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 31 January, Official Report, column 225, he will give details of the number of convictions obtained by his Department where the defendants pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Redwood: Two convictions for insider dealing offences have been obtained by my Department after the defendants had pleaded not guilty. In one of those cases the defendant was subsequently acquitted on appeal.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Forth: The Department does not maintain central records of expenditure of this kind by public bodies. The Department's expenditure on paid advertising and promotional materials in 1979-80 was given in an answer to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 13 March 1990, Official Report, columns 173-74. I expect expenditure under the Department's central publicity budget in 1989-90 to be of the order of £21 million. There was no significant expenditure on privatisation publicity by the Department in either year. Figures covering calendar years are not available.

Firework Injuries

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the figures of injuries caused by fireworks in 1989.

Mr. Forth: According to reports from hospitals in England, Wales and Scotland, 800 people required treatment for injuries caused by fireworks during the three weeks leading up to 5 November 1989 and the few days after. This represents a very welcome decrease of nearly 9 per cent. over 1988. Particularly encouraging were the sharp falls in serious injuries and casual incidents in the street, where our emphasis on rigorously enforcing the existing law on selling fireworks to the under-16s or misusing them in public seems to be bearing fruit. Also welcome is the fall in sparkler injuries as these tend to affect very young children and was an area where we put a lot of effort during last year's successful firework safety campaign. However, there is no room for complacency and we will be looking for a further reduction in injuries this year. The detailed breakdown for 1989 and the preceding four years is as follows:

Refrigerator Doors

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to adopt international standards for fridge doors.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 16 March 1990]: I take the reference to international standards for fridge doors to mean those which define suitable door locking mechanisms to prevent the entrapment of people. I understand that these features have been included in British standards since the 1970s for this type of electrical and gas equipment and will shortly be incorporated in a new European harmonised standard. All United Kingdom manufactured goods are now fitted with the appropriate safeguards. I would encourage all other manufacturers to adopt these standards, in so far as they reflect these safety features, so as to reduce the likelihood of another tragic accident.

Indonesia

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of British trade with Indonesia for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The value of United Kingdom trade with Indonesia during the last 10 years was as follows:

Year	£ million Exports	£ million Imports	£ million Balance
1980	112·2	57·0	+55·2
1981	139·2	73·8	+65·4

Eastern Europe

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, during his recent visit to the Soviet Union, he raised the possibility of providing pollution abatement technology and technical advice on how to clean up polluted land and water.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 20 March 1990]: No. The subject was not raised specifically by either side. The supply of western technology in all spheres is hampered by the increasing scarcity of hard currency. During my right hon. Friend's visit he concentrated his discussions on the problems for the Soviet economy as a whole to which this contributes.

PRIME MINISTER

Central Unit on Purchasing

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the purchasing progress report 1989 prepared by the central unit on purchasing.

The Prime Minister: The central unit on purchasing's 1989 progress report recorded value for money improvements in central Government Departments' purchasing of over £350 million in 1988-89, excluding the Ministry of Defence. This saving was equivalent to 5·3 per cent. of total reported purchasing expenditure.

The purchasing initiative has now resulted in value for money improvements equivalent to some £850 million since 1985-86.

Although this represents good progress, greater emphasis now needs to be given to increasing professionalism amongst staff engaged in purchasing and supply, and to supporting them with compatible purchasing information and control systems. The central unit on purchasing is actively working with departments on these issues.

A copy of the progress report is in the Library of the House.

WALES

Laura Ashley Company

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what amounts of Government cash and grants have been given to Laura Ashley Company in each year by his Department, the Welsh Development Agency and the Mid Wales Development Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: In addition to assistance offered by other departments, published details of Welsh Office aid to the Laura Ashley company is as follows:

Year	£	Grant
1976	6,000	Interest relief grant
1977	6,000	Interest relief grant
1979	17,000	Interest relief grant
1980	11,000	Interest relief grant
1983	22,000	Interest relief grant
1986	326,000	Regional development grant
1988	40,000	Regional development grant
1989	94,000	Regional development grant

The Laura Ashley company has also received rent concessions from the Welsh Development Agency in the years 1985 and 1986 and a grant from the Development Board for Rural Wales in 1989. It is not those institutions' policy to publish amounts involved in individual cases.

Ysgol Belmont School

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit Ysgol Belmont special school.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have any plans to do so.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on which services in each district, borough and city council were put under competitive tendering during 1989-90; how many were employed in supplying these services before the commencement of the competitive tendering process; and how many were employed in supplying these services following the completion of the competitive tendering exercise.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the following competition implementation timetable. In addition, local authorities, where relevant, were required to submit 20 per cent. of their ground maintenance service to competition by 1 January 1990. Competition-free allowances available to local authority direct labour organisations in respect of new construction and works of maintenance under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 were abolished from 1 October 1989. Information in respect of the numbers of employees in each service is not held centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount of money which each district borough and city council is likely to get from the poll tax.

Mr. Peter Walker: District councils in Wales are in the process of submitting information to the Welsh Office relating to their community charges and budgets. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with the information he requested when all the returns have been received and checked.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many community councils there are within each district borough and city council area in Wales; what will be the average poll tax charged for community council purposes for each community council; and how many community councils will be entitled to transitional support during the first year of the poll tax and up to what level in each instance.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of community councils within each district, borough or city council area is shown in the table:

Information about community council precepts for 1990-91 is not yet available.

Transitional relief is awarded in respect of community council areas, rather than community councils. A total of 324 such areas will receive relief in 1990-91, in amounts up to £93 per chargepayer per annum. The amounts for each community area are set out in the Personal Community Charge (Relief) (Wales) Regulations 1990, which were laid before Parliament on 19 February 1990.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many extra part-time and full-time members of staff have been employed by his Department to implement the poll tax in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: None.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent by each district borough and city council in Wales to collect rates during 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Walker: Budgeted expenditure on rate collection by each district borough and city council in Wales during 1989-90, is shown in the table:

Bosch Factory

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will institute a study into the effect of the new Bosch alternator factory development at Miskin, south Wales on the overall supply, demand and training facilities for skilled engineering labour in the industrial south Wales region.

Mr. Peter Walker: The employment service and the Training Agency continually gather and assess labour market information and take account of developments such as the new Bosch factory, in order to identify labour supply, demand and training needs.

The prime responsibility for identifying and responding to the training needs of the local labour market will in the future pass to the private-sector-led training and enterprise councils.

HEALTH

Cancer (Records)

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce measures to improve the degree to which the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys keeps its records on cancer-related diseases up to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The OPCS publishes annual cancer statistics using data collected by 11 regional registries and the Wales cancer registry which are funded by the regional health authorities.

The timing of publications is largely governed by when the slowest regional cancer registry provides OPCS with data. For 1985, data from the last registry was not received until September 1989. The volume giving 1985 registration data is expected to be published in April 1990, with that for 1986 following in July 1990.

A recent review of the cancer registration system was undertaken, with timeliness of data presentation one of the considerations looked at by the working party. The report of the review is due in April 1990.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to require district health authorities to maintain records on the number of people in their areas who have been diagnosed or treated for cancer or cancer-related diseases, including leukaemia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Health authorities already participate in a national scheme, which will continue, for recording the incidence of cancers, including leukaemia. Records on the in-patient and day-care treatment of cancers are held in the information systems of district health authorities.

NHS Staff

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the current staff vacancy levels and staff turnover rates for the administrative and clerical grades within the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on staff vacancy levels is not available centrally. Information on staff turnover rates in the NHS for 1987-88 is published in "Health Service Indicators" which are held in the Library.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what facilities are available for in vitro fertilisation under the National Health Service for residents in south-west England; and what plans he has to provide such a service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that in vitro fertilisation (IVF) services in the south-western region are available to residents of Southmead district health authority, and exceptionally to residents of other districts. Decisions about the priority and resources to be given to infertility services as a whole, and the place of an IVF programme within them, are matters for district health authorities.

Homelessness

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has of the number of parents who gratuitously eject their children in the 16 to 21 years age band from the family home; what powers there are to prosecute in such cases where homelessness results; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information in the form requested is not available. Local authorities have a duty to receive into care children under 17 who are abandoned or deserted by their parents or who are lost. In the year ending 31 March 1987, 100 children aged 16 were received into care for these reasons. There are no specific powers to prosecute parents who eject children aged 16 to 21 from the family home where homelessness results.

Hospitalisation Rates

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report, for each English and Welsh district health authority, the 1988-89 hospitalisation rates based on the projections for 1991 resident populations, with results, omitting the specialties of maternity and psychiatry, but showing a rate (a) weighted by national expenditure rates, (b) rated by expenditure rates plus <75 SMR 1984-88, (c) weighted by expenditure rates plus <75 SMR (0·5 elasticity) and (d) weighted by expenditure rates plus <65 SMR.

Mr. Freeman: I regret the information requested is not readily available. Such information as could be provided would incur disproportionate costs to produce. Information for Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Medical Services

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what calculations he has made about the rate of inflation on provision of the medical services.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) on 20 March at column 559.

Asthma

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to extend to asthmatics the same arangements for free regular prescriptions that now apply to diabetics.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [pursuant to her reply, 24 November 1989 c. 40]: I am pleased to announce that we will shortly be making peak flow meters available on general practitioner prescription. These meters monitor the patient's airways and can prevent potentially serious attacks by giving advance warning so that medication can be adjusted. These will be available to patients as soon as suitable supply arrangements can be completed. The value of peak flow monitoring has been underlined by recent asthma research and as a preventive measure it is seen as comparable to diabetics' use of blood glucose testing strips which were made prescribable some 18 months ago. The Government will also be providing to the National Asthma Campaign £15,000 a year for the next three years to help set up a telephone consulting service.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fair Employment Commission

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been appointed to the post of director in the Fair Employment Commission; and how many of these are perceived to be (1) Protestants, (2) Roman Catholics and (3) other.

Mr. Needham: Three persons have been appointed to director posts with the Fair Employment Commission. The commission is currently in the process of recruiting employees and will be submitting a monitoring return in accordance with section 27 of the Fair Employment (NI) Act 1989. Once the final staffing complement has been reached, the commission intends to publish detailed information on the religious composition of its staff and the progress of its affirmative action programme as a follow-up to the information published by the commission on 22 February 1989.

Extradition

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East, of 27 February, Official Report, column 144, if he will publish a table to show from 1971 the number of persons extradited in each year from the Irish Republic to Northern Ireland for (1) terrorist offences and (2) non-terrorist offences.

Mr. Cope: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 22 February 1990, Official Report, columns 767-68.

Deaf-blind Children

The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what support is provided to the families of pre-school deaf-blind children in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: The normal range of primary care and hospital services is available to deaf-blind children and their families. In addition, a child may be assessed for services locally or by a multi-disciplinary team at the Royal Belfast hospital for sick children. Low-vision aids and high-powered hearing aids are supplied as necessary.

Following assessment, social workers arrange for support, counselling and the provision of a range of equipment to assist with daily living. Some parents and their children attend the SENSE centre in west London for specialist information and advice.

Other support can take the form of assistance to parents at home by teachers from special schools or from education and library boards' peripatetic teaching service. Children are also welcome to visit toy and book libraries associated with special schools.

Labour Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show by standard category the umemployment levels in Northern Ireland at the latest available date and at the same period five years ago.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The number of unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland categorised by industrial sector for February 1985 and February 1990 is set out in the table.

GP Contracts

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what base data indexes will be used in formulating practice budgets and indicative prescribing budgets for general medical practitioners in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Indicative prescribing budgets and practice funds will be set at levels which reflect the needs of patients. The precise method of calculation has not yet been determined.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration has been given by the Northern Ireland DHSS to employing the eight Jarman factors to index social deprivation in relation to general medical practitioners' practice budgets and indicative prescribing budgets; what factors the Department would not deem to be appropriate for use in Northern Ireland giving the reasons for this; and what factors it deems to be suitable giving reasons.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The factors to be taken into account in determining GP indicative budgets and practice funds have not yet been decided. No detailed consideration has yet been given to the use of factors relating to social deprivation.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what social factors will be taken into account in determining practice budgets and indicative prescribing budgets for general medical practitioners in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Indicative prescribing budgets and practice funds will be set at levels which reflect the needs of patients. The factors to be taken into account in determining the levels and whether social factors should be used have not yet been decided.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of his Department's management training courses include sessions on equal opportunities for women; and what proportion of managers at grade six level and above working outside headquarters has received training on equal opportunities for women.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: In the Northern Ireland Civil Service equal opportunities for women is specifically addressed in the following management training courses:

Leadership Developments for Women and Men
Women in Management—Excellence Network
Women in Management

Six staff at grade level 6 and above have attended the course on leadership developments for women and men. None of these staff work outside headquarters.

In addition, equal opportunities aspects are embodied, where appropriate, in other management training courses including those on recruitment interviewing, promotion interviewing and staff appraisal.

The small home civil service cadre of the Northern Ireland Office does not run its own management training courses. No staff at grade level 6 or above have attended specific courses of training on this subject. However, training needs are considered and all staff are encouraged to attend appropriate courses, some of which include sessions on equal opportunities for women, run mainly by the Northern Ireland civil service or the civil service college.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Trinity College of Music

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if a permanent home for the Trinity school of music has yet been decided upon.

Mr. Jackson: This is a matter for the governing body of Trinity college of music. I understand that the governing body will be meeting on 27 March to discuss the future location of the college.

Higher Education

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implementation of differentiated fees in higher education.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 23 January 1990, at column 600.

Primary Schools

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response his Department intends to make to recent findings by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools relating to the standard of grammar, spelling and punctuation in primary schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: HMI's recent report on "The Teaching and Learning of Language and Literacy" concludes that most primary schools devote sufficient time to the teaching of grammar, punctuation and spelling to enable the majority of their pupils to reach adequate standards in these aspects of language but that only a small proportion —under one fifth—perform really well. The Government have already set about raising standards in these aspects of English. The national curriculum attainment targets and programmes of study, which are being introduced progressively from September 1989, reinforce the practices of the most successful schools in teaching grammar, punctuation and spelling. In addition, substantial funding is being provided, through education support grants, for a three-year English language training programme for all primary teachers and other teachers of English.

Circus Skills

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to increase the availability of education for circus skills in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

Modern Languages

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what innovations he intends to introduce to increase the number of children receiving tuition in modern languages.

Mrs. Rumbold: The national curriculum includes a modern foreign language as a foundation subject at secondary level. That means that a modern foreign language will be studied by all pupils between the ages of 11 and 16 in maintained schools in England and Wales.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received from the business community regarding the teaching of foreign languages in schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations.

School Buildings (Modernisation)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the number of children being educated in schools that are deemed by the local education authority concerned to be in urgent need of modernisation or major repair.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested is not collected centrally by the Department.

Pilot Training

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to include professional airline and commercial pilot training in the curriculum of universities, polytechnics and colleges of further education.

Mr. Jackson: Decisions on which courses to include in an institution's portfolio of educational provision are for the academic authorities within the individual institution.

Temporary Classrooms

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy on the funding of programmes to replace temporary buildings used for primary school classrooms by purpose-built structures.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is for each local education authority to decide whether to make provision in temporary or permanent buildings and to determine its policy on the funding of programmes to replace temporary buildings used for primary school classrooms.

Student Loans

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of the effect of the students' loan scheme on the likelihood of graduates entering mathematics, chemistry and physics teaching in schools.

Mr. Jackson: Top-up loans will offer eligible students additional resources on favourable terms, regardless of their course or their subsequent choice of career. Repayments will not be burdensome and may be deferred when income is less than 85 per cent. of national average earnings: equivalent to about £11,500 in today's circumstances.

University of Wales

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students entered the university of Wales colleges in (a) 1979, (b) 1984 and (c) 1989; and what percentage of the intake hailed from Wales in each instance.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers of initial entrants to courses at the colleges of the University of Wales are given in the table. The data cover full-timers and part-timers, and postgraduates and undergraduates.

UFC (Scottish Committee)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to meet the chairman of the Scottish committee of the Universities Funding Council to review its activities in its first year of operation.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

Vice-Chancellors and Principles

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend meets representatives of the committee from time to time in the course of normal business.

Examination Results (Inner London)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about trends in examination results in inner London since 1975.

Mrs. Rumbold: The table gives the percentage of leavers from the Inner London education authority (ILEA) and for England, obtaining five or more grades at A-C in the GCSE (or its equivalent at O-level and CSE) and one or more A-level passes, since 1976. Although the figures show some improvement in the examination performance of ILEA pupils, the results remain below the national averages. I am sure that the new local education authorities will wish to give a high priority to improving them and will be assisted in this by the Government's education reforms.

Notes:

(i) The School Leavers Survey, from which the figures in the above table are derived, is based on a 10 per cent. sample of pupils at each school. Sampling error may lead to distortion in the trends.

(ii) The figures above do not provide the overall picture. There has been a growing tendency among 16 year olds in particular to leave school for GCSE/O-level/A-level study in full-time further education.

UFC (Welsh Committee)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Welsh committee of the Universities Funding Council since its creation; and on what matters.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations.

Education Reform, Northumberland

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the implementation of the Education Reform Act in Northumberland.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos) on 27 February 1990, Official Report, column 53.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew. F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the number of 16-year-olds staying on in full-time education.

Mr. Jackson: In 1988-89, a total of 336,000 16-year-olds stayed on in full-time education in schools and further education colleges in England.

Student Grants

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what, at the latest available figures, is the cost of the older student additional allowance to students' mandatory grants; how many were awarded; and when the allowance was last uprated.

Mr. Jackson: In 1987-88, 12,218 assessments totalling £7,546,382 were made for the older students allowance for students receiving mandatory award. The allowance was last uprated with effect from September 1989.

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether students who are following a foundation course which is a prerequisite for entry to a non-science and technology degree course are eligible for mandatory maintenance awards.

Mr. Jackson: No.

Drugs

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available for education programmes designed to reduce the demand for drugs.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In 1988-89, the latest year for which figures are available, local education authorities claimed grant on expenditure of £1·6 million under the LEA training grants scheme and £2·6 million under the relevant education support grant in relation to education about drug misuse.

ENERGY

Sellafield

Mr. Cambell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the level of suspended radio nuclides in air in B205, B268 and B30 at Sellafield for each year since 1983 as registered at each non-battery electrically powered air sampling point.

Mr. Baldry: The annual average airborne alpha activity levels in operating areas of B205, B268 and B30, measured by installed air samplers, are given in the table. Activity levels are presented in terms of the intake a worker would receive from the measured activity in the course of a year's work in the plant and are quoted as percentages of the most restrictive annual limit of intake for the particular radionuclide composition on each plant.

Building	Average airborne activity levels (per cent. ALI)
	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989
B205	3·0	2·4	3·2	1·6	3·0	2·7	3·4
B268 TDN	6·0	5·5	3·1	6·0	2·6	3·6	9·8
B268 MA Evap	—	1·1	1·0	1·8	1·1	0·8	0·6
B30 Inlet	1·4	2·6	1·8	1·4	2·4	3·0	2·9
B30 Decanner	9·0	8·3	5·7	6·2	4·8	7·0	12·4

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether readings as registered on personal air samplers worn by British Nuclear Fuels plc. employees working on B/205, B/268 and B/30 at Sellafield have ever failed to match readings as registered on non-battery electrically powered air sampling equipment fitted to the same buildings.

Mr. Baldry: Continuously operating air samplers at fixed locations give an average of the aerial radioactivity in the plant and would activate if the levels in the plant rise significantly. Personal air samplers worn by individual employees give a recording of the localised aerial contamination associated with different jobs. The annual exposure recorded by personal air samplers substantially exceeds that measured by installed samplers because individual working practices can generate localised airborne radioactivity which is not expected to be fully recorded by the air sampling equipment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether, in every case that the alarm monitors in B/205, B/268 and B/30 at Sellafield have been triggered, all personnel have been ordered to leave the area concerned pending suitable clearance by British Nuclear Fuels plc's. health physics department in each year since 1986.

Mr. Baldry: Should an individual air sampler alarm, apparently due to radiation, then employees working nearby are expected to move to an adjacent monitored area whilst the reason for the alarm is investigated by a suitably protected person. Should a number of local air samplers alarm, employees are expected to move out of that part of the plant to a mustering point, whilst other employees, suitably protected, investigate the problem. One case of non-compliance occurred in 1986 when the employee sent to investigate an alarm carried, but did not wear, the respiratory protection provided, and received an exposure in excess of the annual limit of intake. Details of this were reported in the Health and Safety Executive's quarterly statement on nuclear incidents dated 24 July 1987.

Wind Energy

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what participation his Department will have in the 1990 European wind energy conference and exhibition.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department in asociation with the energy technology support unit has submitted two papers describing recent developments under the Government-supported United Kingdom wind energy programme. My Department will be providing an exhibition stand in conjunction with the National Engineering Laboratory. Staff from the energy technology support unit are assisting with the selection of papers.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what part his Department will take in the British Wind Energy Association's annual conference.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department is a sponsor of the conference. In association with the energy technology support unit it is collaborating with National Power and PowerGen in a joint exhibition stand. Staff of ETSU are co-authors of two papers. More than one third of the papers will be based on work funded by my Department.

Regional Functions

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Wakeham: The only regional service my Department provides is the promotion of energy efficiency. The staff concerned are located in the DTI's regional offices. The details are set out in the table:

Region	Location	Staff
North East	Newcastle upon Tyne	3
North West	Manchester	3
Yorkshire and Humberside	Leeds	3
East Midlands	Nottingham	3
West Midlands	Birmingham	3
East	London (moving to Cambridge)	3
Greater London	London	2
South	London	3
South West	Bristol	3

The staff in each region are one grade 7, one higher executive officer (HEO) and an administrative officer except in Greater London where there is no HEO. The proportion of my Department's running costs accounted for by these staff is 1·75 per cent. which may be roughly equally divided between the regions.

Contributions are also made to the Scottish and Welsh Offices for promoting energy efficiency, the amounts representing about 0·1 per cent. of my Department's running costs in each case.

A breakdown of my Department's total expenditure spent in the regions is not readily available.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Wakeham: Total expenditure by my Department on publicity and advertising in 1979-80 was £131,000. Final expenditure figures for 1989-90 are not yet available but the current forecast is £3,856,000. I am asking the chairmen of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, Central Electricity Generating Board, Electricity Council and British Coal to provide their equivalent publicity and advertising figures direct to the hon. Member.

Safety Directorate

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many inspectors in his Department are required to go offshore in exercise of their responsibilities; how many hold offshore individual certificates; and, in each case, when the individual certificate was issued.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All 44 inspectors currently in post may be required to go offshore in exercise of their responsibilities. Every inspector is issued with appropriate warrants by the Secretary of State for Energy immediately after being appointed.

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what elements of his Department's safety directorate's tasks are being postponed as a result of staff shortages.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The overall aims of the safety directorate, within the framework laid down by Parliament, are to encourage and guide the efforts of the offshore industry to prevent accidents, to achieve higher standards of health and safety offshore and to seek to ensure that offshore installations, their equipment, wells and pipelines are structurally sound and fit for their intended purposes, and that they are managed and operated properly. In support of these aims a large number of tasks, of varying degrees of importance, are undertaken. As with any organisation, my safety directorate must prioritise these tasks while ensuring that their aims are met. High priority will continue to be given to offshore inspections and the investigation of accidents offshore; the recruitment campaign currently under way is aimed at ensuring the field inspectorate is brought fully up to strength.

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what is the current number of posts for specialist staff within his Department's safety directorate; what is the current number of staff in place; and what plans he has to fill empty posts;

(2) what is the current number of posts in his Department's safety directorate in Aberdeen and London; what are the current numbers of staff in those posts; and what plans he has to fill empty posts.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There are 63 posts for specialist staff in the safety directorate. Five of which are newly created. Fifty specialist staff are in post.

The total number of posts in the safety directorate is 102, 17 of which are in Aberdeen, 84 in London and one in Great Yarmouth. There are 16 staff currently in Aberdeen, 72 in London and one in Great Yarmouth.

Open and in-service competitions are in progress to fill the specialist vacancies.

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of fatal accidents offshore have been investigated by his Department's safety directorate over the last five years; and how much has been allocated out of departmental resources for 1990-91.

Mr. Peter Morrison: It is, and has always been, the policy of my Department to investigate all fatal accidents reported under the Offshore Installations (Inspectors and Casualties) Regulations 1973 and the Submarine Pipe-Lines (Inspectors etc) Regulations 1977. Sufficient resources are always made available for such investigations.

Offshore Deaths

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all offshore deaths and their employers in the last 10 years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

National Grid Company

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the terms of any directions he has given to the National Grid Company under section 58 of the Electricity Act 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Secretary of State has not issued a direction under section 58 of the Electricity Act 1989.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Rugby League

116. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration has been given by his Department to the implications of the Taylor report for rugby league.

117. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration has been given by his Department to the implications of the Taylor report for rugby league.

118. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to meet representatives of the rugby league to discuss the Taylor report.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) on 19 March at column 493.

Police Housing Allowances

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the police force housing allowances.

Mr. Waddington: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 15 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) at columns 360-61.

Diminished Responsibility

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the maximum sentences for those pleading guilty upon the grounds of diminished responsibility to the crimes of killing, raping, or wounding.

Mr. Patten: No. Diminished responsibility is a defence only to a charge of murder. The maximum penalty for manslaughter, raping or wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm is life imprisonment.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the cost effectiveness of electronic tagging of offenders or persons on bail.

Mr. John Patten: The current trials of electronic monitoring as a condition of bail have already shown that the technology works and that operating procedures are effective. We are now considering the case for a larger-scale trial of electronic monitoring in an area where substantial numbers can be monitored as a condition of bail, with a view to providing improved measures of the cost effectiveness of electronic monitoring.

Birmingham Six

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken in the light of recent representations submitted to him about the safety of the convictions of the Birmingham Six.

Mr. Waddington: I have asked the chief constable of the West Midlands police for a report on a number of specific points which have been put to me recently about the safety of the convictions of the Birmingham Six. I understand that the chief constable has decided to ask the Devon and Cornwall constabulary, which carried out investigations in 1987 into certain aspects of the case, to investigate the matters now under consideration. In the light of the outcome of those investigations, I will give further consideration to whether my intervention in the convictions of the six men would be justified.

Magistrates Courts Service

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he proposes to take on the recommendation in the report of the scrutiny of the magistrates' courts service that the service should become an executive agency.

Mr. Waddington: I am very grateful for the detailed consideration which has been given to the report by interested bodies and individuals, and for the comments which they have offered. In the light of the consultations which have taken place since the report was published we now wish to obtain more detailed and accurate estimates of the costs of different options for changing the management structure and organisation of the service. These will cover both the executive agency proposals made in the scrutiny report and, for comparison purposes, an alternative model based on a reduced number of separate management units funded 100 per cent. by central Government but independently managed by local boards. Consultants will be appointed for this purpose. I shall not reach firm decisions about the future organisation of the service until I have had an opportunity to consider the results of this costing assessment.

British Citizenship

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has completed consideration of applications for registration as British citizens made under the transitional provisions of the British Nationality Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The transitional provisions of the British Nationality Act 1981 came to an end on 31 December 1987. The number of applications received in 1987-88 was some 210,000 registrations and 70,000 naturalisations, of which 116,000 were received in December 1987 alone. This was far more than expected and the Government responded to the additional demand by providing more resources, including the establishment of the Liverpool nationality office, tasked with processing the remaining transitional registration applications by March 1990.

By 19 January 1990, decisions had been reached on all registration cases being processed at the Liverpool nationality office, except those where replies from applicants were awaited. These latter cases consist of those where we are waiting for the applicant to forward the fee, or to swear an oath of allegiance, or to send some other documentary evidence to establish an entitlement to registration. The time taken to complete these outstanding applications will depend upon how soon we receive the requisite information. So far, some 110,000 applications have been completed out of a total of 130,000.

Now that the Liverpool nationality office has largely completed the processing of registration applications, its staff have been retrained in order to process applications for naturalisation, which until now have been processed only in Croydon. This additional capacity to process naturalisations will improve the level of service given to applicants during 1990-91, and we aim to reduce the average waiting time for decisions on applications of all kinds to 11 months by April 1991.

Breath Tests

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a decision has been reached on police powers to require roadside breath tests.

Mr. Waddington: Yes. The Government have concluded that the police have adequate powers to require roadside breath tests.

The full circumstances in which a breath test can be required were set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General on 5 December 1989 at column 131 and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland at column 165. It is lawful for a police officer in uniform acting in the execution of his duty to require the driver of any vehicle on a road to stop. A police officer who stops a vehicle on a road with the purpose of investigating whether its driver has alcohol in his body is acting in the execution of his duty. It is accordingly lawful for a police officer in uniform to stop vehicles at random for that purpose, provided there is no malpractice such as oppression or capricious conduct on the part of the officer. It is lawful for a police officer in uniform to require a driver who has been stopped in such circumstances to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test, provided that the officer has reasonable cause to suspect that the driver has alcohol in his body.

We have considered carefully the views expressed during our recent consultations that the police should be able to operate high profile enforcement as a deterrent against drink driving. Their present powers allow them to do so and statistics show that they are using their powers to good effect.

The statistics of breath tests for England and Wales for the 12 months to September 1989, which were published on 7 February, show that overall levels of testing continue to rise, with a continued downward trend in the proportion of positive tests. The police reported 502,000 screening breath tests in this period, a rise of 16 per cent. over the previous year. The provisional figures for the Christmas period reported by the Association of Chief Police Officers show that the proportion of positive tests fell from 10 per cent. in 1988 to 9 per cent. in 1989.

In all circumstances, we have concluded that the existing powers strike the right balance between the need for effective enforcement of the law and the freedom of the individual.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Waddington: Expenditure on publicity and advertising was as follows:

1979-80	1989-90 (estimate)
£ million	£ million
3·0	9·1

Psychiatric Bail Hostels

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals to institute a system of psychiatric bail hostels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are examining the part bail hostels can play in a strategy for dealing with mentally disturbed defendants, but no decisions have yet been taken.

Drugs

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available of education programmes designed to reduce the demand for drugs.

Mr. Mellor: A major part of the overall cost of education aimed at preventing the misuse of drugs is that of the staff and other resources used to provide drugs education within schools. Information on such costs is not available centrally.

However, the Department of Education and Science supported expenditure of £4·2 million in 1988-89 to allow for the continued employment of drugs education co-ordinators in each local education authority area in England and for in-service teacher training. In the same period, similar central expenditure to support drugs education in Scotland and Wales amounted to some £260,000 and £280,000 respectively.

Regional Functions

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determined his Department's regions.

Mr. Waddington: The main functions organised regionally are in the prison service, passport department and the forensic science service. Others include police training, telecommunications, police and fire service inspection, inspections relating to the control of drugs, the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation, and the inspection of laboratories engaged in scientific procedures on animals.

There are no standard Departmental regions, and thus no Home Office regional offices. Each regional organisation is separately constructed according to the needs of the particular function concerned.

Only in the prison service is there devolved budgetary responsibility on a regional basis. Details of its regional offices' location and approximate staff numbers and 1989-90 budgets are set out in the table below. Since regional offices in the prison service are responsible for staff and expenditure in all prison establishments in their regions, the figures similarly include all such staff and expenditure.

Region	Staff-in-post	Total budget £ million 1989-90
South East (Woking)	10,500	220
South West (Bristol)	5,100	105
Midlands (Birmingham)	5,900	121
North (Manchester)	9,900	201

Neighbourhod Drugwatch

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to offer any assistance to neighbourhood drug watch schemes.

Mr. Mellor: We welcome local efforts to prevent and reduce the extent of drug misuse, especially where they have the support of the local community. In areas where drug prevention teams are set up under the initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) last October, I would expect the team to establish close contact with any local neighbourhood drugwatch scheme.

DEFENCE

Submarine-launched Cruise Missiles

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any studies by SACEUR are under way to examine the role of United States Navy submarine-launched cruise missiles as a part of the NATO theatre nuclear forces.

Mr. Neubert: As part of the post-INF restructuring of nuclear forces, SACEUR is looking at the availability of a whole spectrum of nuclear weapons, including submarine-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any United States Navy Tomahawk submarine-launched cruise missiles are assigned to the NATO command (i) in peacetime and (ii) in war.

Mr. Neubert: The assignment of United States forces is a matter for the United States Government.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning progress by the NATO military authorities in developing concepts of military operations for the employment of United States Tomahawk submarine-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Neubert: While it is not our practice to comment in detail on NATO's classified concepts of operations, I can confirm that the NATO military authorities are considering the availability of submarine-launched cruise missiles as part of NATO's post-INF restructuring process.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if United States submarine-launched cruise missiles are currently included in the NATO operational plan for the employment of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Neubert: It is not our practice to comment on classified NATO operational plans.

United Kingdom-United States Agreements

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provisions currently exist in agreements between the British Government and United States authorities concerning the types of (i) naval and (ii) naval support vessels permitted to be based in United Kingdom ports and facilities.

Mr. Neubert: Details of agreements under which United States vessels may be based in the United Kingdom are confidential between the two Governments.

Running Costs

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of an operational (i) Polaris class submarine, (ii) Trafalgar class submarine, (iii) Swiftsure class submarine and (iv) Valiant/Churchill class submarine; and what is the anticipated annual running cost of a Trident class submarine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: The average annual operating costs at 1988-89 prices of Royal Navy nuclear-powered submarines are:

	£ million
Polaris	11·7
Fleet	4·4

Figures for individual classes of fleet submarine could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

These costs include personnel, petrol, oil and lubricants, spares and so on, as well as administrative support services, but exclude capital equipment and refit/repair costs.

It is too early to say with any precision what the likely running costs of the Trident force will be. They are not, however, expected to be significantly different from those of Polaris.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment at (a) Burghfield, (b) Aldermaston, (c) Foulness, (d) Winfrith, (e) Llanishen, (f) Harwell, (g) Springfields, (h) Capenhurst, (i) Calder Hall, (j) Sellafield and (k) Capelcross, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: It would not be in the national interest to disclose this information for the four sites of the atomic weapons establishment: Aldermaston, Burghfield, Cardiff (Llanishen), and Foulness. The other locations to which the hon. Member refers are not a matter for the Ministry of Defence.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of people employed both directly and indirectly in the nuclear weapons programme; how many are involved in research; how many are involved in manufacture; what are the running costs of employing these personnel, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: It would not be in the interests of national security to reveal the number or deployment of staff at the atomic weapons establishment. However our very broad estimate of the number of people in the United Kingdom whose employment is directly or indirectly dependent on nuclear defence is some 40,000.

Tornados (Collision)

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in the light of the report of the collision between two Tornado aircraft over Cumbria on 9 August 1988, he will accelerate his plans to introduce a computerised system of track deconfliction to avoid a similar accident in future; and on which date he expects to implement it.

Mr. Neubert: Immediately following the accident concerned and in the light of the interim report of the investigation, a review of night low flying regulations was carried out which resulted in the introduction of a restructured night low flying system in October 1988 designed to provide improved deconfliction arrangements. The automated low flying inquiry and notification system (ALFENS), which is currently in its project definition phase, should improve the flexibility of the night low flying system on its introduction in 1992, but there are no plans to accelerate its development in the light of the final report of the accident investigation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit Disregards

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans following the publication of the Children's Society report, "Too Much Pressure", to introduce the same disregards for housing benefit for trainees on YTS as currently enjoyed by young people in employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Allowances paid to trainees on youth training schemes are provided from central funds. Like social security benefits, these allowances are taken fully into account in the calculation of housing benefit. To provide a disregard of these allowances would mean double provision from public funds and give preferential treatment to a small number of people who are not in the greatest need. However, in July 1989, we accepted that there were special considerations for young people aged 16 and 17 who were living independently and liable to make payments for their housing costs and increased the personal allowance which forms the basis of their housing benefit entitlement to the same level as that used for people aged 18 to 25—an increase of over 30 per cent.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people claiming attendance allowance on grounds of terminal illness in each of the last three years for which records are available have died while waiting for the six-month qualifying period to expire.

Mr. Scott: I regret that this information is not available.

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mrs. Gillian Shepherd: The Department's regional offices provide a support and advice service to the local office network, details of specific functions are shown in table 1. Information on location, staffing and boundaries are also detailed in tables 2, 3 and 5. Information on budgets in the format requested is not available. Table 4 gives details showing the expenditure for the regional and local offices in each region as a proportion of the Secretary of State's administration and miscellaneous services vote.

Vaccine Damage

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many vaccine damage payments were made in 1989; and if he will categorise these according to the age of the child when the vaccination took place, the year of the vaccination and the nature of the vaccination.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Three payments were awarded in 1989 under the provisions of the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979. The details are:

Age at date of vaccination	Year vaccination was given	Type of vaccination cited on claim form
4 years	1986	Measles
12 to 15 months	1986	Measles
15 to 18 months	1972	Measles

Correspondence

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to be able to resolve the still outstanding claim for child benefit, from the Rev. John Macleod, of Ross-shire, on whose behalf the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye wrote to him on 13 February and 13 March; why an interim payment has not been made; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There is no outstanding claim for child benefit but I am aware of an outstanding claim for family credit from Mrs. Macleod. Claims for family credit are decided by the independent adjudicating authorities and we cannot interfere in their decisions. I understand that the adjudication officer dealing with Mrs. Macleod's claim is awaiting further information from her before being able to decide the claim. As my noble Friend, Lord Skelmersdale said in his letter to the hon. Member on 8 March 1989, the claim about which the hon. Member wrote on 23 January 1989 was decided on 1 March 1989 when an award of £41·60 a week was made. As a result of an appeal to the social security appeal tribunal, the decision was revised to £58·57 a week and arrears were paid on 1 December 1989.

Rent Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the numbers qualifying for rent relief in each region and the amount and distribution of such relief in terms of the amount of relief;

(2) what is his estimate of the numbers qualifying for rate relief in each region and the amount and distribution of such relief in terms of the amount of relief.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 22 February 1990]: The information is in the table.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list other European Economic Community countries that decide the date for the commencement of payment of the retirement pension along the same lines as Regulation 16(1) of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 27 February 1990]: In the United Kingdom, state retirement pensions are payable in advance from the day on which the person becomes entitled to a pension, if this is a Monday, or if not, from the following Monday.

Arrangements in other European Community member states differ from each other, with pensions usually being paid monthly rather than weekly. In Denmark, Italy and Spain, the first pension payment is made at the beginning of the month following the qualifying day, but includes a payment backdated to the qualifying day. In the Netherlands, the pensioner is entitled to pension from the beginning of the month of his qualifying birthday.

In Belgium, France, Luxembourg and Germany, the first pension is payable at the start of the month following the qualifying day, without any payment for the intervening period.

In Ireland, where pensions are paid weekly, the first payable date is decided as in the United Kingdom.

I regret it has not proved possible to obtain comparable information about the position in Greece and Portugal.

Travel-to-Work Costs

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the survey evidence suggesting that one in three employees may have no travel-to-work costs referred to in paragraph 37, chapter 14 of the public expenditure White Paper.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 March 1990]: This estimate is based on the findings of a study carried out by the university of Stirling for Her Majesty's Treasury in 1980.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many rebates have still not been paid to the personal pension schemes of people who opted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 12 March 1990]: It is estimated that there are 15,500 individuals who are entitled to a rebate for their personal pension and where it has not yet been paid into their scheme. About 11,000 of these are expected to have a payment at the end of March. Investigations are continuing in the remaining cases to resolve discrepancies in the information provided by employers, and payment will then be made where appropriate.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) further to the written reply dated 14 February, Official Report, column 222, concerning the amount of poll tax payable in 1990-91 per adult for each region, etc., whether he will provide in each case an estimate of the numbers receiving housing benefit;

(2) further to the written reply dated 14 February, Official Report, column 222, concerning the amount of poll tax payable in 1990-91 per adult for each region, etc., whether he will provide in each case an estimate of the numbers receiving rate relief.

Mrs. Shephard: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Teucharhill

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received an urban aid application for projects in the Teucharhill area of Govan constituency; and what decisions have been made.

Mr. Lang: Applications for the 1990-91 urban programme competition for projects in the Teucharhill area were received by the normal 30 November deadline. As in previous years I expect the bulk of final decisions to be announced around the end of March.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Rifkind: The latest estimate of expenditure by the Scottish Office in the current financial year on publicity and advertising is £3 million. The corresponding figure for the financial year 1979-80 was £263,000. Information on publicity and advertising expenditure by non-departmental public bodies is not held systematically in my Department.

Highlands and Islands Development Board

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report tables, covering the years 1983-84 to 1991-92 and consistent with the table for programmes 2 and 15.3 on page 40 of "Public Expenditure to 1991-92: A Commentary on the Scotland Programme", showing (a) gross expenditure, parallel to the table appended to the Secretary of State's statement to the House on 6 December 1989, Official Report, columns 330-33 and (b) a table of receipts, following as closely as is practicable the receipts analysis for the Highlands and Islands Development Board on page 47 of the said commentary.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 17 January 1990]: Gross expenditure on programmes 15.2 and 15.3 for the period 1983-84 to 1989-90 is set out in the table. Details of expenditure plans for the financial years 1990-91 and 1991-92 will be set out in the Scottish commentary on public expenditure to 1992-93 which will be published in due course.

An analysis of receipts for the Scottish Development Agency is not available in the form requested.

Living Elsewhere Grants

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many students at each university and higher education college in Scotland receive living elsewhere grants.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 January 1990]: The information requested is set out in the table. It relates to the academic session 1988-89 and is in respect of Scottish-domiciled students attending the Scottish universities and Scottish grant-aided colleges.

Fishing, Ullapool

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to reply to the specific questions raised with him by the Federation of Highlands and Islands fishermen in its original letter of 3 May 1989 with regard to the impact of klondyking activity upon the fishing activities of Ullapool fishermen and the question of possible compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The question of compensation for loss of fishing opportunities has been raised by the federation, and by the hon. Member on its behalf, on previous occasions. My noble Friend the Minister of State told representatives of the federation at a meeting in Kinlochbervie in August 1989 that the Government do not intend to pay compensation.

Nature Conservation

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Western Isles, Official Report, 1 March, column 292, whether he will indicate the criteria adopted for the purposes of determining whether land which is subject to, or being considered for, a nature conservation order under section 29 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 is of national importance.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 12 March 1990]: A nature conservation order is made on the recommendation of the Nature Conservancy Council only where it is satisfied that there is a serious threat to an SSSI. The Nature Conservancy Council would advise on the scientific interest and the importance of the specific area in a national and international context. Each case is then considered by my right hon. and learned Friend on its merits.

TRANSPORT

Traffic

115. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to the need for environmental measures to mitigate the effect of increased volume of traffic on roads in residential areas.

Mr. Atkins: Where there is sufficient capacity on main roads, traffic-calming measures such as road humps and variable carriageway widths can play a useful part in enhancing the environmental quality of many residential streets. Their principal effects are to lower traffic speeds and to deter through traffic from using these streets. Improved landscaping and paved surfaces can offer further environmental benefits.

East London Roads

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make it his policy to accede to any renewal of the request from the local authority to close the exits from the northern Blackwall tunnel approach road at Old Ford/Tredegar road to prevent westbound rat-running;

(2) if he will visit Antill road and Tredegar road in Bow, London, E3 to meet residents to discuss the problems caused by through traffic leaving trunk roads.

Mr. Atkins: No. It is for the appropriate borough council as highway authority for the local roads concerned to make specific proposals which will be considered on the basis of circular 2/87 traffic management guidance in London.

Cyclists

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what records he has of accidents involving cyclists in Kensington road, Knightsbridge, Park lane, Bayswater road, and Marylebone road over the last five years.

Mr. Atkins: I understand from the London accident analysis unit that for the five-year period 1984 to 1988, the latest year for which figures are available, the number of accidents involving cyclists was:

Road	Number of accidents
Kensington Road	37
Knightsbridge	25
Park Lane	39
Bayswater Road	50
Marylebone Road	42

Regional Functions

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Atkins: The Department has a wide range of functions, most of which are undertaken outside London. Some 80 per cent. of its 16,500 staff are based outside London. It has nine regional offices which deal with local aspects of road traffic, road safety and public transport in Newcastle, Leeds, Manchester, Nottingham, Birmingham, Bedford, London, Dorking and Bristol with a sub-office in Exeter. The new motorway widening unit will be in Coventry. We have recently announced our intention to relocate the highways computing division from London to Leeds.

The Department's marine directorate and Her Majesty's Coastguard have their own regional organisations, as do the vehicle inspection agency and the driver and vehicle licensing directorate, the new driver standards agency and traffic areas which supervise driver testing, vehicle safety and operator licences. The transport and road research laboratory is at Crowthorne. The different boundaries of each organisation are set in order to ensure value for public money and to best deliver each organisation's objectives.

Maps showing the nine regional offices and their schemes were published in February in "Trunk Roads, England, Into the 1990s". The roads vote of £1·3 billion is almost entirely spent by the regional organisation and the effort of the agencies and directorates listed above is deployed in the regions.

Cars (Pollution)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he intends to take over calls for the inclusion of a pollution test in the MOT tests.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Taylor) on 6 March 1990 (Official Report, column 547.)

North Yorkshire County Council (Grants)

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the additional amounts in grants to the North Yorkshire county council which will be available in future years as a result of the increased spending announcement.

Mr. Atkins: In the 1990-91 transport supplementary grant (TSG) settlement, announced last December, we accepted for the first time expenditure on the Sherburn-in-Elmet and South Milford bypass for 50 per cent. grant support. Subject to North Yorkshire county council making satisfactory progress, we expect to pay TSG of over £5·7 million towards the cost of this scheme between now and its completion in 1992-93. During this same period, support for the Harrogate Knaresborough southern bypass is expected to continue with TSG of some £5·2 million. The county council will also receive increases in revenue support grant over a longer period to cover the cost of funding the balance.

Road Improvements

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made to inform the public about road repairs and improvements on trunk roads where restrictions are in force with consequent delays for traffic movement.

Mr. Atkins: The Department issues fortnightly bulletins summarising planned major motorway lane closures likely to involve delays, and its regional offices issue more detailed information on individual schemes. This information is publicised by the media. For certain roadworks the Department provides telephone hot-lines from which information on likely delays is available directly to the public. The Department also publishes leaflets that give details of telephone numbers and other sources of information.

Signs are being introduced at major roadworks to explain what the works are for and what is happening when work is suspended while cones are still in place.

The broadcast media and motoring organisations play a major part in providing the public with reports on road conditions. The Department is having discussions with those involved in the provision of travel information about ways of improving its availability and reliability.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects plans to be completed for the improvements to the A1 between Wetherby and Dishforth in North Yorkshire; and what is his estimate of the costs involved.

Mr. Atkins: Following a public inquiry in 1987, plans for this scheme are being revised to provide a higher standard of road. The fresh proposals will take into account the findings of the current review of the longer-term needs of the A1 between Hook Moor and Scotch Corner, which includes consideration of motorway status. I expect to make an announcement this summer.

The scheme should be completed in the mid to late 1990s at an estimated cost of £100 million to £110 million depending on the final standard adopted.

Road Programme

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 14 March, if he will list the length of each road project detailed therein.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is given in the table.

Airport Noise

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions for each of the last 10 years his Department has utilised its powers to satisfy requirements for limiting the effects of noise at airports in Britain, other than Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department's long-standing policy has been that owners and operators of airports should be responsible for taking noise abatement measures. The Department has designated 47 airports (including the three London ones) under section 35 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, which requires consultation between the airport, its users and local interests on matters including noise abatement.

In addition the Department has taken a leading role internationally in securing agreement to measures reducing noise at source made by aircraft. The resultant standards are given force by orders made under the 1982 Act.

London Underground (Safety)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the near collision on the London Underground in a tunnel outside King's Cross in the week beginning 11 March.

Mr. Portillo: On 12 March, an Underground train travelling southwards on the Piccadilly line stopped at King's Cross station. The train could not continue southwards because the fire brigade had been called to an incident at Covent Garden station. It was necessary, therefore, for the passengers to disembark at King's Cross and for the train to be diverted northwards. To achieve this, the train should have gone south out of King's Cross until it had passed a crossover, and it should then have reversed. In the event, the train immediately reversed. The next southbound train was standing at signals outside King's Cross. The driver saw the headlights of the first train approaching him. In accordance with the procedure in which all drivers are trained, the driver of the stationary train switched off the traction current by shorting the wires, mounted on the tunnel wall, which provide a safety measure for use in contingencies such as this one. The driver of the moving train applied his brakes and came to a halt about a train's length from the other train. London Underground has carried out an investigation of this incident and will be sending a full report to the railway inspectorate.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will institute a further inquiry into all aspects of safety on London Underground; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: A further survey of London Underground's safety management will be made by the railway inspectorate later this year, as announced by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Transport in his statement to the House on 24 May last (Official Report, Vol 153 columns 502-3).

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the claimed hazards in one-person operation of the older deep level tube railways in London (a) prior to and (b) since Monday 5 March; and on what date he expects to announce any action he intends to take consequent thereto.

Mr. Portillo: I am able to trace only representations from the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) about the one-person operation of older deep level tubes in the 12 months preceding 5 March 1990. Since then, I have received none specifically about this matter, though there has been an inquiry from the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) about an incident which occurred on the Piccadilly Line at King's Cross on 12 March.

As to the last part of the question, I have written to the hon. Member about the exercise arranged at the railway inspectorate's initiative and a copy of my letter is reproduced in the Official Report:

21 March 1990

Dear Nigel

It is a coincidence that you put down your Question, about one-person-operation (OPO) of deep level tubes at a time when I was about to respond to your past correspondence on London Underground's emergency procedures in the event of an OPO train driver becoming ill, and the train disabled.

When I wrote to you in September, I mentioned that the Railway Inspectorate would be making further inquiries about certain aspects of these procedures. You were particularly concerned about the practice of "leapfrogging". The Inspectorate arranged for an exercise to be carried out in the early morning of Sunday 28th January on the Bakerloo Line between Oxford Circus and Piccadilly Circus. It involved four trains, none of which was in passenger service. The simulated emergency was deemed to have been caused by the incapacitation of the driver of the leading train. The simulation was done in such a way as to create the conditions likely to be met if the incident had occurred during the peak hour service.

Since you are already familiar with the procedures involved, I need not go into detail about the particular actions which took place. It is sufficient to say that the Chief Inspecting Officer tells me that he regards the arrangements as acceptably safe and that they constitute a suitable method to deal with the unlikely event of a train stopping within a single-bore tunnel due to the sudden disablement of its driver.

Yours sincerely,
Michael Portillo

Buses

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what controls exist over the (a) production and (b) use of open-platform public buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Open-platform buses may not be used on local services without a conductor. Apart from this, open-platform public service vehicles are subject to the regulations and certification procedures that apply to all large PSVs.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sea Defences

114. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money Dorset, South has received from his Department in recent years for the purposes of sea defence; and whether that money will increase as a result of the recent damage caused by storms.

Mr. Curry: Over the past five years, the Department has made payments totalling £3,230,127 in respect of grant to the authorities in Dorset, South for coastal defences. We have not yet received any representations about storm damage in this area but requests for grant aid for reconstruction of coastal defences will be handled in the normal way.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food where the carcases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy affected slaughtered cattle are disposed of in the Carmarthen area; and by what means.

Mr. Maclean: The carcases are incinerated on farm.

ENVIRONMENT

Environmental Assessment

16. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the minimum area of land that he considers to be viable for environmental assessment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The size of a project and the site it occupies are only two of the factors to be taken into account in judging whether a project requires environmental assessment.

Local Government Finance

15. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from pensioners regarding the community charge.

Mr. David Hunt: I continue to receive representations on many issues concerning the community charge.

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list the actual grant given by Government to each of the county councils for the year 1989-90 and the proposed grant available to them arising from the standard spending assessment for the year 1990-91.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 15 March 1990]: The information is as follows. Revenue support grant will not be paid to county councils in 1990-91.

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures have been taken to provide for different levels of standard community charge to be applied according to the different circumstances of properties or individuals.

Mr. David Hunt; The standard community charge applies where domestic property is not used as a sole or main residence. Charging authorities may levy the standard charge by applying one of a choice of five multipliers (either 0, $\frac{1}{2}$, 1, $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2) to their personal community charge. However, different multipliers may be applied for certain prescribed or specified classes of property.

We have prescribed that no standard charge will be payable for the classes of property listed in table 1. We have also prescribed that for the classes of property listed in table two below the standard community charge multiplier may not exceed one. These provisions will ensure that in an important number of cases either total or partial relief is guaranteed. In particular, no charge is payable for up to three months on property which is unoccupied and unfurnished (for example because it is for sale): until three months after probate where a property is vacant because of the death of the owner; and for up to 12 months where a property is empty because the occupier has moved elsewhere either to care for another person or to be cared for by another person.

Charging authorities may also set different standard community charge multipliers for classes of property specified by reference to one or more of the factors listed in table three below. This for instance allows authorities the discretion to extend the periods of total relief applying to any class of property prescribed by the Secretary of State, and the discretion to take account of special circumstances, for example where properties give rise to the standard charge because the owner is required to live elsewhere in tied accommodation as a condition of his or her employment. My Department has given advice to local authorities on the scope and exercise of the discretion.

I understand that many authorities have already made good use of these provisions. However, I am concerned that other authorities have not chosen to make reasonable use of the discretion available to them. We will be monitoring local authority practice closely in the first months of the next financial year and, if necessary, we will have to consider further prescription by the Secretary of State for 1991-92.

Table 1: Types of property for which the Government have specified a maximum standard charge of 0

Unoccupied and unfurnished property requiring structural repair work to render it habitable, including unoccupied property with respect to which less than 6 months have elapsed since the day on which the work was completed.

Newly built unoccupied and unfurnished property or property which is being structurally altered, including property in respect of which less than 6 months have elapsed since the day on which the works were complete.

Unoccupied and unfurnished property in respect of which less than 3 months have elapsed since the date it was last occupied.

Property which has been empty for less than 12 months because the owner is living in a hospital or residential care home.

Property which has become vacant on death and in respect of which either probate or letters of administration has been obtained or less than 3 months have elapsed since grant of probate or letters of administration.

Property whose occupation is prohibited by law.

Empty vicarages pending the arrival of the new incumbent.

Properties which have been empty for less than 12 months because the owner has gone to be cared for in someone's home or the carer has left their own home empty to care for someone else.

Table 2: Types of property for which the Government have prescribed a maximum multiplier of 1

Caravans (that is, mobile homes on protected sites).

Property which may not be occupied throughout the year because of local planning conditions imposed on it.

Table 3: Factors which charging authorities may take into account in specifying standard community charge classes

The use to which properties are put or intended to be put.

Whether properties are occupied.

The period for which properties have been unoccupied.

The circumstances, other than financial circumstances, of persons subject to standard charges.

The capacity in which persons are subject to standard charges.

Whether properties fall within a class prescribed by the Secretary of State.

The periods for which unoccupied properties have previously been occupied.

The periods for which properties would have been unoccupied if all or some periods of occupation were treated as periods during which the properties were unoccupied.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table listing councils in rank order on the basis of the difference between the standard spending assessments and actual planned expenditure, and giving the actual figures for both on a per capita basis and the percentage difference between the two.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend, the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on Monday 19 March at column 478.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the classification of offshore workers' liability for community charge; and whether he has any information about local authorities using his guidance notes for seafarers to determine offshore workers' liability.

Mr. Chope: It is initially the responsibility of the community charges registration officer to decide whether a person is solely or mainly resident in his area, and therefore subject to a community charge. In determining this, a registration officer will need to consider factors such as the length of time the person is away from home, where most of his belongings are and, if appropriate, where his spouse lives and where his children attend school. In this respect offshore workers are no different from any other potential chargepayer. My Department's guidelines on the treatment of seafarers were not framed with offshore workers in mind, but there is nothing to stop any authorities applying them to this group if they thought it appropriate.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his criteria for assessing the spending obligations by statute and regulation of Suffolk county council in 1990-91; and how he expects these to change in 1991-92.

Mr. Chope: The standard spending assessment for Suffolk county council for 1990-91 has been calculated using the methodology set out in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England). We have not yet reached any views on spending for 1991-92.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts from the unified business rate which will accrue to (a) the Harrogate borough council, (b) York city council and (c) Scarborough borough council.

Mr. Chope: The amounts of redistributed business rates which will be paid to the three authorities are:

(a) Harrogate borough council	31,309,939
(b) York city council	23,068,264
(c) Scarborough borough council	23,754,778

This money is paid in support of parish, district and county council services in an area and is £293 per adult.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts paid in the individual community charges to the North Yorkshire county council from: (a) Harrogate borough council, (b) York city council and (c) Scarborough borough council.

Mr. Chope: I intend to place a summary of the information returned from local authorities in the Library of the House after information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to assess the workings of the community charge system.

Mr. Chope: My Department has kept the development of the community charge system under close scrutiny through a series of monitoring exercises. These have kept us up to date on the progress made by charging authorities. We will continue to monitor the system as billing and collection of the community charge commences.

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the percentage increase over 1989-90 in rates equivalent to the community charge in the London borough of Waltham Forest for the financial year 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: It is our intention when community charges are finally set to say what the increase would have been in domestic rates had that taken the place of the community charge.

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will calculate what the equivalent rate poundage for the Bournemouth and Poole borough councils would be under their proposed community charge rates of £320 and £325, respectively, under the old rating system; what proportion of the new charge relates to (a) county and (b) borough expenditure; and, in each case, what proportion of the increase is attributable to (i) reduction in Government grant support and (ii) increased expenditure by the county of borough authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: It is our intention, when community charges are finally set, to say what the increase would have been in domestic rates had that taken the place of the community charge.

The remainder of the information requested is not available, as the community charge is not split between counties and districts. Local authorities providing services in an area precept or make a demand on the collection fund, administered in non-metropolitan areas by the district council. These precepts and demands, which cover the whole of each authority's requirement for revenue, are met in full from the collection fund. Revenue support grant, business rate income and community charge income raised locally are paid into the fund in order to defray these precepts and demands. With these simple arrangements there is no need to allocate revenue support grant, business rates or community charges between tiers of local government.

The comparison between the revenue which each authority is raising and the Government's assessment of the cost to it of providing a standard level of service will be clear from the community charge bill. Where there is higher spending than the standard, it will be clear to the chargepayer whether it is county or the district which is responsible for that extra spending.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to collect information on those local authorities which will have to issue two poll tax bills in order to take into account rebates given to those who have applied for rebates after 15 February.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have been asked to reply.

No. The information required about local authorities' administration of community charge benefit was agreed with the local authority associations well in advance so that authorities would have sufficient time to prepare.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the rebate of community charge applicable in the case of a wage earner receiving £60 per week with a community charge levied at £344.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have been asked to reply.

The community charge benefit payable on a charge of £344, for a single person earning £60 a week, with capital of less than £3,000, would be £2·53 per week.

92. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to review the method of setting revenue support grant available for local authorities in 1991-92.

110. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to review the method of setting revenue support grant available for local authorities in 1991-92.

Mr. Chope: My officials have recently started discussions on the 1991-92 revenue support grant with officials of the local authority associations. The methodology for standard spending assessments will need to be adjusted to take account of local authority responsibilities for community care from April 1991. My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment, has said that he will consider any fresh evidence on SSAs before coming to his decisions for 1991-92.

112. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on rate-capping Basildon.

Mr. Chope: The Department has received a number of representations calling for Basildon to be charge capped. I am also aware of the petition presented to the House by my hon. Friend on 1 March.

109. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authorities about the setting of a poll tax rate.

Mr. Chope: The Secretary of State has received a number of representations from local authorities about the setting of community charges.

106. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on levels of revenue support grant to Oxfordshire.

Mr. Chope: The levels of revenue support grant before the safety net adjustment to be distributed to receiving authorities in Oxfordshire in 1990-91 are as follows:

	£ million
Cherwell	11·538
Oxford	15·231
South Oxfordshire	12·062
Vale of White Horse	9·854
West Oxfordshire	8·912

These amounts of grant provide a reasonable level of support to local authorities in the Oxfordshire area.

100. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received about the rebate system for the community charge.

Mr. Chope: I have received a number of such representations. In general, community charge rebates are more generous than the rate rebates they replace.

94. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people in England are eligible to pay the full community charge.

Mr. Chope: This information is not available.

90. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the cost of collecting the community charge; and what would be the cost of collecting a tax on capital values adjusted according to income.

Mr. Chope: The estimate for the annual cost of collecting the community charge in England is approximately £400 million; it is estimated that collecting the local tax based on incomes might cost up to twice that amount.

87. Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of total external support from Government, in the form of revenue support grant, business rate income, special grants and safety net will be paid in 1990-91 to (i) Wandsworth, (ii) Lambeth and (iii) Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Chope: The amounts of external support, that is the sum of revenue support grant adjusted for the safety net, business rate income and special grant in 1990-91 are as follows.

	External support
	£ million	£ per adult
(i) Wandsworth	213·5	1,034
(ii) Lambeth	234·2	1,358
(iii) Tower Hamlets	194·4	1,723

80. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the average poll tax level for England in 1990-91.

80. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average community charge level so far declared in England.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his best estimates of the average poll tax level for England in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) earlier today.

76. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received against the introduction of the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I continue to receive representations expressing a wide range of views on the community charge.

61. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from war service pensioners regarding the community charge.

Mr. Chope: We continue to receive representations on all aspects of the community charge. I am not aware of any representations from this group in particular.

62. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to use different rules for different types of local authority for the purposes of poll tax capping.

65. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the rules he intends to use for poll tax capping.

105. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to use different rules for different types of local authority for the purposes of poll tax capping.

111. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the rules he intends to use for poll tax capping.

Mr. Chope: I cannot speculate on the details of any charge-capping scheme we might operate for 1990-91.

58. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the way in which the community charge is being implemented in England.

Mr. Chope: The information available to the Department suggests that good progress has been made by local authorities in implementing the community charge. Initial registration was successfully completed in December and some authorities have already issued their first bills in advance of 1 April.

55. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many recent representations he has received in favour of introducing a system of capital value rates in place of the community charge.

83. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received to replace the community charge with a system of raising local government finance based on property values.

Mr. David Hunt: I am not aware of any representations in favour of capital value rates or roof tax, something which does not surprise me.

51. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to levy a poll tax below the Government's estimate for their area.

68. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to levy a poll tax below the Government's estimate for their area.

103. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to levy a poll tax below the Government's estimate for their area.

50. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to set their spending at or below the Goverment's standard spending assesement for their area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to set their spending at or below the Government's standard spending assessment for their area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have been able to set their spending at or below the Government's standard spending assessment level for their area.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of councils which have levied a poll tax greater than the Government recommended level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I intend to place a summary of the information returned in the Library of the House when information has been received from all authorities.

44. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the proportion of local government spending in 1989-90 and 1990-91 which will be devoted to meeting statutory requirements.

Mr. Chope: All local authority spending has to be in pursuance of statutory powers. Some spending is a consequence of duties, while some reflects the exercise of discretionary powers. Even where an authority is discharging a duty, there is often a considerable discretion as to the standard of service provided and the efficiency with which it is carried out. It is, therefore, not possible to estimate what proportion of spending will be devoted to meeting statutory requirements.

45. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would have been the increase in domestic rates in the city of Birmingham for 1990-91 for a single householder presently paying £500 in rates, based upon a 1990-91 community charge figure of £406 per adult.

Mr. Chope: It is our intention, when community charges are finally set, to say what the increase would have been in domestic rates had they taken the place of the community charge.

35. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the safety net charge paid by the community charge payers in the borough of Macclesfield; and what is the safety net receipt received by the community charge payers in the London borough of Wandsworth.

Mr. Chope: Adjustments to revenue support grant to give effect to the safety net are set out in the Revenue Support Grant Transition Report (England), made on 21 December 1989 and approved by the House on 18 January. The borough of Macclesfield's charge payers collectively contribute £5,951,306 to the safety net. The London borough of Wandsworth's charge payers collectively receive £24,030,650 from the safety net.

The safety net offsets changes in revenue from the domestic sector which are the result of changes in the system of local government finance from 1 April. The safety net limits increases to £25 an adult in real terms compared with 1989-90 rate bills per adult. This limit on increases for some areas is financed in 1990-91 only by other areas contributing about half of their gains. The contributions are for one year only as the safety net will be financed by extra grant from 1991-92.

31. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of replacing the community charge with a tax on home improvement.

Mr. Chope: I have not yet received any representations in favour of the roof tax.

28. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further consideration he has given to capping local authorities' community charges; and if he will make a statement.

39. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities he intends to community charge-cap.

Mr. Chope: I have nothing to add to what my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) earlier.

29. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Lancashire county council regarding its standard spending assessment.

Mr. Chope: The chief executive of Lancashire county council has written to the Department with details of a number of resolutions passed by the county council's finance sub-committee, one of which requests an increase in Lancashire's standard spending assessment for 1990-91.

26. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is (a) the revenue raised by all local authorities in England under the community charge in the year 1990-91 and (b) the revenue raised in rates in the year 1989-90.

Mr. David Hunt: I estimate that local authorities are planning to raise £12·5 billion next year from community charges, and £9·8 billion this year from domestic rates.

23. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average overall difference between domestic rate bills for 1988-89 and the community charge so far declared for 1990-91 by English local authorities.

Mr. David Hunt: The average domestic rate bill for 1988-89 was £468. The average community charge for 1991 is estimated to be £363. These figures are not comparable.

18. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to visit Nottingham to discuss local government finance.

Mr. David Hunt: I plan to visit Nottingham next Wednesday.

Chlorofluorocarbons

19. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress Britain is making towards implementing the Montreal protocol on chlorofluorocarbon reductions.

Mr. Trippier: By the end of 1989 the United Kingdom had cut its production and consumption of CFCs by over 50 per cent.—10 years ahead of current protocol requirements and five years ahead of even the strengthened provisions now being negotiated.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the technical report he has commissioned concerning the problem of the existing stock of chlorofluorocarbons.

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

This report has been commissioned by the Department of Trade and Industry. It seeks to establish the prospects for recovery for recycling or destruction of chlorofluorocarbons and halons, and was received this week.

The study will include assessments of the current and future likely levels of stocks, use and emissions of those substances and of the prospects for alternative products and processes in the United Kingdom. I expect it to be published later this spring. The study complements a previous one for the Department on the impact of health and safety and environment regulatory controls on chlorinated solvents. This was published on 6 March and copies of it have been placed in the Library of the House.

Acid Water

20. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met representatives from the acid waters review group; and what was discussed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend has not met the acid waters review group personally, but officials of the Department are in frequent contact with its members.

Nature Conservancy Council

21. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding the Government's proposals to reorganise the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mr. Trippier: As I told the hon. Lady in my written answer of 24 January, my Department continues to receive representations from interested parties covering a range of views.

Housing Policy

22. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding his housing policies.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend receives representations from time to time from hon. Members, interest groups and members of the public.

104. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provision is made in the Government's planning for new houses to ensure that established environment policies are maintained.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A revised planning policy guidance note on housing was issued in draft last autumn: I will send the hon. Member a copy. This makes clear that while adequate provision must be made for new housing development, it should be done with full regard to the need to protect and improve the environment, in both town and country.

93. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice is given to planning authorities through the planning for new housing policy to ensure that green field sites are not used first.

Mr. Moynihan: Existing guidance and draft guidance contained in the proposed revision of the planning policy guidance note on housing emphasise that development plans, in making provision for new housing, should ensure that full and effective use is made of land within existing urban areas. This should not however be at the expense of the character of established residential areas; policies in plans must also take account of the need for urban open space for recreation and amenity.

Housing

24. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres currently designated as green field sites or for agricultural use are estimated as being needed for housing in the south and south-west of England over the next 10 years.

32. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres currently designated as green field sites or used for agriculture are estimated as needed for housing and industrial development in the south, south-east and south-west of England by the year 2000.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We estimate that in the south-east of England, excluding London, the proportion of land in urban use will increase from approximately 12·6 per cent. in 1981 to 13·7 per cent. by 2001. Comparable estimates of the rates of urbanisation in other areas are not available though the absolute figures will be much lower.

57. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions in the new city allocation scheme is made for low-cost houses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Capital allocations to local authorities do not distinguish between low-cost housing and other housing capital expenditure: it is for individual local authorities to determine their priorities. The Housing Corporation's programme of investment in low-cost housing for rent and sale is set out in tables 8.4 and 8.5 of the public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 1008).

Vacant Land

25. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much vacant land in public ownership is entered on the Land Register showing the acreage in each of the public sectors, statutory undertakings and nationalised industries.

71. Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much vacant and derelict land in public ownership is entered on the Land Register showing the acreage currently owned by central Government, local government, and nationalised industries.

Mr. Moynihan: The breakdown of unused and underused land on the register at 30 September 1989 is shown in the table:

'000 acres (rounded to 100 acres)

	Acres
Central Government	7·2
Local authorities	49·4
Nationalised industries	9·4
Statutory undertakers	6·9
Other	9·4
Total	82·4

97. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to increase the derelict land grant for the Yorkshire and Humberside region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The national derelict land grant resources available for 1990-91 amount to £71·512 million. Of this sum, £13·450 million has been allocated to the Yorkshire and Humberside region. This represents an increase of 12 per cent. on the region's allocation for 1989-90.

84. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much derelict land in public ownership is entered on the Land Register for each of the last five years for which records exist.

Mr. David Hunt: The acreage of unused and underused land on the register is shown in the following table:

	'000 acres
1 January 1985	106·3
1 January 1986	104·7
1 January 1987	98·9
1 January 1988	91·2
1 January 1989	84·7
30 September 1989[1]	82·4

[1] Responsibility for maintaining full registers passed to individual owners at that date.

36. Mr. Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has monitored the vacant, derelict and under-utilised land which was in public ownership and has now been transferred to the private sector as a result of his privatisation programme.

Mr. David Hunt: No. The efficient use of their assets is a matter for the companies concerned.

56. Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of vacant, derelict and under-utilised land which was in public ownership has now been transferred to the private sector as a result of his privatisation programme; and how much of it is still vacant and derelict.

77. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much land in public ownership is currently on the Land Register; and how many acres have been removed in the last five years as a result of the privatisation of statutory undertakers.

Mr. David Hunt: Some 6,900 acres entered on the Department's register of unused and underused land have been transferred to the private sector. Information about its subsequent history is not kept, since the efficient use of their assets is a matter for the companies concerned.

Education

27. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of local government spending in 1989-90 will go towards education.

Mr. Chope: A total of 46 per cent. of local authority net current expenditure in England in 1989-90 is budgeted to be spent on education.

46. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the provisions of the Education Reform Act in reaching decisions on local government finance in 1990-91.

86. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the provisions of the Education Reform Act in drawing up his plans for local government finance for 1990-91.

96. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the provisions of the Education Reform Act in drawing up his plans for local government finance for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State took all the new burdens falling to local authorities into account when setting the level of total standard spending for 1990-91. I believe that the increase of 11 per cent. to £32·8 billion over the equivalent figure for 1989-90 is reasonable.

North Sea

30. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring forward the dates by which he intends to end the dumping of sewage sludge, fly ash and industrial wastes in the North sea.

Mr. Trippier: No. We confirmed our intention to end the dumping of industrial waste by the end of 1992 and to end the dumping of sewage sludge by the end of 1998 at the third North sea conference in the Hague on 7 and 8 March. These wastes are not toxic and no harm has been proven in the marine environment. The setting of termination dates is in line with the precautionary approach adopted at the second North sea conference in 1987.

108. Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the condition of the United Kingdom's rivers and their contribution to pollution of the North sea.

Mr. David Trippier: The United Kingdom's rivers are amongst the cleanest in Europe. Ninety five per cent. are classified as being of good or fair quality compared with 75 per cent. in the European Community as a whole.

The combined effect of all United Kingdom rivers flowing into the North sea is to contribute about 20 per cent. of riverborne contaminants. The remaining 80 per cent. comes from continental rivers, with the Rhine and Meuse alone contributing some 40 to 50 per cent.

The United Kingdom's north sea national action plan, published on 5 March, shows the progress that has already been made in further reducing the inputs of dangerous substances to rivers and coastal waters and hence the open sea. For instance, inputs of two of the most important contaminants, mercury and cadmium, have been reduced by 31 and 22 per cent. respectively since 1985.

81. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent North sea Environment Ministers' conference.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 12 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on the outcome of The Hague conference on 7 and 8 March.

70. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response his proposals to protect North sea wildlife received at the recent conference of North sea Environment Ministers.

Mr. Trippier: The United Kingdom's initiative in raising wildlife as a topic for consideration by North sea Ministers was well received at last week's conference in the Hague. In addition to the United Kingdom's proposals in the package of measures agreed on research, survey and protection of marine wildlife the final declaration also reflects proposals from the Governments of the Netherlands and Sweden. The agreement on protection of small cetaceans (dolphins and porpoises) will be further developed by the Swedish Government in the context of the Bonn convention on the conservation of migratory species of wild animals.

42. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent studies his Department has carried out regarding waste disposal in the North sea and its impact on marine life.

Mr. Trippier: Studies of effects of contaminants on marine species arising from any waste reaching the sea, via rivers, the atmosphere or dumping are a fundamental part of marine environment science programmes of the Department of the Environment, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and other research agencies in the United Kingdom working on the North sea. An assessment of general effects on marine species, reflecting the results of research by the United Kingdom and other North sea states, is included in the quality status report prepared for the second North sea conference, a copy of which is in the Library.

Recent or continuing work sponsored by the Department of the Environment has included studies of seals and benthic (sea bed) communities, and the development of internationally standardised techniques for assessing the biological impact of contaminants.

40. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of pollution entering the North sea comes from rivers; and what proportion of that pollution comes from British rivers and those on the continent, respectively.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Pollution enters the North sea by way of rivers and direct discharges, atmospheric deposition, dumping at sea, and the operational discharges from ships and offshore platforms. Of these, reliable estimates can be made of all except atmospheric deposition, the effects of which are widely diffused over the entire sea area.

Rivers bringing heavy contaminant loads to relatively small areas of the sea, are the most important source of North sea pollution and our best estimate is that they contribute roughly 40 per cent, of the North sea contaminant load. Of that, 20 per cent. comes from British rivers and 80 per cent. from continental rivers.

33. Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to protect wildlife in the North sea.

Mr. Trippier: The third North sea conference last week in the Hague adopted an agreement to protect dolphins and porpoises and a package of other measures on wildlife, including securing better protection for the major North sea wildlife sites.

Protection for marine wildlife was a United Kingdom proposal at the conference and we will build on these initiatives at future conferences.

34. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on adapting planning guidelines to assist farmers diversifying into the tourist trade in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Rural diversification is one of the subjects covered in the revised planning policy guidance note on "The Countryside and the Rural Economy", issued in draft on 13 December. Nearly 400 responses have so far been received, some of which make specific reference to tourism. All the comments will be carefully considered.

Homelessness

37. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for homeless households (a) in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and (b) in other temporary accommodation in England and Wales.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Latest estimates of households temporarily resident in bed and breakfast and other forms of temporary accommodation in England appear in tables 4*(a)*, (b) and (c) of "Local authorities' action under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act: England. Results for the fourth quarter 1989. Supplementary Tables", which is in the Library.

For information about Wales I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

95. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further proposals he has to combat homelessness.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey).

48. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the cost of bed-and-breakfast or other emergency accommodation as a result of mortgage repossession.

Mr. Chope: Information is not held centrally in the form requested. For the latest estimate of the total cost to local authorities of keeping homeless families in bed and breakfast accommodation I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, on 21 February 1990 to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) at column 746.

Contractorisation

38. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends to meet representatives of local authorities to discuss anti-competitive practices in the awarding of contracts for services.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no present plans for a meeting with local authorities on this subject, but I shall shortly be issuing guidance by way of a circular.

43. Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received about anti-competitive behaviour by councils; and what action he is taking to eliminate such behaviour.

Mr. David Hunt: The Department has received just over 200 representations alleging anti-competitive practices by local authorities in respect of services put out to tender under the Local Government Act 1988 and about 40 arising from the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

Each case is investigated and appraised on its merits. My right hon. Friend has considerable powers of sanction under the legislation and has already issued a direction under the 1980 Act, requiring Wirral borough council to obtain his consent before assigning work to its own DSO when it has not submitted the lowest tender, and on 13 March of this year under the 1988 Act to Hillingdon borough council, prohibiting it from carrying out vehicle maintenance work through its own staff after 1 September of this year.

Home Improvement Grants

41. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the amount of grants made by the Government for home improvements over the past 10 years.

Mr. Chope: During the financial years 1981-82 to 1988-89, the Government provided £2,898 million in Exchequer subsidy to local authorities in England towards their expenditure on home improvement grants. Information for years prior to 1981-82 is not available.

Association of District Councils

47. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Association of District Councils; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the Association of District Councils on 26 February. The Association of County Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities were also present. They discussed environmental matters.

Town Planning

49. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the principal elements being considered for his Department's draft legislation on planning and development controls in urban areas of relatively high density.

Mr. Michael Spicer: In reply to a Question from my hon. Friend on 12 March, Official Report, column 104, I indicated the options that I proposed should be included in a forthcoming consultation paper about the possible extension of planning control to the demolition of dwellinghouses. Some of these options would need legislation. As we have indicated, the Government intend to introduce legislation at an early opportunity on a number of planning topics, which would apply in urban areas and elsewhere.

54. Mr. Rees: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to ensure high quality design in new and refurbished buildings so that they improve the appearance of the town or city; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) on 6 March 1990, Official Report, columns 557-58.

Planners

52. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planners are employed by his Department; and at what cost.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Department currently employs 65 staff in professional town planner posts at a total cost of £2,609,000 a year.

Sports Council

53. Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Sports Council; and what matters were discussed.

101. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Sports Council; and what matters he intends to discuss.

Mr. Moynihan: I will be meeting the chairman of the Sports Council later today and we will be discussing a range of current issues relating to sport and recreation.

107. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has held with the Sports Council and the Central Council for Physical Recreation about the new business rate and its impact upon sport.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and officials of my Department have had a number of meetings with the Sports Council and the Central Council for Physical Recreation at which the impact of the business rate on non-profit-making sports clubs has been discussed.

Urban Development

59. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average annual loss of agricultural land in the United Kingdom for urban development since 1979.

98. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average loss of agricultural land in both private and public sectors to housing development and other uses since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Information published by the Department shows that the average area of land in England recorded each year by the Ordance Survey as changing from agricultural to urban use in the period 1985 to 1988 was 5,760 hectares per annum. Further details are given in the Department's statistical bulletins, copies of which are in the Library.

Figures for earlier years are given in planning policy guidance note 7 "Rural Enterprise and Development", but are not directly comparable with the figures for 1985-88.

Environmental White Paper

60. Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what issues he intends to cover in his forthcoming environmental White Paper.

Mr. Trippier: Our aim is to address a wide range of environmental issues, from global concerns about the atmosphere and climate change to topics that impinge on our local environment.

Rural Development Areas

63. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many areas have now been designated rural development areas; and what is the size of the population covered by such areas.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The 27 designated rural development areas have a population of approximately 2·5 million.

Rivers

64. Mr. Alison: To put the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of United Kingdom rivers are of good or fair quality; and what are the comparable proportions in the rest of Europe.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: A review of river classification schemes across the European Community published in 1988 by the water research centre showed that 95 per cent. of river length in the United Kingdom was of good or fair quality compared with 75 per cent. in the European Community as a whole. The review also indicated that no other member state had a higher proportion of good or fair quality rivers than the United Kindom, although our position was equalled by the Netherlands.

Council Rents

66. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to allocate further subsidy to local authorities to prevent local authorities from increasing rents to meet their housing benefit responsibilities.

Mr. Chope: No. No local authority has to increase rents to meet housing benefit responsibilities.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has developed any proposals to bring local authority rent increases into line with his Department's latest rent guidelines.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is for local authorities to determine the rents they set for council housing. Rent increases can stay within the housing revenue account subsidy guidelines if authorities so wish.

Private Sector Tenants

67. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if it is his intention to extend the principle of tenants' choice to tenants in the private sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No. Many public sector landlords own a very high proportion of the total rented dwelling stock in their area. That is not true of private landlords.

River Pollution

69. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made by the National Rivers Authority in controlling river pollution and taking action against polluters.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Since it fully assumed its responsibilities on 1 September 1989, the National Rivers Authority has been actively carrying out its functions in relation to pollution control, and has successfully prosecuted a number of offenders. The authority has also embarked on a number of reviews of policy areas, including the discharge consent system, and it will carry out a national survey of water quality in 1990.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

72. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his future policy for the protection of areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Mr. Trippier: The draft policy planning guidance note on the countryside and the rural economy issued for public comment on 13 December 1989 is a clear and authoritive statement of the Government's planning policies for the continued protection of areas of outstanding natural beauty and the wider countryside.

City Action Teams

73. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many city action teams and inner city task forces are now operating in the north-west of England.

Mr. David Hunt: City action teams have been set up in Liverpool, covering Liverpool and Birkenhead, and Manchester, covering the Manchester and Salford areas. Task forces are operating in Moss Side and Hulme, Manchester, and Granby and Toxteth, Liverpool. My hon. Friend the Minister for Industry announced on 28 February that a new task force will be established in Wirral and that the existing Rochdale task force will close later this year.

South Downs National Park

74. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what submissions he has received for or against the creation of a South Downs national park.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: So far this year, my right hon. Friend has received one letter from a member of the public for, and two letters from hon. Members covering correspondence against the creation of a South Downs national park.

Councillors' Allowances

75. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to announce the introduction of a new system of councillors' allowances.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 23 February 1990 to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) at column 24. I expect to announce details of the new system soon.

Integrated Pollution Control

78. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the introduction of integrated pollution control in Britain.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's proposals for integrated pollution control (IPC) are contained in part I of the Environmental Protection Bill. IPC will provide an innovatory framework for controlling emissions to air water and land at one and the same time from the most potentially polluting processes. It marks a major breakthrough in the control of pollution and an environmental first in Europe.

Depending on the enactment of the Bill, IPC will become operational by the end of the year. All new processes will thenceforth come under IPC. There will be a phased programme for bringing existing processes with the system. Our aim is for this programme to be completed within five years.

Acid Deposition

79. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to reduce acid deposition by the year 2000.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 February at column 481.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list current United Kingdom publicly funded research programmes into the impacts of acid rain deposition on sensitive British ecosystems, stating funding levels and research bodies;

(2) If he will make a statement on progress on the current publicly funded research concerning the impact of acid deposition on sensitive British ecosystems and its findings;

(3) what is the current United Kingdom publicly funded research programme on critical loads and acid rain; and what are the findings.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the current financial year, United Kingdom publicly funded research on acid deposition and critical loads can be summarised as follows:

Funding body	1989-90 £k
Department of the Environment	1,490·0
Meteorological Office	37·0
Nature Conservancy Council	94·0
Natural Environment Research Council	160·0
Agriculture and Food Research Council	48·0
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	186·0
Total 1989-90	2,050·0

The United Kingdom plays a prominent international role in the development of the critical loads approach to pollution control. This very substantial programme of research informs that role, and is also part of our overall policy of basing action on the best scientific information that can be obtained.

The Department has established several review groups of scientific experts to examine and assess research and to recommend priorities in the field of acid rain deposition and critical loads. The United Kindom terrestrial effects and acid waters review groups, and the review group on acid rain have all produced reports, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. The critical loads advisory group and the terrestrial effects sub-group on trees are expected to report by the end of this year.

Countryside Commission

82. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the increase in funding for the Countryside Commission since 1979.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Subject to the approval of Parliament, we propose to increase the Countryside Commission's grant-in-aid to £25·136 million in 1990-91. This represents an increase in real terms of 112 per cent. over the allocation in 1979-80.

Council Properties, Kirklees

85. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses currently stand empty within Kirklees council's boundaries; and what is the current level of council house rent arrears.

Mr. Chope: The latest available information on empty council dwellings was provided by Kirklees metropolitan borough council in its April 1989 housing investment programme return (HIP1), a copy of which is in the Library.

The arrears of rent reported by Kirklees on its housing subsidy claim form at the end of March 1989 were £1·7 million.

Environmental Pricing

88. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made by his Department in examining the feasibility of implementing recommendations contained in the Pearce report on environmental pricing.

Mr. Trippier: The current review of environmental policy, which will lead to the publication of a White Paper later this year, is considering these among other proposals.

Uniform Business Rate

91. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the uniform business rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 5 February 1990 to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) at column 446.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the London borough of Wandsworth will gain from the uniform business rate in 1990-91 as against its current revenue from business and commercial rates.

Mr. Chope: Under the new system of local government finance, non-domestic rate receipts will be distributed as an equal amount per community charge payer and will go to reducing charges. Because of the associated change to the new revenue support grant system and because of major changes in local authority function in inner London, comparisons of levels of business rate income between 1989-90 and 1990-91, or of grant support, do not imply a corresponding effect on community charges. External financial support to authorities (before the safety net and special grants) is distributed between authorities so as to enable a charge of broadly £278 to be set in each area if the authorities provide a standard level of service.

St. Ives Bay

99. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the implications for South West water services proposed long sea outfall into St. Ives bay of his policy announcement accepting the case that sewage discharged into the sea should first be treated.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As the applications by South West Water Services for discharge consents related to the Penzance-St. Ives sewerage scheme are currently before the Secretary of State for determination, I am unable to comment on the proposals.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

102. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for planning consents in request of sites of special scientific interest have been granted (a) by planning authorities and (b) on appeal by the Secretary of State in the last period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Trippier: Neither the NCC nor the Department keeps a central record of the information requested and it could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mortgage Repossessions

113. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for mortgage repossessions in England and Wales (a) by building societies and (b) by banks and other financial institutions.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information available to the Department is for mortgage repossessions by United Kingdom building societies in 1989 (13,780) and by English local authorities in 1989-90 (170).

Clay Pigeon Shoots

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the final draft of the code of practice on noise from clay pigeon shoots 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: My Department is in the process of considering responses from a wide range of interested bodies, to a consultation exercise on the Clay Pigeon Shooting Association's draft code of practice on noise from clay pigeon shooting held last year, with a view to meeting the association again in due course to discuss the comments received. No date for the publication of a code of practice has been finalised.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what current proposals there are to achieve compliance with its European Community commitment to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions by 60 per cent. of their 1980 value by 1993.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 February at column 481.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the contribution to be made from (a) the import of low-sulphur coal, (b) the import of French-generated electricity and (c) an increase in domestic nuclear electricity generation towards achieving the target reduction in sulphur dioxide from 1980 levels by 1993.

Mr. Chris Patten: A formal plan for reducing SO_2 and NOx emissions from existing large combustion plants will be issued later this year.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research has been carried out by the building research establishment into energy use in buildings and the greenhouse effect.

Mr. Chris Patten: The building research establishment will shortly be publishing a study, commissioned by my Department, entitled "Energy Use in Buildings and Carbon Dioxide Emissions".

Climate Change

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken so far to adhere to the Noordwijk conference declaration to stabilise United Kingdom carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000.

Mr. Chris Patten: That declaration required the basis for stabilisation to be considered in the light of the IPCC report and the second world climate conference later this year. In the meantime, the Government has continued to finance the work of the scientific working group of the IPCC; offered to host an international technical workshop to explore the practical issues which would arise in making binding agreements on green house gas emissions; and is considering proposals for action both domestically and through the European Community, as appropriate.

Waltham Forest (Debt)

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much the debt of the London borough of Waltham Forest has increased since 1986; what is the interest payable on this increase; and how much of the borough's community charge is represented by this interest.

Mr. Chope: Figures published by CIPFA show that outstanding debt increased from £200 million in March 1986 to £247 million in March 1989. The March 1989 figure includes debt inherited from the Greater London council.

No information is available on the interest payable on the increase, or on the effect on the community charge.

Cycling (Royal Parks)

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cyclists have been arrested in London's royal parks over the last five years for cycling-related offences.

Mr. Trippier: There is no power of arrest for cycling offences under the royal parks regulations. During the three years 1987-89, four cyclists were arrested for failing to give their name and address, one for being drunk in charge of a cycle and one for assault on the police. Figures for arrests in 1985 and 1986 are not available.

Liverpool (Funding)

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much funding has been provided by the Government for derelict land reclamation in Liverpool in each of the last three years.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested is as follows:

£ million

Grant programme	Actual 1987-88	Actual 1988-89	Forecast 1989-90
Derelict land grant	3·010	1·061	0·552
Urban programme[1]	n/a	0·072	n/a
Merseyside Development Corporation[1]	3·560	1·650	3·000
Urban regeneration grant/city grant[1,2]	nil	0·960	0·835

[1] Includes expenditure on unused or waste land as well as derelict land.
[2] Information does not relate solely to the costs of reclamation since grant is based on the total project costs including those of reclamation.

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much funding has been provided by the Government through the Housing Corporation and local authorities to housing associations in Liverpool in each of the last three years.

Mr. Chope: Over the three-year period 1986-87 to 1988-89 the value of new housing association schemes approved by the Housing Corporation in Liverpool was as follows:

Approvals	Amount £
1986-87	26,015,011
1987-88	27,580,399
1988-89	25,203,412

(Note: Figures for 1986-87 exclude miscellaneous works. All figures represent the estimated cost to the public sector and take no account of private capital invested).

Similar figures for 1989-90 are not yet available.

Comparable figures for schemes supported by Liverpool city council are not available but during the same period the council reported the following gross capital lending to housing associations:

Year	Loans £
1986-87	2,461,000
1987-88	2,125,000
1988-89	811,000

Figures for city council lending in 1989-90 are not yet available.

Tyre Disposals Ltd

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to request the health and safety executive to conduct a safety and environmental audit of the site operated by Tyre Disposals Ltd. on Humberside.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. I understand that the relevant waste disposal authority, Humberside county council, has considered the environmental aspects of this company's operations and is pursuing appropriate courses of action under the Control of Pollution Act. HMIP is aware of the situation and is in touch with the waste disposal authority. I also understand that the HSE has not been involved at this site. From the information available, it is unclear whether the HSE or the local district council will be the relevant enforcing authority for the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act.

Motor Tyres

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to encourage the environmentally friendly recycling of redundant motor vehicle tyres.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs is expecting to receive very shortly a final report by KPMG Peat Marwick identifying ways of reducing the volume of scrapped vehicle tyres and increasing resource recovery. When he receives the report he will set up a working party, in conjunction with my Department, with industry, local authority and voluntary group representation, to draw up an action plan.

Bathing Beaches (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the designated bathing beaches in Yorkshire and Humberside;

(2) if he will list the designated bathing beaches in Yorkshire and Humberside that breached the European Community mandatory standards for sewage bacteria on at least one sample for the years (a) 1987, (b) 1988 and (c) 1989;

(3) if he willl list the designated bathing beaches in Yorkshire and Humberside that have failed the European Community guidelines for sewage bacteria on at least one sample for the years (a) 1987, (b) 1988 and (c) 1989;

(4) if he will list, by year since 1987, for the designated bathing beaches of Yorkshire and Humberside (a) the dates, (b) the locations and (c) the results of routine sampling carried out; and if he will show in his answer where the results obtained breached (i) European Community guidelines and (ii) European Community mandatory standards.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information required for the identified bathing waters of Yorkshire and Humberside is to be found in the reports of the bathing waters surveys for the appropriate years which have been placed in the Library, Official Report, 5 May 1988, column 571; 21 February 1989, column 572; 25 January 1990, column 785.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the effectiveness of the new National Rivers Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend receives many letters raising matters, such as water pollution, which are now within the responsibility of the National Rivers Authority. I am delighted that the National Rivers Authority has already been able to demonstrate clearly its commitment to effective regulation of water quality. A number of offenders have been successfully prosecuted, and many more have received formal warnings; the authority has embarked on a number of reviews of key policy areas, and is actively developing its priorities for future action.

Palace of Westminster

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what investigations have been made into the location and potential dangers to hon. Members, staff and visitors of asbestos in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Chope: The parliamentary works office maintains a register of the locations of all known asbestos in the Palace of Westminster and outbuildings. These are inspected annually to check for signs of deterioration. The register has been built up through routine building maintenance inspections of the entire parliamentary estate and tests carried out when work is done which is likely to uncover previously hidden asbestos. All potentially dangerous asbestos is removed.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals to undertake maintenance work to the great clock this year.

Mr. Chope: Following one of the regular inspections of the clock it has been decided to replace part of the mechanism which is showing signs of fatigue. This will necessitate stopping the hour strike for up to 12 weeks and all chiming and striking for two days whilst the mechanism is disconnected and when it is reconnected. The work will start on Monday 26 March.

Dangerous Substances

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps the Government are taking to control the emissions of dangerous substances into rivers and the sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Discharges of dangerous substances to rivers and seas are already effectively controlled by the National Rivers Authority through discharge consents based on its duty to maintain statutory quality objectives and other published environmental quality standards.

The Environmental Protection Bill extends the controls on discharges of dangerous substances from the most polluting industries. Under the new arrangements Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution will authorise discharges to all environmental media, based on the use of best available technology not entailing excessive costs, providing that these also meet the requirements of the National Rivers Authority on environmental quality objectives.

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to ensure that no staff or former staff of companies bidding for the Crown Suppliers are engaged as consultants.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 March 1990]: When employing consultants, care is always taken to avoid potential conflicts of interest. It would not be acceptable to use, as a consultant on a matter relating to the Crown Suppliers, either a company which was bidding for the Crown Suppliers or an individual who was known to have a continuing relationship with a bidder.

Household Statistics

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many households there were nationally, in the Yorkshire and Humberside region and in the county of North Yorkshire for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The estimated numbers of households are as follows:

Thousands

Yorkshire and Humberside region	1,808	1,849	1,906	1,924
North Yorkshire	249	258	273	278

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the volume and sources of hazardous waste imported into the United Kingdom under the terms of the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 during the last convenient 12-month period.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Imports of waste into England and Wales during 1989 under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 were as follows:

Genetically Engineered Organisms

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the possible ethical implications of regulating genetically engineered organisms.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 20 March 1990]: I am considering the ethical implications of such regulation with colleagues and will make a statement in due course.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Cocaine

103. Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of seizures of cocaine, in the most recent years for which figures are available, was of cocaine entering the United Kingdom from member states of the European Community.

Mr. Ryder: The information is as follows:

Year	Percentage of United Kingdom routed via EC	Weight of United Kingdom seizures routed via EC kg

[1] All 1989 figures are provisional.

Personal Sector Debt

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the amounts by which those in the personal sector were in debt in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989; and what proportion in the sector were not in debt at all in both years.

Mr. Ryder: The financial liabilities of the personal sector amounted to £70·9 billion in 1979 and £364·9 billion in 1989. These figures may be found in table 14·5 of "Financial Statistics" or on the CSO database which is accessible through the Library. No information is available on the proportion of those in the sector who were not in debt at all.

European Community Budget Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the net budget contribution of (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) West Germany to the EEC for 1989; what is his estimate for 1990, 1991 and 1992 both in absolute terms and per capita; and what are his proposals for reducing the British contribution.

Mr. Ryder: The latest published estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1989, which appeared in the statement on the 1989 Community budget (Cm. 680), is £1,966 million. This figure is the equivalent of £34.43 per capita, on the basis of the estimated United Kingdom population of 57·1 million in 1988 which is contained in the 1990 edition of "Social Trends". A revised estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution in 1989, and an estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution in 1990, will be published shortly in the statement on the 1990 Community budget. It is not the Government's practice to publish calendar year forecasts for future years; but the recent public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 1018) provides estimates for the financial years up to and including 1992-93.

Comparable figures for other member states' net contributions are not available.

The United Kingdom's contribution to the Community budget is being significantly reduced by the Fontainebleau abatement mechanism. This will have produced a cumulative benefit of some £7·5 billion by the end of 1990.

International Monetary Fund Quotas

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the negotiations on the ninth review of the International Monetary Fund quotas.

Mr. Ryder: Discussions are continuing in the International Monetary Fund board, and we very much hope that they can be concluded swiftly. One difficulty which had emerged was how to accommodate the special quota increase that Japan is seeking. The United Kingdom has helped to provide a solution by offering to give up some of its quota share: this enables Japan to move up to second rank in the fund without reducing the quota share of developing countries. Our offer has been widely welcomed. The rankings of the other major countries will be determined in the usual way, according to the quota formulas agreed by the whole International Monetary Fund membership. Taking account of the offer we have made, these formulas would reduce the United Kingdom's quota share from 6·9 per cent. to 6·0 per cent. and would move the United Kingdom to fourth position in the rankings; we are perfectly ready to accept that result. I hope that the remaining issues, on the overall size of the quota increase and on the problem of arrears on past International Monetary Fund lending, can be resolved soon.

European Currency Unit

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's European currency unit Treasury bill programme.

Mr. Ryder: The programme has now reached a total outstanding of 3 billion ecu and we have been able to issue bills at one, three and six-month maturities on very fine terms. In view of this success and the unsatisfied demand which still exists, particularly at longer maturities, we shall be issuing an additional 100 million ecu of six-month bills each month from the April tender. This means an increase in the programme to a total of 3·6 billion ecu of bills outstanding by September—helping to develop the private ecu market in London and demonstrating the practical contribution the United Kingdom is making to greater economic and monetary integration in Europe.

Tax Debts

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many petitions have been presented by Her Majesty's Inland Revenue against (a) limited companies and (b) individuals to secure the repayment of tax debts in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The number of winding-up and bankruptcy petitions filed in England, Wales and Northern Ireland in each of the last three years is:

	Company winding up petitions	Bankruptcy petitions
1987	308	1,415
1988	277	2,435
1989	317	2,707

The precise equivalent figures for Scotland cannot be ascertained without disproportionate cost, but do not exceed 20 companies and 70 individuals for any of those years.

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by civil servants on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 20 March 1990]: I regret that directly comparable figures are not available. But, on the basis of information to hand, the value at current prices of the average pension received by civil servants who retired in 1979 is £2,614; for those who retired in 1969 it is £2,213. These figures include increases paid under the provisions of the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971 (as amended).

Inland Revenue Staff

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people staff the Inland Revenue survey of personal incomes.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The full-time equivalent of some 25 people, including about 10 in tax offices.

TRANSPORT

Tyre Treads

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the consultation process on the European Economic Community proposals for a change in tyre tread depth regulations.

Mr. Atkins: The Department's consultation on draft regulations to introduce the mandatory tread depth requirements in Community directive 89/459/EEC from 1 January 1992 has been completed. A statutory instrument amending the Construction and Use Regulations will be laid before the House shortly.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Atkins: The total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of my Department and the non-departmental public bodies for which my Department is responsible, in the financial years 1979-80 and 1989-90 is as follows:

Year	Amount £
1979–80	5,840,000
1989–90	6,434,000

The expenditure by my Department is recorded in financial years, not calendar years.

Headington Roundabout

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on his Department's interim proposals for the Green road roundabout, Headington, Oxford.

Mr. Atkins: My Department has received representations from Oxfordshire county council which are now being considered. These concern the consideration of the possible need for a footbridge.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport according to what criteria his Department's proposals for a bus lane from Green road roundabout, Headington, Oxford, extending as far as Collinwood road, were decided.

Mr. Atkins: The westbound carriageway of the A40 between the Headington roundabout and Collinwood road is subject to serious traffic delays. Provision of a bus lane would enable buses to overtake queueing traffic.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider establishing a bus lane from Green road roundabout, Headington, Oxford, to Thornhill park and ride car park.

Mr. Atkins: We have no present plans to extend the bus lane beyond Collinwood road. The indications are that the cost would outweigh any benefits.

Heavy Vehicles

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy on emissions from heavy diesel engined vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is today urging the European Commission at the Environment Council to make proposals to introduce tighter controls on gaseous emissions from heavy diesels and to set limits for the first time for particulate emissions from these vehicles. The Government regard these proposals as long overdue.

Diesel emissions, in the form of oxides of nitrogen and particulates, are a significant cause of pollution and loss of amenity. Oxides of nitrogen (NOx) can damage plants and crops, as well as affect human health. Diesel particulates cause soiled buildings and discomfort to pedestrians and other road users.

The Government believe that the Community's long-term aim should be to set a mid-1990s diesel standard based as closely as possible on the US 1994 standard, both in limit values and test procedure. This is the strictest of all the diesel emission standards being considered worldwide.

In particular, it would afford substantial reductions in the amount of NOx and particulates that new vehicles may emit. I strongly support early action towards setting these tougher standards.

ENERGY

Electricity

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the weighted average increase in domestic electricity prices in the 12 electricity board areas of England and Wales in the year commencing 1 April 1990.

Mr. Baldry: Electricity prices are a matter for the industry, but I understand that the weighted average increase in domestic tariffs in England and Wales for 1990-91 is 9·2 per cent.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much was paid in fees to the organisations listed in his answer of 13 March, Official Report, columns 141-44.

Mr. Wakeham: It is not the practice of Her Majesty's Government to publish the sums paid to individual advisers or contractors in a privatisation.

France (Nuclear Safety)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to obtain from the French nuclear safety authorities the report, "Nuclear Safety at Elecricité de France (EDF)," at the end of 1989, by the chief inspector for nuclear safety at EDF; and if he will seek an early meeting with the head of nuclear safety in France and his French counterpart to discuss nuclear safety.

Mr. Baldry: Both my Department and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate have copies of the report. There are continuing and regular contacts between my officials and the inspectorate's and their French counterparts to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Alternative Energy

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to alternative energy to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 4 to 8 June.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he has made of the likely impact of privatisation on electricity prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1989, c. 1-3]: As previously announced, the average increase in electricity prices for all customers will be less than 6 per cent. this year. The Government have now agreed the controls on future price increases that will apply to the area electricity supply companies.

For customers taking less than 1 MW, the final price will increase by an average of some 9 per cent. this year. The price controls agreed should prevent any further real increase to these customers until April 1993.

Customers taking more than 1 MW are able to seek competing bids for supply. To allow time for these customers to negotiate contracts, the electricity industry has agreed to offer them a price freeze in real terms for one year. However, many of these customers will experience real reductions in price this year.

These controls apply to the final price paid by customers. But in future the price will be made up of a number of different elements: the price for generating electricity in power stations; the charge for transmitting it across the national grid; the price for distributing it over the area electricity companies' local networks; the area supply company's margin; and the fossil fuel levy. The area supply companies have a monopoly on distribution and the National Grid Company has a monopoly on transmission. Their charges therefore need to be separately regulated within the overall controls on final prices to customers. Transmission and distribution respectively make up about 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. of the final price to customers.

The price control applying to the National Grid Company will prevent its prices from rising by faster than the RPI. Increases in charges for transmission will therefore be held at or below the rate of inflation.

The price control applying to the 12 area supply companies will prevent the charges for distribution from rising by more than RPI + X, where X ranges between the different companies from 0 to 2·5, with a weighted average of 1·1, as follows:

	RPI
Eastern Electricity	+0·25
East Midlands Electricity	+1·25
LEB	+0
MANWEB	+2·50
MEB	+1·15
Northern Electric	+1·55
NORWEB	+1·40
Southern Electric	+0·65
SEEB	+0·75
South Wales Electricity	+2·50
SWEB	+2·25
Yorkshire Electricity	+1·30

Within the overall cap on final prices, charges for distribution may therefore rise on average by just 1·1 percentage point faster than inflation. This will allow investment of some £5 billion to be made in the capital-intensive distribution network to ensure the high standards of security are maintained. The area supply companies' price control will also prevent their supply margins from rising faster than inflation.

Altogether, this package will protect the smaller customer from real price increases, and enable larger customers to benefit from competition. Within the overall price controls, the area supply companies and National Grid Company will be able to charge a price that enables them to finance the investment required.

PRIME MINISTER

Fishing

Q63. Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received concerning the present economic circumstances of the catching section of the fishing industry; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government are well aware of the current difficulties facing the fishing industry, but between 1983 and 1988 the value of landings increased by over 40 per cent. There is an urgent need to work for effective conservation of fish on a Communitywide basis and to adopt improved quota management measures which will bring fishing capacity more closely into line with available opportunities.

South Africa

Q133. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a further statement on her policy towards South African political organisations which continue to advocate the use of violence.

The Prime Minister: We are stongly opposed to the use of violence for political ends in South Africa as elsewhere. We have repeatedly urged South African political organisations to enter negotiations in the context of a suspension of violence on all sides.

European Council

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will urge at the next meeting of the European Council clarification of the extent to which the single market arrangements are proceeding; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Arrangements for the completion of the single European market are proceeding very well. Almost 60 per cent. of the legislation programme is now complete, including a number of important and contentious issues such as the liberalisation of capital movements, the mutual recognition of professional qualifications, and the mergers regulation.

The Irish presidency is maintaining the political momentum, and reached agreement at the Internal Market Council on 22 February to extend public purchasing rules to the energy, telecommunications, water and transport sectors.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will invite the next meeting of the European Council to review the structure of contributions by member states; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The review of the Community's finances concluded at the European Council in Brussels on 11 to 13 February 1988 confirmed the arrangements for abating the United Kingdom's contributions. The Fontainebleau mechanism remains totally intact and it will last as long as the new own resources arrangements. Our cumulative benefit from the Fontainebleau mechanism will be some £7·5 billion by the end of 1990.

East Germany

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has made to Chancellor Kohl about his proposal that West Germany should use its trade surplus to invest in East Germany; and how great she estimates Britain's contribution will be to rebuilding East Germany for 1990 if the process is financed on that basis.

The Prime Minister: The financing of the rebuilding of East Germany is a matter for the German authorities and individual companies, both in Germany and elsewhere.

Community Charge

Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have yet completed their review of the possibility of community charge-capping any local authorities; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is currently considering the information which he has about local authorities' budgets. When he has completed his consideration he will announce to the House any decisions to cap authorities.

Romanian Children

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what are the interdepartmental procedures operated by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Home Office and the Department of Health for co-ordinating the issuing of visas in respect of Romanian children adopted by United Kingdom citizens; if she will review these procedures to improve their efficiency; and what are the criteria applied when considering such visa applications.

The Prime Minister: When an application is made to bring to the United Kingdom a child who has been adopted abroad or who is coming here for adoption, the entry clearance officer first makes inquiries into the child's circumstances overseas and the circumstances in which the child became available for adoption. The application is then referred to the Home Office, which seeks advice from the Department of Health on the health and welfare aspects of the case before reaching a decision. The main consideration is whether the proposed adoption is in the child's best interests. Every effort is made to ensure that the necessary inquiries are completed as quickly as possible.

Nuclear Test Treaties

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy, when she meets President Bush on 13 April in Bermuda, to raise (a) the forthcoming fourth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, (b) the forthcoming amendment conference of the 1963 partial test ban treaty and (c) the development of a common policy position by the three depository states for the non-proliferation treaty, for membership of the treaty of a united Germany.

The Prime Minister: I do not expect that these subjects will be considered in any detail.

Engagements

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 March.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be speaking at a dinner given by the Royal Society, along with the Prime Ministers of Norway and Sweden, to conclude the last conference on surface water acidification.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Audit Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, at any time since June 1979, any Minister from his Department has publicly called upon auditing firms to publish annual reports and accounts.

Mr. Redwood: Not so far as I am aware.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy on following through decisions of the joint disciplinary scheme on matters referred by him to the Institute of Chartered Accountants.

Mr. Redwood: The outcome of a complaint referred by my Department to any of the professional accountancy bodies, whether or not it is subsequently referred to the joint disciplinary scheme, is noted and such action is taken as is appropriate.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will seek to amend the Companies Act to require each set of annual accounts prepared in accordance with the historical cost convention to carry a statement that these accounts do not show realistic values of assets and may therefore be misleading.

Mr. Redwood: No. Understanding figures in company accounts will always depend on understanding the conventions by which the accounts were prepared. It is inherent in accounts prepared under the historical cost accounting rules, as required by the Companies Act 1985 (unless the alternative accounting rules are used), that assets are carried at historical cost less depreciation.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has any plans to legislate to require auditors of all large companies to examine the chairman's report.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to his question on 12 March, at column 43.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has any plans to require company auditors at annual general meetings to give details of the audit teams used on audits of companies.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department plans to make any recommendations to companies on the accounting treatment of financial futures.

Mr. Redwood: No. This issue is being considered by the accounting profession and my Department is watching developments closely.

Mergers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on his Department's policy on mergers between major auditing firms.

Mr. Redwood: My Department's policy on mergers remains as set out in the Blue Paper published in 1988 entitled "Mergers Policy"—that the main consideration in deciding whether to refer a merger or proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission should be the effect on competition in the United Kingdom. This applies equally to mergers between auditing firms as to any other mergers.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to launch the Insolvency Service as an executive agency.

Mr. Ridley: I established the Insolvency Service as an executive agency on 21 March.

I expect the Insolvency Service, as an executive agency, to continue to bring proceedings for the disqualification of directors of failed companies in appropriate cases, to submit prosecution reports where there is evidence of criminal behaviour and to administer bankruptcies and compulsory liquidations in an increasingly effective manner.

I have also set the Insolvency Service the following productivity and quality of service targets for 1990-91:

to increase productivity in case administration by at least 8 per cent.;

to complete the administration of at least 13,600 cases; to report to creditors on assets and liabilities within nine weeks in at least 60 per cent. of all cases; to hold meetings of creditors within 12 weeks in at least 90 per cent. of cases; to submit reports within 10 months in at least 80 per cent. of cases identified for investigation; to action at least 93 per cent. of payment requisitions within 10 days or by the due date.

Additionally, the Insolvency Service will be required to reduce in real terms the average unit cost of the initial stage of bankruptcies and liquidations by at least 5 per cent. over the next three years.

I have arranged for the framework document for the new agency to be placed in the Library of both Houses.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the 250 jobs referred to in the reply by the hon. Member for Darwen and Rossendale (Mr. Trippier) to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North, 20 July 1989, Official Report, column 346, arise from ship repair or ship conversion activities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Of the 250 jobs referred to, approximately 10 people were employed by a company which was primarily engaged in ship repair business.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the dates and purposes of visits to Norway during 1988 and 1989 by (a) Ministers of his Department and (b) civil servants of grade 5 or above.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: My right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) visited Norway as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from 29 October to 1 November 1988 to discuss investment in the United Kingdom by Kvaerner Industrier and other Norwegian companies. He also announced that Kvaerner Govan Ltd. had placed orders with Clark Kincaid Ltd. for the engines for the first two gas ships to be built on the Clyde for their Norwegian clients. A number of other visits were made by DTI officials in the course of 1988 and 1989 for general discussions on bilateral issues and for discussions with Norwegian interests concerning the acquisition of United Kingdom shipbuilding capacity and ship and marine engine orders.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out the specific proposals of the Tyne and Wear development corporation for the redevelopment of the Southwick shipyard site in Sunderland.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: Detailed proposals depend on the outcome of negotiations with relevant parties. It is, however, the current intention of the development corporation to redevelop the Southwick shipyard site in Sunderland for general industrial uses.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out the various elements of state aid agreed by his Department in the disposal of the private sector of the British Shipbuilders facilities at (a) Govan, (b) Appledore, (c) Ailsa Ferguson (Troon), (d) Ferguson and (e) Clark Kincaid.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: The detailed terms of sale of the individual British Shipbuilders' companies are commercially confidential. Following is a summary of the net costs of disposal after taking account of the considerations paid in each case:

(a) Govan Up to £25 million, including redundancy payments in respect of surplus staff, and a contribution to a programme of capital investment at the yard.

(b) Appledore £3·4 million, including redundancy payments and costs arising from completion of existing work.

(c) Ferguson-Ailsa (Troon) The assets of the Ailsa yard were sold on commerical terms, following closure of the company by British Shipbuilders.

(d) Ferguson Net cost of disposal to British Shipbuilders was £3·8 million, primarily relating to the costs of redundancies at the yard.

(e) Clark Kincaid £3·2 million, including redundancy payments, costs arising from completion of existing work, and a contribution to capital investment at the yard.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will update the estimate of the commercial costs to British Shipbuilders of closing North East Shipbuilders Ltd.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: A provision for an estimated extraordinary loss of £53·7 million relating to the closure of North East Shipbuilders Ltd. was made in the NESL accounts for 1987-88. A release of some of these provisions in the 1988-89 accounts has brought the estimated costs of closure down to £51 million. There may be further slight amendments in the 1989-90 accounts when published.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which riverside areas along the River Wear are affected by the advice of Sir Leon Brittan that a recommencement of shipbuilding would lead the European Commission to reconsider its agreement to the notification made by the British Government in December 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 14 March 1990]: There is no specific delineation by the Commission of the European Communities of land on the River Wear on which it would regard a recommencement of shipbuilding as prompting a reopening of the December 1988 notification. The Commission has, however, indicated that a restart of shipbuilding in Sunderland in general terms, even on land outside the confines of North East Shipbuilders Limited, would lead it to look again at the overall package. This view is taken on the grounds that the remedial measures programme for Sunderland was approved on the basis of the loss of shipbuilding jobs in the town.

Professional Access Project

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will consider financing in Scotland a pilot scheme similar to the British Council/DTI professional access project in Yorkshire/Humberside.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I shall be interested to consider proposals for a professional access project in Scotland in consultation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. My officials will also wish to discuss this with the British Council.

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the projected budget is for the year 1990-91 broken down by designated category for the National Engineering Laboratory.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The Secretary of State will be making decisions later this month about budget allocations for the next financial year. In the case of the National Engineering Laboratory, I expect the provision to be adequate for some 400 staff and associated costs.

Exports

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing for each of the European Community countries, the United States of America, Canada and Japan the amount of exports per head of population expressed on a comparable basis in £ sterling and as at the latest available date.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The information is in the table.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing for each of the European Community countries, the United States of America, Canada and Japan exports expressed as a percentage of gross national product as at the latest available date.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The information is in the table.

Hong Kong (Trade Balance)

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the United Kingdom's trade balance with Hong Kong.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 21 March 1990]: In 1989 imports of visible goods from Hong Kong exceeded United Kingdom's exports of visible goods to that country by £925 million.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Rain Forests

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will obtain a copy of the article on rain forest destruction in the latest issue of the magazine Science for his Department library.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes.

WALES

Health Conferences

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) whether he will issue guidelines to the National Health Service director in Wales to ensure that in any conferences organised by him all participants, including speakers, with particular expertise and experience in health care systems with administrative costs higher than the National Health Service, should contribute fees to the National Health Service commensurate with the learning curve benefit on management efficiency they derive;

(2) whether he will issue guidelines to the National Health Service directorate and manpower consultancy service to ensure that all conferences it organises for National Health Service employees in Wales on health care management give preference to speakers with direct expertise and experience of health care systems with lower administrative costs than the United Kingdom National Health Service;

(3) whether he will issue guidelines to Welsh health authorities on the maximum cost per National Health Service employee for attendance at conferences on non-medical subjects.

Mr. Grist: All conferences arranged by the NHS in Wales are designed to develop the service and are therefore ultimately for the benefit of patients. Speakers, whether from within the United Kingdom National Health Service or outside, are selected on the basis of the contribution they can make. Fees and related costs and charges are taken fully into account in making this judgment.

I see no need to issue specific guidelines as these principles are well understood. It is a matter for local decision as to which conferences individual employees should attend.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the cost to the National Health Service in Wales of National Health Service employees attending the Yale university school of management health care management executive programme at the Metropole hotel, Llandrindod Wells, on 3 to 8 June.

Mr. Grist: It is estimated that up to 60 delegates will attend the healthcare management executive programme at Llandrindod Wells. The course is expected to be self-financing, but the Department has indicated that it will fund four delegates from each health authority, at a total cost of £60,000. Fee-paying delegates will be attending from the rest of the United Kingdom, and further places may be taken up by Welsh NHS employees at a cost of £1,500 per delegate.

The programme is widely recognised as one of the best and most intensive training courses available in healthcare management and has previously been run in Australia, Spain and England, as well as the United States. Professor Fetter's team are world leaders, having developed the use of diagnosis related groups (DRGs) for the effective management of healthcare resources in a wide range of countries.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Probate

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General what is the delay before sending personal applicants for probate an appointment for interview; what is the reason for the delay; how many applications are outstanding; and what plans he has to offer a better service to the public.

The Attorney-General: The delay before sending personal applicants for probate an appointment for interview is approximately four weeks at the current time. The reason for the delay is the seasonal large influx of cases, and some staffing difficulties in the London area. There are currently 771 outstanding cases, of which 202 are ready for appointment and the remainder are being processed. Arrears are gradually reducing as a result of increased computerisation and a reorganisation of working practices.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General when and why the probate personal application department of the London probate registry moved from Golden Cross house to Somerset house.

The Attorney-General: The personal application department moved from Golden Cross house to Somerset house on Monday 11 September 1989. The main reasons for the move were:

(a) Economy. As a direct consequence of the move £250,000 was saved in accommodation charges and staff savings.

(b) Greater efficiency. The senior probate staff, together with the judiciary, are in Somerset house and referrals to them can be made more speedily and efficiently.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects to amend form PA2 to reflect the move of the probate personal application department to Somerset house; what was the level and value of stationery stock at the time of the move; how many staff are employed sticking change of address labels on the stationery; and at what cost.

The Attorney-General: Form PA2 was amended in November 1989 and distributed during that month. The level and value of stationery stock at the time of the move cannot now be accurately ascertained. Change of address labels are stuck on as and when the forms are completed by clerical staff. The only cost of applying sticky labels to forms is that of the labels themselves, which is £164·94 for 32,000.

SCOTLAND

Capital Allocations

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much of Glasgow district council's general services capital programme in the past five years has been funded from (a) capital receipts and (b) borrowing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is as follows:

£ million

(a) Year	(b) Total General Services Capital Expenditure	(c) Capital Receipts	(d) (b)-(c)
1988-89	13·499	8·550	4·949
1987-88	9·616	5·037	4·579
1986-87	9·287	6·054	3·233
1985-86	9·804	5·521	4·283
1984-85	10·243	5·297	4·946

Note: Column (d) is the difference between columns (b) and (c) and includes borrowing, capital grants and current revenue used to finance capital expenditure. Information on these separate components is not available.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are his criteria for deciding the capital allocations for general services for each district council.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The allocation of resources for capital expenditure by local authorities is determined, within the resources available, on the basis of their relative needs. In the light of the financial plans which each authority submits each year, the relative needs of authorities are assessed having regard to a number of factors, including the priorities that Ministers attach to particular categories of expenditure, the capital costs of individual projects, previous spending patterns and forecasts of capital receipts. As part of the stability of the financial planning system, regard is also had, when the final allocations for any year are being decided, to the provisional allocations previously issued.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what change he is planning in real terms for 1991-92 in Glasgow district council's capital allocation for general services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The provisional figure notified to the City of Glasgow district council for its general services capital allocation in 1991-92 is £3·0 million, the same as the final allocation for 1990-91, or £0·1 million lower in real terms as measured by the change in GDP deflator assumed over these two years for public expenditure planning.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will review Glasgow district council's general services capital allocation for 1990-91.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans either to reduce, or to increase, the council's general services capital allocation for 1990-91.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the average local income tax figures in each region or islands authority required to produce the amount being paid in community charge in 1989-90.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: On the basis of the information available to my Department, it is not possible to estimate the average amount which would have been required to be paid in local income tax to replace the revenue which each region or islands authority will receive from the community charge in 1989-90.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated amount to be paid by community charge payers in each region or islands area in their regional, district or island and water community charge in 1989-90, taking account of the rebates which are paid for by the Government out of the Exchequer.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Local authorities' most recent estimates of income raised in 1989-90 from personal and collective community charges are set out in the table. In establishing these figures local authorites take account both of community charge rebates and the rebate subsidy received from central Government. The amount actually paid by charge payers will be the amounts quoted in the table less the amounts paid as appropriate in community charge benefit (rebates) by local authorities. Details of the total amount of rebates by authority are not yet available.

Information on the amount to be paid in community water charges is not held centrally.

Civil Engineering

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to encourage public sector bodies to increase their use of the private sector for civil engineering work.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Almost all civil engineering works commissioned by public authorities in Scotland are constructed by contractors from the private sector, on the basis of competitive tendering. In addition, all trunk road projects and many water and sewerage projects are designed and supervised by private sector consultants appointed on a competitive basis. There is no evidence that further action to encourage use of the private sector in civil engineering is necessary.

Phoenix House Trust

Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if Scottish Homes plans to give a grant to the Phoenix House Trust for the purposes of converting the dwelling house at Kappochhill road into a drugs unit.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: When approving Scottish Homes' programme for any year my right hon. and learned Friend also agrees the amounts which Scottish Homes proposes should be spent on particular functions. The allocation of funds to specific areas or to individual projects is then a matter for Scottish Homes.

Leukaemia

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has considered the Gardner report on the incidence of leukaemia; and if he will make it his policy to make a statement on its application to Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The conclusions of Professor Gardner's study of childhood leukaemia in west Cumbria are of considerable concern. A similar study at Dounreay is being concluded as a matter of urgency and the results are expected by the summer.

It is important that each study is not considered in isolation but together with all the other Government-funded studies emerging as a result of recommendations by the committee on medical aspects of radiation in the environment, to whom the Government look for expert advice.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the regulation of the Scottish electricity industry.

Mr. Rifkind: I am making available to the House today model drafts of the licences to be issued to Scottish Power and Scotish Hydro-Electric, to independent generators including Scottish Nuclear Ltd. and to second-tier suppliers in Scotland. The licences for Scottish Power and Scottish Hydro-Electric are now largely in final form and ready to be granted shortly before vesting. Other generation and second-tier supply licensees will receive a licence based on the published drafts but adjusted to meet their particular circumstances and requirements.

The public electricity supply, transmission and generation licences for the Scottish vertically integrated companies are contained in a composite licence document. They reflect the wider Great Britain framework but have been tailored where appropriate to meet specific Scottish circumstances. A particular example of this is the provision which will be included in the licence for Hydro-Electric to secure that the benefit of cheap hydro power will be applied to maintain transmission and distribution costs in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland at levels comparable with those in other parts of the country, thus underpinning our commitment to maintain common tariffs for customers throughout that area.

The composite licence document includes provisions to control the maximum average prices charged by Scottish Power and Scottish Hydro-Electric. The average distribution, supply and transmission prices will be capped and indexed annually by an RPI-X formula. This will create incentives on the industry to improved performance and cost efficiency. The objective is to replicate market pressures to cost reduction on these monopoly services.

The vertically integrated structure of the Scottish industry also requires that, within the overall prices charged to customers, there should be direct regulation of generation prices. We have decided that the maximum average generation price to customers should not be allowed to increase beyond changes in RPI over the next four years. During a further four-year transitional period, regulation will move over progressively to an index derived from average generation prices in the England and Wales competitive market. In this way, the disciplines of the wider market will be impressed upon the Scottish companies.

Prices to consumers taking 10 MW or more will not be directly regulated in Scotland, nor will sales by the Scottish companies outside their areas. Prices in this part of the market are already being determined, quite properly, by competitive forces and this will continue to offer customers the best form of protection. To protect smaller customers who do not have a choice in their supplier, there will be a subsidiary cap on average prices to all consumers taking up to 1 MW which will restrict maximum average price rises to the movement in the overall price cap.

Taken together, these regulatory controls will mean that average electricity price rises to customers in the regulated market in Scotland will be held below the rate of inflation over the next four years and thereafter they will increasingly reflect the downward pressures on prices in the fully competitive Great Britain market. The companies will, however, be free, subject to their licence conditions, to set different tariffs to each individual group of consumers within the average price cap to reflect the economic costs of supply.

For the more immediate term, I expect average tariff increases in Scotland next year to be about the rate of inflation. For larger customers above 1 MW, including contract customers, the Scottish industry does not expect that any customer will experience increases much out of line with inflation over the next year.

It is important for the stability of prices and the industry's finances that there should not be excessive disruption in the market. We have, therefore, decided to introduce arrangements in Scotland which will ensure a smooth transition to a competitive market similar to those announced last month for England and Wales by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. These provisions will allow all suppliers to compete for supply to premises taking more than 1 MW at the outset of the new regime, for premises taking more than 100 KW after four years, and for all customers after eight years. While my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be disposed to act in accordance with the above restrictions, he will require to exercise discretion taking account of the specific circumstances of each case in its merits and the advice of the Director General of Electricity Supply.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he has taken, and what action he intends taking, to implement the recommendations within his area of responsibility of the European Commission's childcare network report "Caring for Children—Services and Policies for Childcare and Equal Opportunities in the United Kingdom."

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The report was prepared for the European Commission which has yet to develop any firm proposals. The Government take the view that policy on child care is a matter for member states and that families themselves should determine how their children are to be cared for. It is for parents to decide how to combine work and family responsibilities. The Government, through the ministerial group on women's issues, are encouraging the development of a range of quality day care.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Regional Functions

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has no administrative regional organisation, although HMI has a divisional structure. There is one administrative outstation in Darlington which deals with teachers' pensions and some other functions. Details of the Darlington outstation and of HMI's divisional structure are as follows:

Portage Schemes

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Leyton, 29 January, Official Report, column 33, when he intends to place in the Library a copy of the Her Majesty's inspectorate survey on portage projects funded by education support grants.

Mr. Alan Howarth: A copy of the Her Majesty's inspectorate survey on portage project was sent to the Library on 9 February, but I have now placed further copies there.

City Technology College, Bradford

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the city technology college in Bradford; and when he expects the school to open.

Mrs. Rumbold: The main buildings for the Bradford technology college will be complete and the college will open in September 1990 with 180 first-form pupils.

Student Loans

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make available further details of the method of application for top-up loans for students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I have today placed in the Library of the House a paper summarising the student loans certification and application process. The academic institutions' role will be limited to making the forms available, identifying students and certifying their eligibility for loans and loan entitlement. Students will apply for loans direct to the Student Loans Company, through the post. The system is designed to ensure that loans reach eligible students with maximum speed and efficiency.

School Meals and Milk

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning difficulties arising from schools being required to collect moneys from parents for meals and milk taken by pupils at school; how many local education authorities in England and Wales require schools to make such collections; what savings he estimates would be made in school administration costs if the requirement to collect moneys were removed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I am not aware of any such representations being received.

The provision of school meals and milk, and the arrangements made to administer these services, are matters for local determination. Information is not collected centrally by the Department.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Social Security Act 1986 to permit local education authorities to provide meals and milk free to pupils; what representations he has received concerning difficulties caused by schools being required to collect moneys from parents for milk and meals taken by school pupils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has no plans to reintroduce powers for LEAs to provide free meals on a discretionary basis. Section 77 of the Social Security Act 1986 places LEAs under a duty to provide free school meals to pupils whose families are in receipt of income support.

I am not aware of any representations being received in the Department about the collection of moneys for school meals and milk.

Magnet Schools

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what represention he has received from the leader of the Inner London education authority on the subject of magnet schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received no specific representations, although he receives letters from time to time, and holds meetings, where a number of issues are discussed.

ENVIRONMENT

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Chris Patten: The regional offices of DOE (Central) perform a general representational role, involving liaison with local authorities and other bodies, and also carry out a number of executive functions in the housing, planning and urban policy fields. These include, for example, on housing distributing resources through the housing investment programme (HIP) system and establishing housing action trusts (HATs); on planning, advising on strategic planning, handling the approval of structure plans, and issuing decisions on certain types of planning appeals and other casework; and on urban policy, promoting urban development corporations (UDCs), liaising with local authorities on the urban programme (UP), participating in (and in some cases providing the secretariat for) city action teams (CATs), and processing applications for derelict land grant (DLG).

DOE(C) has nine regional offices, in the north, north-west, Yorkshire and Humberside, east midlands, west midlands, eastern region, south-west, south-east and London. In addition there is a task force based in Merseyside. The geographical coverage of each region and the location of the main office is as set out in table A.

I will write to the hon. Member with regard to the PSA at a later date.

Housing Starts

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new housing starts there were in the Yorkshire and Humberside region for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: There were 15,800 starts in Yorkshire and Humberside region in 1989. Figures for the earlier years appear in table 6·4(a) of "Housing and Construction Statistics, 1978-1988", which is in the Library.

Neighbourhood Noise

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department's special working group on neighbourhood noise problems and the law is likely to produce its report.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The working party on the review of noise, chaired by Mr. James Batho, should produce its report in the summer.

Radioactivity

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the occasions in the last 10 years that Her Majesty's Government have been informed under international agreements of any release of radioactive material that could be of radiological significance for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: Her Majesty's Government have never been informed of a release of radioactive material of radiological significance to the United Kingdom under international agreements.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the occasions in the last 10 years that RIMNET has detected abnormal levels of radiation in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The RIMNET monitors were installed in June 1988. No abnormal levels of radiation have been detected since that date.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to report to Parliament the proceeds of the water share offers and associated costs; whether that report will include the total value of land and assets privatised under the Water Act 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Figures for proceeds from and overall costs to the Government of the water share offers are being compiled and will be reported shortly. Information on the assets of all the water holding companies was set out in the water share offers prospectus in November 1989.

Waste Paper

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce measures to prevent the importation of waste paper from the United States of America.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. Such measures are not required. In 1989 United Kingdom mill consumption of waste paper and board amounted to some 2·578 million tonnes. Only 80,000 tonnes were imported, and of this less than 3 per cent. originated from north America.

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had about market, legal or other obstacles faced by enterprises seeking to develop recycling of waste paper.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My Department and the Department of Trade and Industry have received many representations and comments about issues concerning the recycling of waste paper. For this reason the Government have established a recycling forum with a series of expert groups, including one specifically dealing with waste paper recycling. We hope to make the conclusions of the expert groups public shortly.

East European Countries

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what request he has received for assistance towards improving the environment in (a) Poland, (b) Hungary, (c) Czechoslovakia, (d) East Germany and (e) the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government are receiving a good deal of information from formal and informal sources about the environment in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. We provided experts for two fact-finding missions to Poland and Hungary earlier this year. We are working actively through the G24 process—in which we are playing a leading part—and other appropriate multilateral and bilateral mechanisms to promote the adoption of environmentally sustainable policies within Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and the Soviet Union. Our overriding concern is to ensure that assistance for tackling the wide range of complex environmental problems involved should be based on sound science and a knowledge of the different priorities within each country.

New Town Corporation Properties

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet made an assessment of the desirability of introducing a rents into mortgages scheme for the tenants of new town corporation properties.

Mr. Chope: No, but we are following the progress of the experimental rents into mortgages schemes for tenants of Scottish Homes and the Development Board for Rural Wales.

Language Teachers

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if foreign nationals temporarily resident in the United Kingdom for the purpose of foreign language teaching are liable to pay the poll tax.

Mr. Chope: Everyone aged 18 or over, who is not exempt, and who is solely or mainly resident in England, Scotland or Wales will be subject to the personal community charge for the days on which the community charges registration officer for the area determines that they are so resident. The matter will be determined by the community charges registration officers in light of the facts of each case.

Anyone who is aggrieved by a decision made by a community charge registration officer to enter him on the charging authority's registers as subject to a community charge may appeal to valuation and community charge tribunal.

Drought Risk

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether water levels are now sufficient to avoid an immediate risk of drought conditions in 1990.

Mr. Trippier: Water resources are now normal apart from a few pockets in Kent, East Anglia and east Yorkshire where groundwater levels have been slow to recover and supply difficulties may arise.

Cash Limits

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any changes to announce to his Department's cash limits for 1989-90.

Mr. Chope: Yes. To enable the transfer of some 4,500 dwellings from the Commission for the New Towns to Peterborough city council, I have issued a supplementary capital allocation of £24,039,200 to the council covering the transfer price. The non-voted cash limit DOE/NT1 (New Towns) has been correspondingly reduced by £24,039,200 from minus £420,646,000 to minus £444,685,200. The transaction will not therefore add to the total of planned public expenditure.

Collective Community Change

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to make additional resources available to local authorities for the monitoring of the collection of moneys by landlords within properties designated for the collective community charge.

Mr. David Hunt: I am confident that charging authorities have sufficient resources to collect the personal, standard and collective community charges. The chargeable person who is shown in the community charges register as subject to the collective charge will be required to maintain a record of the payments of contributions which he collects. The charging authority will be able to inspect these records.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was paid in fees to the organisations listed in his answer on 13 March, Official Report, columns 186-87.

Mr. Trippier: It is not the normal practice of Her Majesty's Government to publish the sums paid to individual advisers and contractors in a privatisation, as this information is a matter of commercial confidentiality.

Figures for overall costs to the Government of the water share offers are being compiled and will be reported shortly.

Council Tenants (Transfers)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations about the likely effects of part VI of the Local Government Act 1989 on the movement of council tenants from the south to the north of England.

Mr. Chope: No.

Boundary Review, Oxford

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce the outcome of the boundary review in respect of Oxford city.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 21 March 1990]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to announce his decision this month.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his answer of 12 March, if he will list the amounts spent by the Leeds development corporation in 1989-90, and planned to be spent in 1990-91 on (a) the promotion and marketing of the urban development area and of Leeds in general, (b) the promotion and marketing of specific sites, (c) keeping the local community informed of the development corporation's activities and (d) the production of an annual report.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 21 March 1990]: The information for 1989-90 is as follows.

(a) the promotion and marketing of the urban development area and of Leeds in general: £175,000;
(b) the promotion and marketing of specific sites: £30,000;
(c) programme of liaison with the local community: £95,000;
(d) the production of an annual report: £18,000.

The total expenditure on the items identified in my substantive answer of 14 March is now estimated to be £335,000.

Urban development corporations are responsible for determining their own spending priorities within budgets, and similar details are not available for 1990-91.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is (a) the latest estimate of the total cost of collecting and administering the community charge for 1990-91, excluding set-up costs, (b) the total set-up costs of the introduction of community charge, locally and nationally, (c) the estimated cost of the collection and administration of the rates in 1989-90 and (d) the number of staff employed in the calculations, collection and administration of the rates in 1989-90.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The latest estimate of the total cost of collecting and administering the community charge in 1990-91 is £400 million. The latest estimate made by authorities of the current cost of preparation is £207 million. The estimated capital cost of preparation is £160 million. The estimated cost of collecting rates in 1989-90 was £200 million. The total number of staff employed in the calculation, collection and administration of the rates in 1989-90 is not separately distinguishable in the available statistics.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now publish in the Official Report recalculations of the tables in annex J of Cmnd. 9714, "Paying for Local Government."

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 21 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 March, Official Report, volume 169, column 313.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: Total expenditure by the FCO (diplomatic wing) in 1979-80 on publicity and advertising was £100,226. For 1989-90 the estimated expenditure is £329,115.

The expenditure for the public bodies for which the FCO is responsible is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Romanian Children (Adoption)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many visas have been (i) applied for and (ii) issued since December 1989 in respect of Romanian children adopted by United Kingdom citizens.

Mr. Sainsbury: Four such visas have been applied for and one has been granted.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the average time between applications for, and the issuing of, visas in respect of Romanian children adopted by United Kingdom citizens.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our visa procedures are designed to ensure that proper safeguards apply in cases of children brought to this country for adoption. These include inquiries into the child's circumstances overseas and reports by the prospective adopter's local authority. The length of time taken to complete these inquiries will depend on the circumstances of individual cases and it is not possible to estimate the average time for processing visa applications in respect of Romanian children adopted by United Kingdom citizens.

Sudan

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Sudanese Government concerning the arrest of Farouk Mohammed Ibrahim of the university of Khartoum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Her Majesty's embassy has reported that Dr. Farouk Mohammed Ibrahim was released from custody on 10 March and has returned to his work at the university of Khartoum.

Immigration

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the entry clearance officer's statement of refusal of entry was completed and the clearance officer's statement was forwarded to (i) the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, London, and (ii) the immigration appeals office, London, in respect of Juliet C. Melville, née Crave, who applied for entry clearance in October 1989 at the British embassy in Manila, Philippines.

Mr. Sainsbury: The entry clearance officer's explanatory statement accompanying Mrs. Melville's appeal, which had been lodged at the embassy in Manila in September 1989, was sent direct to the immigration appeals office on 5 March 1990.

The delay in processing this appeal was due to disruption to the work of the embassy in November 1989 (move to new premises) and December 1989 (attempted coup), and increased demands on secretarial resources. The post in Manila has now taken on extra staff to help reduce the delay in processing appeals.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision will be taken on the application to enter the United Kingdom made to the United Kingdom's post in Islamabad by Abdul Hamid, who was born on 14 February 1964 (Serial Number: 64050); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: In accordance with the guidelines on the handling of representations by Members of Parliament in immigration cases, issued to Members on 14 December 1988, I have referred the question to the correspondence unit of the migration and visa department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The hon. Member will receive a reply from the unit as soon as possible.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom has discussed with its fellow depository member states for the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, the implications of German state unification for its membership of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have not yet discussed this question with the other depository states of the non-proliferation treaty (NPT). Both the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic of Germany are parties to the NPT.

Hong Kong

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the provenance of the 116 tonnes of ivory in Hong Kong that does not have CITES documents specified in the letter sent by the Hong Kong Agriculture and Fisheries Department to the World Wide Fund for Nature, Hong Kong, dated 27 February, a copy of which has been made available to him.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The Hong Kong authorities cannot provide a breakdown of the places of origin of the 116 tonnes of ivory in the territory that do not have CITES documentation. But these have been inspected by the Hong Kong authorities, which have found no evidence that any of these were illegally acquired. No stocks without CITES documentation may be exported from Hong Kong.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 2 February, Official Report, column 405, what further information he has about ivory stocks currently held in Hong Kong (a) that are not marked and registered in accordance with CITES regulations or (b) were illegally acquired.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 8 March 1990]: There are 116 tonnes of ivory in Hong Kong which do not have CITES documentation. The Hong Kong authorities have inspected all commercial ivory stocks in the territory. They have found no evidence that any of these stocks were illegally acquired.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest available figure for the current stock of elephant ivory held in Hong Kong under CITES regulations; and if he will indicate the reasons for the changes in the totals between (a) this figure, (b) the figure given in his answer of 2 February, Official Report, column 405 and (c) the figure given in his answer of 20 July 1989, Official Report, column 334.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The latest available figure for the current stock of elephant ivory held in Hong Kong under CITES regulations (to the nearest tonne) is 356 tonnes, including 102 tonnes of worked ivory and 254 tonnes of raw ivory.

The figure for worked ivory is slightly smaller than that given on 2 February (104 tonnes) because exports of two tonnes have been notified to the Hong Kong authorities since then. The reason why the total figure for the current ivory stock is substantially less than the figure of 670 tonnes given by my hon. Friend, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, on 20 July 1989 is that the earlier figure was an estimate based on voluntary declarations by traders. The introduction of a statutory requirement for all commercial holdings of ivory to be licensed has made it possible to produce a much more accurate figure. Moreover, some 50 tonnes of ivory have been exported since the original declaration was made.

DEFENCE

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information relating to the regional distribution of service and civilian personnel together with expenditure on defence equipment is already published in the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989, Cm. 675, volume 2. Expenditure across the defence budget as a whole is not accounted for on a regional basis.

Personnel (Loans and Secondments)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the countries where service personnel are currently on (a) loan service and (b) secondment.

Mr. Neubert: Members of Her Majesty's armed forces are currently on loan service in the following countries.

Bahrain
Bangladesh
Barbados
Belize
Bermuda
Botswana
Brunei
Dominica
Fiji
Gambia
Ghana
Grenada
Hong Kong
Indonesia
Jordan
Kenya
Lesotho
Malaysia
Mauritius
Namibia
New Zealand
Nigeria
Oman
Qatar
Saudi Arabia
Singapore
St. Lucia
St. Vincent
Sudan
Swaziland
Turks and Caicos Islands
United Arab Emirates
Zimbabwe[1]

[1] Since January 1986 a wing of the British military advisory and training team has been specifically allocated to train Mozambican troops within Zimbabwe.

Current policy is for overseas military assistance to foreign Governments to be provided on loan service rather than secondment terms but, in accordance with particular longstanding arrangements, some personnel are serving on secondment in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

Patent Rights

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those instances where he has exercised his right to use without payment, or authorised others to use without payment, any patents for any Government purpose; and whether there are any patents falling within this right which he has paid for the use of.

Mr. Neubert: Patents which the Secretary of State has the right to use without payment, including the right to authorise others to use without payment, fall into two categories. The first category consists of patents owned by the Crown. The second category consists of patents for inventions which have arisen as a result of public funding in circumstances where the Secretary of State is granted such rights—for example, inventions which have arisen under contract.

No account is kept of instances where patents in either of the above categories are used, and, where the Secretary of State receives the right to use or authorise the use of a patent for an invention that has arisen as a result of public funding, there is no requirement to inform the patentee as to the extent of the use of the patent.

There are no known instances of payment by the Secretary of State for the use of a patent which he has the right to use free of charge.

Public House, Knightsbridge (Attack)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to write to the hon. Member for Leyton concerning the assault of a soldier, as undertaken in his answer of 26 October 1989, Official Report, column 562.

Mr. Neubert: The hon. Member should by now have received a reply from my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces.

RAF Fylingdales

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) for how long the proposed environmental study is to be undertaken around the new phased array radar system currently being installed at the Fylingdales Royal Air Force station;

(2) if he will make it his policy to publish the results of the proposed environmental study to be undertaken around the new phased array radar system currently being installed at the Fylingdales Royal Air Force station;

(3) what is the purpose of, and what parameters are to be measured in, the proposed environmental study to be undertaken around the new phased array radar system currently being installed at the Fylingdales Royal Air Force station;

(4) which agency is to undertake the proposed environmental study to be undertaken around the new phased array radar system currently being installed at the Fylingdales Royal Air Force station.

Mr. Neubert: There are no plans for an environmental study to be undertaken round the new phased array radar being installed at RAF Fylingdales. The RAF signals engineering establishment will, however, conduct radio frequency assessments at the station over a period of about six months before the new radar system is brought into operation, to ensure that the radar transmissions from the system satisfy both the design specification and RAF safety regulations. On security grounds, it is not our practice to publish the results of such assessments.

Overseas Territories

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all countries who have sent (a) military cadets and (b) senior service men to training schools in the United Kingdom since 1979; how many military persons were involved in each case; and what has been the total cost to the United Kingdom of this training.

Mr. Neubert: The following countries have sent military personnel for training at United Kingdom service establishments on at least one occasion since 1 January 1979. It is not possible to distinguish between military cadets and senior service men, as information is not held centrally in this form and could not be compiled without disproportionate cost.

1980	5,300
[1]1981-82	5,650

1987-88	4,850
1988-89	5,150

[1] From 1981-82 statistics have been gathered by financial rather than calendar years.

Further specific details about numbers trained are generally confidential between her Majesty's Government and the Government concerned.

The bulk of this training has been carried out on repayment.

Radar (Hazards)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment has been made of the bio-hazard associated with the phased array radar currently under construction at Fylingdales.

Mr. Neubert [holding answer 16 March 1990]: Theoretical assessments have indicated that the phased array radar will not produce power density levels at ground level beyond its immediate vicinity which will exceed those stipulated by current RAF regulations. Furthermore, a practical assessment will be carried out before the radar is brought into operational use to confirm these findings.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria currently govern the bio-hazards associated with radar emissions.

Mr. Neubert [holding answer 16 March 1990]: The RAF is required to meet the standards set out in "Home Office Safety Precautions Relating to Intense Radio Frequency Radiation, 1960", but has issued its own more stringent regulations which impose lower maximum power density levels.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what current research is being undertaken into the bio-hazards associated with radar emissions.

Mr. Neubert [holding answer 16 March 1990]: No such research is being undertaken by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the phased array radar currently under contruction at Fylingdales will radiate more energy than the current radar at Fylingdales.

Mr. Neubert [holding answer 16 March 1990]: No.

HEALTH

Children Act

104. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional financial resources will be made available to local authorities in order to assist them in the implementation of the provisions of the Children Act.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) on 9 March at column 897.

(6) further to table 6.18(a) of the general household survey for 1986, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each region in 1986 the distribution of the type of accommodation by tenure, together with (a) the implied populations and (b) an estimate for 1989 or if unavailable for 1988;

(7) further to table 6.19 of the general household survey for 1986 whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each country and each region in 1986 the implied population of accommodation by types listed in table 6.18 in the case of local authority or new town tenures, together with an estimate for 1989 or if unavailable for 1988;

Mr. Freeman: Information that is available has been placed in the Library.

Cancer (Yorkshire)

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the figures held by the Yorkshire regional cancer registry of the number of people in the area of (a) Pontefract district health authority and (b) Wakefield district health authority, who have been diagnosed or treated for cancer or cancer-related disease including leukaemia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: This is a matter for the Yorkshire regional cancer registry.

Soviet Health Minister

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 6 March, Official Report, column 580, if he will give details of the letter he received from the Soviet Health Minister; and what was his response.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Soviet Health Minister, Mr. E. Chazov, sent a letter which suggested that nuclear weapons testing posed a threat to life and health, and called for a test ban. I replied, among other things, that these tests posed no danger to public health and that as we wish to retain a nuclear deterrent, we should have to retain weapons testing.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of fatal births which can be attributed to (a) late births and (b) questionable handling and treatment of the mother.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available of treatment facilities for people with problems of drug abuse.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (i) the cost and (ii) the proportion of total expenditure on facilities for people with problems of drug abuse incurred by (a) the National Health Service, (b) local authorities and (c) the non-statutory sector.

Mr. Freeman: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available in the form requested.

In 1989-90, the Department allocated £14·8 million to regional health authorities for the further development of all drug misuse services including treatment facilities. In addition, over £970,000 was allocated to local projects under the central funding initiative.

Treatment (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what rights to free National Health Service treatment in the United Kingdom (a) nationals of European Economic Community countries and (b) non-European Economic Community nationals have; and on what agreements and so on they are based.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All visitors to the United Kingdom are subject to at least the same charges for treatment within the NHS as United Kingdom residents. The NHS (Charges to Overseas Visitors) Regulations 1982 set out the basis on which charges should be applied in the case of patients not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom but also provide for exemptions inter alia from some charges for nationals or residents of other countries with which the United Kingdom has reciprocal health agreements, including the arrangements under the European Community social security regulations. The latter require that EC nationals visiting another member state be provided with immediately necessary treatment, the need for which arose during a visit, on the same basis as nationals of the host member state; they also provide for EC member states to refer patients elsewhere in the Community specifically for treatment of pre-existing conditions. The costs incurred in respect of all such treatments for EC nationals are ultimately met by the patients' home state. The United Kingdom has bilateral reciprocal health agreements with 25 non-EC states, all of which cover immediately necessary treatment; 11 also allow for a limited number of referrals specifically for treatment for pre-existing conditions. These agreements provide for each of the signatories to meet the cost of the treatment provided in its own territory.

Any visitor to the United Kingdom may apply to use the general medical services in the same way and on the same conditions as those who are ordinarily resident here. It is a matter for the discretion of the individual practitioner whether to accept someone for treatment as an NHS patient.

Cancer

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' recent publication. "Socio-demographic Differences in Cancer Survival 1971-83"; and what action he proposes to take on behalf of the various groups of people identified as being more prone to cancer and less likely to survive it.

Mr. Freeman: The report gives a valuable and detailed analysis of differences in cancer mortality between social groups which will be studied with interest by our expert advisers. It suggests that these differences are more likely to be attributable to variations in the incidence of cancer than in its treatment. The Government attach great importance to securing both reductions in incidence and improvements in survival for all groups, through comprehensive programmes of prevention, including health education and screening, and by encouraging equality of access to high-quality services.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he proposes to take to increase the number of women attending for mammographs; and whether he has any plans to make more effective the breast cancer screening programme.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Take-up among those invited for screening is an essential factor in the achievement of an effective screening programme. A number of initiatives have been undertaken to educate and encourage women to respond positively to their invitations. The programme is funding four cancer screening development workers' posts in districts with multi-ethnic populations to examine the acceptability of breast screening to women in these groups and find out whether any special approach is required. The Cancer Research Campaign is conducting a study into attendance and non-attendance of those invited for screening and how take-up might be encouraged by primary health care teams. The breast screening research sub-committee of the United Kingdom co-ordinating committee on cancer research has set up a working group to review and co-ordinate existing studies into acceptability and to stimulate new research in this area. The Health Education Authority has conducted research, produced leaflets and other forms of information on the programme and supported local health education initiatives. We also encourage women's voluntary organisations to promote the programme and to encourage their members to take up their screening invitations when they receive them.

London Air Ambulance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what charges he expects to be generated by the London Air Ambulance; who he anticipates will be the payers and whom the beneficiaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Express Newspapers plc is providing the aircraft used by the helicopter emergency medical service completely free of charge to the National Health Service. This use of a medically staffed helicopter for emergency purposes is to be the subject of an independent evaluation to be carried out by Professor Brian Williams of the department of community medicine, Sheffield university.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and its predecessor and public bodies for which his Department and its predecessor has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Freeman: Estimated expenditure on publicity and advertising for the financial years 1978-79 and 1988-89 was:

	£ million
1978-79	13·5
1988-89	44·6

These figures include expenditure by the Department of Health, health authorities in England, the Health Education Council (in 1978-79) and the Health Education Authority (in 1988-89). Information on publicity and advertising expenditure by other special health authorities and public bodies is not available centrally, but is not thought to be significant.

Midwives

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any proposals which could alter employment rights, pay and working conditions of midwives; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Recommendations on pay for nurses and midwives are put forward each year by the independent pay review body for nursing staff, midwives, health visitors and professions allied to medicine. Conditions of service are negotiated in the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council and the general Whitley council. We have no proposals to alter these arrangements.

Under the Government's proposals for reform of the National Health Service as described in the White Paper "Working for Patients", National Health Service trusts will be free to settle the pay and conditions of their staff, including midwives. They will be able to follow national agreements or adopt partly or wholly different arrangements.

Staff who transfer from health authority to National Health Service trust employment will retain their existing contracts and all rights arising from them, subject to substitution of the new employer for the old and any consequential technical changes. It will be open to National Health Service trusts to seek to introduce changes in existing contracts at any time after transfer.

Treatment Statistics

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish for each English and Welsh district health authority the number of residents treated in terms of the 1988-89 consultant episodes (a) for all specialties and (b) omitting the specialties of maternity and psychiatry.

Mr. Freeman: The information for English district health authorities is expected to be published towards the end of this year. Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Lancashire (General Practitioners)

Mr. Miscampbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners in Lancashire have applied to manage their own indicative budgets.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer my hon. and learned Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on 20 March at column 540.

Wheelchairs and Artificial Limbs

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how spinal injury units will recover the cost of the appliances from other regions under the new proposed arrangements for dispensing wheelchairs and artificial limbs.

Mr. Freeman: Under proposals in the NHS and Community Care Bill, services provided by spinal injury units after 1 April 1991 will be supplied and paid for under contracts in the same way as all other hospital and community health services.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the ring-fencing of funds for the dispensing of wheelchairs and artificial limbs will affect the consumers' choice of the best and most appropriate appliance; and whether health authorities will be able to spend over the ring-fenced budget.

Mr. Freeman: The ring fencing of funds will guarantee a minimum level of resources for these services sufficient to provide the extensive range of appliances already available and being developed. It will be for health authorities to decide how best to meet the needs of their population for these appliances and they will, of course, be able to spend on these services more than the ring-fenced amount by funding from their general allocations.

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to introduce regulations under the provisions of the Abortion Act to require those charitable pregnancy counselling agencies which refer women for abortions to keep records of the numbers of such women they refer in any given year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Pregnancy advice bureaux are required to maintain registers which show, inter alia, whether women are referred for abortion. These registers are inspected by the Departments' investigative officers in their inspection visits.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will define "seriously handicapped" as used in statutory ground 4 of the Abortion Act 1967.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The opinion as to whether an abortion is justified in terms of ground 4, or any other ground, of the Abortion Act 1967 is for two registered medical practitioners to form in good faith, in the light of their clinical judgment of all the particular circumstances of the individual case.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines his Department has issued on abortions after 24 weeks' gestation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: When it became clear in 1985 that the consensus of the relevant professional bodies about the point at which a foetus could be said to be viable had changed in the light of medical and scientific developments to 24 weeks' gestation, the Department made it a condition of approval for those private sector clinics licensed to carry out abortions over 20 weeks that no abortions were carried out over 24 weeks' gestation. In addition, that view was drawn to the attention of clinicians working in both the private sector and in the NHS. There has been a significant reduction in recent years in the number of abortions after 24 weeks. Only 22 were carried out in England and Wales in 1988.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has issued any instructions to hospitals and private abortion clinics regarding the implications of Justice Brookes's recent ruling on the meaning of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The question of whether a child is capable of being born alive is for the court to decide in any particular case on the basis of the evidence before it.

Nurses' Homes

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration was given by the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council at its meeting on 13 March to abating board and lodging charges for nurses living in nurses' homes by the rates element in respect of the collective community charge payable with effect from 18 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council has now reached agreement on lodging charges for 1990-91. To take account of the abolition of domestic rates in England and Wales, charges in those countries are being reduced by the element attributable to rates.

Terminally Ill People

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance is provided to people who are terminally ill in respect of prescriptions and other medical costs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Terminally ill patients incur no charges for the treatment or medication that they receive during their stay in hospital. Although they are not specifically exempted from prescription and other NHS charges there are wide-ranging exemption arrangements designed to help patients who might have difficulty in paying NHS charges. As the result of these arrangements over 75 per cent. of all items dispensed in the NHS are provided free. People who are not exempt but who need frequent medication can reduce the cost by purchasing a prepayment certificate.

Community Charge

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his best estimates of the numbers of National Health Servie properties which have been designated for the collective community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps have been taken by health authorities to reduce the rate-inclusive rents paid by nurses and other staff living in health authority accommodation following the introduction of the community charge on 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health authorities have been advised in circular EL(90)MB/43 that as from 1 April 1990 they should cease to collect the rates addition to rental charges. A copy has been placed in the Library.

The level of lodging charges for nursing staff is determined by the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council, which has recently reached agreement on charges for 1990-91. To take account of the abolition of domestic rates in England and Wales, charges in those countries are being reduced by the element attributable to rates.

Community Pharmacists

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give details of the number of prescriptions issued by community pharmacists for the year 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not yet available.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many repeat prescriptions of benzodiazepines are given to patients without doctors seeing the patient for a check-up; and if he has any plans to prevent or reduce such practice.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested cannot be determined from centrally held information on prescribing. Doctors already have advice about the use of these drugs from the Committee on Safety of Medicines, the Royal College of Physicians, Psychiatrists and General Practitioners, the British Medical Association and the British National Formulary.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those clinics and hospitals in England and Wales which specialise chiefly in helping people to withdraw from benzodiazepines.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state how much his Department is spending in 1990-91 on warning the public about the dangers of addiction to (a) hard drugs and (b) benzodiazepines.

Mr. Freeman: The current phase of the national drug publicity campaign cost £3·8 million, spread over two financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91. The campaign warns of the danger of misusing any drug. Further expenditure in 1990-91 will be considered as appropriate.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the blanket prescribing of benzodiazepine hypnotics in hospitals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The use of benzodiazepines in the treatment of a patient is a matter of clinical judgment. Information on the volume of benzodiazepines prescribed in hospitals is not held centrally.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the work force in employment in the United Kingdom has increased since 1983.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1990, c. 203-04]: I regret that the information given in my reply of 13 March 1990 was incorrect, as it gave employment estimates prior to the revisions following the publication, on 9 March 1990, of the 1989 labour force survey results.The correct information is as follows:

Since 1983 the United Kingdom work force in employment has been on a rising trend. In September 1989 the latest date for which information is available, the work force in employment was 26,955,000. This represents an increase of 3,391,000 of 14·4 per cent. since March 1983 when the figure was 23,564,000.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Regional Functions

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mr. Curry: The Department has a three-tier structure of regional, divisional and area offices. The geographical extent of the five regions and the location of the regional offices are as follows:

Region	Regional Office	Area, by county
South Western	Bristol	Avon, Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Gloucestershire, Somerset, Wiltshire, Isles of Scilly.
South Eastern	Reading	Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hampshire, Isle of Wight, Kent, Oxfordshire, Surrey, East and West Sussex, parts of the Greater London area.

Region	Regional Office	Area, by county
Eastern	Cambridge	Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Northamptonshire, Suffolk, parts of the Greater London area.
Midlands and Western	Wolverhampton	Cheshire, Derbyshire, Lancashire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Merseyside and Greater Manchester, West Midlands Metropolitan County, Hereford and Worcester.
Northern	Leeds	Cleveland, Cumbria, Durham, Humberside, Northumberland, Tyne and Wear, North, South and West Yorkshire.

A wide range of functions are carried out at the regional level. These include the administration of a number of grants and subsidy schemes, the provision of scientific, professional and technical advice (both free and charged), the conduct of research and development, the statutory control of animal diseases, the provision of a veterinary laboratory diagnostic service, meat hygiene and consumer protection work and safeguarding animal welfare.

As at 1 March 1990, the total number of staff of all grades stationed in each region was:

Region	Administrative	ADAS
		FCS	RDS	SVS
South Western	469	264	12	250
South Eastern	275·5	212	101
Eastern	427	218	110·5	213
Northern	438	220	92·5
Midlands and Western	533·5	326	91	165·5
TOTAL	2,143	1,339	407	628·5

ADAS: Agricultural Development and Advisory Service.
FCS: Farm and Countryside Service.
RDS: Research and Development Service.
SVS: State Veterinary Service.

These figures do not include staff at the central veterinary and science laboratories, staff engaged on fisheries work and outstationed headquarters staff. Nor do they include the 345 ADAS officers stationed in Scotland and Wales.

I regret that a detailed breakdown of the regional staff by grade and an analysis of the Department's budget by region are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate expense.

Horses (Export)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy towards the export of live horses to European abattoirs after 1992.

Mr. Maclean: We are seeking to maintain controls to prevent the export of horses for slaughter.

Leptospirosis Vaccine

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average cost of leptospirosis vaccine in the United Kingdom; and what information he has on its cost in New Zealand.

Mr. Maclean: I have no information on the cost of leptospirosis vaccines in this country or New Zealand.

Sheep Brains and Offals

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the research that is being carried out by his Department into infectious diseases passing into the human food chain by the use of sheep brains and offals being fed to pigs, sheep and poultry being reared for domestic consumption.

Mr. Maclean: A number of areas of current research are relevant to this topic, including:

- Monitoring of any spongiform encephalopathy in animals by brain histology.
- Pathology of experimental mouse scrapie.
- Inactivation studies in comparison with scrapie.
- Strain typing in comparison with BSE.
- Inactivation studies in relation to meat and bone meal.
- Technical developments in diagnosis by using scrapie associated fibrils and genotyping of farm sheep.
- Breeding programmes for resistance to scrapie.
- Transmission studies using marmosets, sheep and goats.

Grade 1 Agricultural Land

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what are the current restrictions on release of grade 1 agricultural land;

(2) what exceptions are permitted to the criteria governing the release of grade 1 agricultural land.

Mr. Curry: Responsibility for day-to-day planning control, including the consideration and determination of applications for planning permission, rests with the appropriate planning authority in the first instance. The Government issue guidance to local authorities on development involving agricultural land which is contained in DOE circular 16/87 issued on 8 May 1987. Annex B to that circular gives information and technical guidance on specific agricultural matters, including agricultural land quality, to assist local authorities in applying the policy contained in the main body of the circular. Copies of the circular are available in the Library of the House.

Food Advisory Committee

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) of 13 December 1989, Official Report, column 695-97, whether there have been any changes in the membership of the Food Advisory Committee.

Mr. Maclean: There has been one change in the membership of the Food Advisory Committee since last December. I have recently accepted Mr. M. J. Boxall's resignation. I am currently considering suitable replacements and I will make an announcement when the appointment is decided.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the number of confirmed cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy for each county of England and Wales for the four-week period ended 16 March.

Mr. Maclean: The information is as follows:

County	Number

Abattoirs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much meat was produced in total from abattoirs in the United Kingdom in 1989.

Mr. Gummer: Total red meat production from United Kingdom abattoirs in 1989 was 2·276 million tonnes carcase weight.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much meat was consumed in the United Kingdom from non-European Community approved abattoirs in 1989.

Mr. Gummer: Data on consumption from particular abattoirs are not collected; red meat production from non EC-approved abattoirs in 1989 was 1·1525 million tonnes carcase weight.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library the general conclusions by the European Community arising from their 1989 inspection visit to slaughterhouses in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: A formal report from the European Commission has not been received. However, I will write to the hon. Member about the information which is available.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many European Community approved abattoirs received (a) suspension warnings and (b) suspensions in 1989 under the Fresh Meat Export (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations.

Mr. Gummer: During 1989, five suspension warnings were issued and export approval was suspended in four cases.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much meat from European Community approved abattoirs in the United Kingdom was (a) exported and (b) consumed in the United Kingdom in 1989 under the Fresh Meat Export (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations.

Mr. Gummer: Abattoirs approved to engage in intra-Community trade under the Fresh Meat Export (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1987 may produce fresh meat for sale on domestic markets as well as for export. It is a matter of commercial judgment for each operator to decide whether to produce meat for export or for domestic markets and figures are not held by my Department as to the destination of the meat from such plants.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the suspension on providing meat to the European Community from the slaughter-house at North Torrington is still in force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Yes, this suspension of export approval is still in force. Since suspending export approval, officials have been in discussion with the plant management regarding the necessary improvements, and these are being carried out. Suspension will not be lifted till we are satisfied that the plant conforms to EC export conditions.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total number of abattoirs in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) England, (c) Scotland and (d) Wales; and how many were approved for export to the European Community for each year since 1983 for (i) England, (ii) Scotland and (iii) Wales.

Mr. Gummer: Whether plants apply for export approval is a matter for their commercial judgment. The total number of abattoirs and of those which have export approval are as follows.

	Northern Ireland	England	Scotland	Wales	United Kingdom

Set-aside Scheme

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he requests from applicants to the set-aside scheme with regard to the non-agricultural use of the land to be set aside and planning permission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Farmers wishing to set aside land to non-agricultural use are required to specify the land concerned and to describe the intended new use. Tenants must submit a copy of a consent form signed by the landlord showing that he is content that the land be used for non-agricultural purposes. As already indicated to the hon. Member, information as regards planning permission is not required from applicants, although advice on the point is given in the scheme literature.

Flood Defences

Mr. Key: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has made a recent assessment of the state of flood defences.

Mr. Maclean [pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 8 March 1990, c. 994]: I am sorry that some incorrect information was provided about grant rates available for flood protection work. At present, under the Land Drainage Act 1976, grant may be paid to the National Rivers Authority at one of four basic rates—15, 30, 45 and 55 per cent. In addition, a supplement of 15 per cent. is added for work to protect against flooding from the sea and tidal rivers. From April this supplement will increase to 20 per cent. and the maximum grant available will therefore be 75 per cent. For local authorities, the basic rate for flood defence work is 26 per cent. The 15 per cent. sea and tidal supplement may also apply at present and, again, the supplement will rise to 20 per cent. in April. Where local authorities carry out work under the Coast Protection Act 1949, grant may be payable within the range 24 to 70 per cent.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans the Government have to introduce legislation to ensure that all private pensions are index-linked; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 16 March at columns 403-04.

Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the central Government expenditure on rent rebates, rent allowances, rate rebates and family credit in 1979 and 1989; and what was the income level at which these benefits ceased and the number of persons in receipt of such benefits in each year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information available is in the table. In 1979-80 assistance with housing costs was provided through the supplementary benefit scheme administered by the Department of Health and Social Security and the rent and rate rebate and rent allowance schemes which were the responsibility of the Department of the Environment. The costs and numbers receiving assistance with housing costs through supplementary benefit are not available and the figures for 1979-80 therefore represent the Department of the Environment schemes only. Expenditure in 1989-90 is the amount of central Government grant paid to local authorities through housing benefit subsidy. Direct comparison of the two sets of figures would be misleading because of the limited nature of the information for 1979-80.

Under both the 1979-80 schemes and the current scheme for supporting housing costs, the amount of help available to a person would be dependent partly upon those housing costs. There is, therefore, no single income level at which help would run out.

In 1979, the income level at which family income supplement ceased depended upon the number of children in the family. In family credit the level depends on the number of children and their ages.

	1979-80		1989-90
	£ million	(000s)	£ million	(000s)
Rent rebate	238	1,205	2,748	3,115
Rent allowance	40	220	1,260	1,040
Rate rebate	200	3,065	1,178	4,480
Family Income supplement	27	80	—	—
Family credit	—	—	435	315

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and its predecessor and public bodies for which his Department and its predecessor has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: (a) The information requested for 1979 is not available.

(b) Expenditure for 1989 was £16·7 million.

Income Support

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the latest report on the number of claimants living in the Birkenhead constituency aged below 25 years, over 25 years and married couples, drawing income support and the number of dependants covered by each of these three groups of payments.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to make a decision on the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council recommendation that work in ships' engine rooms be added to the list of prescribed occupations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The recommendations by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council contained in "Occupational Deafness" (Cm. 817) will be reviewed in the light of its further report of the operation and administration of the occupational deafness scheme which is expected later this year.

Social Fund

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he is satisfied as to the levels of performance achieved by the social fund microcomputer;

(2) when he anticipates incorporating the social fund into the mainframe computer system currently being installed for income support claims.

Mr. Scott: Yes. The present system is providing good support to local offices. We are continually seeking to improve the system and a team is currently working on plans to transfer the social fund on to the mainframe computer as part of the operational strategy. It will report in June 1990. Meanwhile, from April 1990, a new management system for the social fund will be operated using a mainframe computer.

Attendance Allowance Board

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what external and independent agency's remit includes investigating the Attendance Allowance Board.

Mr. Scott: There is no external or independent agency with a remit to investigate the board, but there is a right of appeal to a social security commissioner on a point of law.

Terminally Ill People

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assistance is provided to people who are terminally ill in respect of attendance allowance and other benefits.

Mr. Scott: All the relevant social security benefits are available to people who are terminally ill. In addition, the current Social Security Bill includes provision to remove the six-month qualifying period for attendance allowance for terminally ill people from October this year. The Department's leaflet "Sick or Disabled?" (FB 28) gives information on the benefits available to sick and disabled people. A copy is in the Library.

Community Care Grant

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will amend the criteria governing the award of community care grant in order to ensure that there is adequate support for people in need.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to change the criteria governing eligibility for community care grants. Social fund community care grants help people re-establish themselves or remain in the community, ease exceptional pressures on families and assist with certain travelling expenses. The social fund with its mixture of grants and interest-free loans provides extra help to those in receipt of income support.

Community Charge

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of raising the savings limit for social security benefits from £8,000 to £16,000; and what would be the figure for application of such a limit solely to the community charge.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The current capital limits are £6,000 for income support and family credit, and £8,000 for housing benefit and community charge benefit. The estimates for raising these limits are in the table (assuming that the present rules for imputing a weekly income to capital of more than £3,000 are maintained).

Current capital limits increased to:	16,000
Full year cost at current rate (£ million)
IS, FC, HB and CCB	180
CCB	20

Notes:
Costs rounded to the nearest £5 million.
Assumes community charges in line with SSA based DOE estimates.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will raise the limit on personal savings below which reductions in community charge are allowed from £3,000 and £8,000 to £6,000 and £16,000, respectively; and if he will adjust the scale of relief accordingly.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The upper capital limit, above which there is no entitlement to community charge benefit, is to be raised to £16,000 from 1 April when the benefit scheme comes into operation. The first £3,000 of capital will continue to be ignored and the rules which assume some income from capital above that level will also continue.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much community charge benefit will be received by (i) a single person with capital of £3,000 and at each £250 band to £16,000 and (ii) a married person with capital of £3,000 and at each £250 band to £8,000, assuming their partner holds the same level of capital, paying a community charge of (a) £250 per annum, (b) £300 per annum, (c) £350 per annum, (d) £400 per annum, (e) £450 per annum and (f) £500 per annum, giving, in each case, the amount of benefit attributable to raising the capital limit for singles and couples to £16,000;

(2) how much housing benefit will be received by (a) a single person and (b) a married/cohabiting couple with capital of £3,000 and £16,000 and for each £250 between, paying rent of £25 per week and £100 per week and for each £5 between; and if he will indicate, in each case, how much of the benefit is attributable to raising the capital limit for singles and couples to £16,000.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The questions assume that the claimant has no resources other than capital. The calculations of entitlement to housing benefit and community charge benefit, therefore, take account only of assumed tariff income on the capital. For the couple, the result is that entitlement remains at the maximum, whatever the level of capital. For the single person, entitlement remains at the maximum until capital exceeds £12,000, at which point the tariff income exceeds the applicable amount and the respective tapers apply in the normal way.

Wherever capital exceeds £8,000, benefit entitlement is attributable to the rise in the capital limit.

The tables show the amount of entitlement to benefit.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the most recent figures for the total number of (a) widows in Scotland (b) widows who are also householders in Scotland and (c) widow householders who are also in receipt of housing benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 22 February 1990]: It is estimated that in May 1988 22,000 widows in Scotland who were receiving widows' benefit or war widows' pension were also receiving housing benefit. Information is not collected about numbers of other widows receiving housing benefit whose income did not include these widows' benefits. The number of widows and widow householders in Scotland is not available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

House of Fraser

4. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the light of the findings of the inspector in the affairs of the House of Fraser and the Al Fayed brothers, he will consider the immediate deporation of the Al Fayed brothers as undesirable aliens.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The report of the inspectors appointed under the Companies Act does not provide a basis for the use of deportation powers.

Prisoners

19. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are currently serving a prison sentence in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 January 1990 there were about 36,250 sentenced prisoners in prison service establishments in England and Wales. This is 1,625 fewer than a year earlier.

85. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current prison population; what it was one year ago; and what projections he has made for the prison population over the next five years.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, West and Torridge (Miss Nicholson).

75. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the population of England and Wales is currently in prison; and what are the figures for Germany, France, Italy, and Holland.

Mr. Mellor: The latest information, for 1 September 1988, published by the Council of Europe is shown in the table. The prison population per 100,000 inhabitants in England and Wales has subsequently fallen to 93 on 31 January 1990.

The Council of Europe publishes information on the prison population in member states twice a year in its "Prison Information Bulletin", copies of which are held in the Library. An article on "International comparisons of prison populations" by Collier and Tarling (Home Office research bulletin No. 23 pages 48 to 54) showed that the figures for different countries are unlikely to be strictly comparable, because the definitions of prisons and prisoners vary from one country to another, reflecting different legal and administrative systems. Examples of differences in the definitions are the inclusion or exclusion in a country's figures of juvenile offenders and mentally disordered offenders.

81. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of people in prison.

Mr. Mellor: On Friday 16 March, there were 47,115 people held in prison service establishments in England and Wales. This represents a fall of 2,722 people since the same time last year.

60. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in implementing the recommendations of the report of the prison department working group in the management of vulnerable prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: Prison rule 43 and young offender institution rule 46 were amended with effect from 18 December 1989 in accordance with recommendations of the working group. Instructions and guidance based on other recommendations are to be issued shortly.

70. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on his proposals to make parents more responsible for crimes committed by their children.

102. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of special constables now attached to police forces in England and Wales; and if he will encourage chief constables to recruit more, particularly among ethnic minority communities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 31 December 1989, there were 15,589 special constables in England and Wales (10,390 men and 5,199 women). Of the total, 469 were from the ethnic minority communities. We encourage chief constables to recruit as many special constables as they can and to make special efforts to recruit from the ethnic minority communities.

43. Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the discussions he had in February with the Police Advisory Board on introducing further measures to improve recruitment of special constables.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The police advisory board welcomed a proposal for a national publicity campaign, which will commence later this year. There was a divergence of views on the question of an incentive payment or "bounty", and this will be further considered in the light of those views.

Sunday Trading

30. Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 17 January, Official Report, column 266, whether he yet has figures available for prosecutions of retail outlets for trading on Sundays for (a) 1989 as a whole and (b) December 1989.

Mr. Mellor: Information for 1989 will not be available until autumn 1990.

Drug Traffickers

31. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current value of assets for which confiscation orders have been made in respect of drug trafficking offences in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. John Patten: The latest figures, which are in respect of confiscation orders made in 1987 and 1988, are given in table 7.25 of "Criminal Statistics England and Wales 1988", a copy of which is in the Library. These show that over £9 million was ordered to be confiscated in those two years. The current estimate by the national drugs intelligence unit of the cumulative total of confiscation orders made since the Drug Trafficking Offences Act came into force in January 1987 is in excess of £16 million.

86. Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further representations he has received in respect of alleged war crimes; and if he will make a statement.

100. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further representations he has received in respect of alleged war crimes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The issue of war crimes was fully discussed in the Second Reading debate on the War Crimes Bill earlier this week.

Terrorism

34. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on the United Kingdom's contribution to international co-operation against terrorism.

Mr. Waddington: The mainstay of our contribution to the international fight against terrorism is the daily advice, assistance and support that we provide to our partners in responding to terrorist threats and incidents. On top of that, we continue to be prominent in the TREVI group and other international fora in working towards joint agreement on effective, practical measures. Co-operation against terrorism is high on the agenda when I meet colleagues in other Governments bilaterally. I recently had such meetings with the State Secretary for the Ministry of the Interior of Spain and the Minister of Justice for Denmark, and I shall be meeting European Community colleagues collectively at the next meeting of TREVI Ministers in Dublin in June.

Data Protection

36. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the implications for civil liberties of the public availability of personal information as a result of the introduction of the community charge.

Mr. Mellor: None. The only information which can be made available to the public from the community charge register is the address, surname and initials of those subject to the charge. This information may be inspected, but not copied out, by members of the public.

52. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the data protection registrar into the number of incidents of alleged misuse of information held by poll tax registration officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no powers to do so. Any evidence of misuse of automated personal information will be investigated by the registrar, who has the responsibility for enforcing the Data Protection Act 1984.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones).

49. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special units have been established within the Metropolitan police area dealing with cases of domestic violence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are currently 34 such units.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington).

White Paper

40. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in response to his White Paper "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public".

Policing Review

42. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a copy of the operational policing review commissioned by the police staff associations and published on 8 March; and if he will make a statement.

"Fresh Start"

44. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a further statement on the operation of "fresh start."

Mr. Mellor: I refer the right hon. and learned Member to my answer of 20 December 1989 to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) at columns 270-71. We have recruited nationally all the additional staff promised under the "fresh start" framework agreement and will continue to honour our commitments. There are nearly 20 per cent. more officers in post in establishments than three years ago.

46. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of seizures of illicit drugs occurs at British ports of entry.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 22 January 1990 at column 516.

Deportations

47. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the increase over the past five years in the numbers of persons removed from the United Kingdom, either by deportations or as illegal immigrants, under his Department's enforcement powers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of persons removed from the United Kingdom under the enforcement powers in the Immigration Act 1971, either as illegal entrants or under the deportation process, increased from 1,357 in 1984 to 3,838 in 1989. More detailed information is published in tables 23 and 24 of the Home Office Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics United Kingdom 1988" (Cm. 726), and today, in Home Office Statistical Bulletin 8/90 "Control of Immigration: Statistics—Fourth Quarter and Year 1989", copies of both of which are in the Library.

Dangerous Dogs

50. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward measures to place restrictions on the ownership and sale of certain types of breeds of dangerous dogs.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As I stated in my reply to questions from the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) on 22 February at column 917, the law was strengthened only last year by the Dangerous Dogs Act 1989. We are studying recent incidents closely and will consider whether the law would benefit from further revision.

Missing Persons

51. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to establish a national missing persons bureau; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend is currently examining two possible methods of collecting data about missing persons; the establishment of a national bureau and the possibility of putting missing persons on the planned replacement of the police national computer system which was referred to in the reply given to a question from the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on 12 February 1990 at columns 6-7. He expects to receive advice on the police national computer option shortly.

Sentencing

54. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government propose to take to ensure that sentences served more accurately reflect the crimes for which they are imposed.

71. Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government propose to take to ensure that sentences served more accurately reflect the crimes for which they are imposed.

78. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government propose to take to ensure that sentences served more accurately reflect the crimes for which they are imposed.

Mr. John Patten: Our proposals were set out in the White Paper "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public" (Cm. 965) which was published on 6 February. The proposed statutory framework for sentencing aims to ensure the length of the sentence reflects the seriousness of the crime. All prisoners will serve at least half their sentences in custody and will be at risk of being returned to custody up to the end of their sentence, if convicted of a further imprisonable offence. All those serving sentences of a year or more will be supervised on release until three quarters of their sentence. Those serving sentences of four years or more would not get parole if this would put the public at risk of serious harm. These arrangements would replace the present system of parole and remission.

Rape

55. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average sentence imposed for the crime of rape for the latest period for which figures are available and for 1979.

80. Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average sentence imposed for the crime of rape for the latest period for which figures are available and for 1979.

99. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average sentence imposed for the crime of rape for the latest period for which figures are available and for 1979.

Mr. John Patten: In England and Wales the average sentence length imposed on males for the crime of rape was 6·2 years in 1988 and 4·0 years in 1979.

Data for 1989 will not be available until the autumn.

57. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to monitor the response of police forces in England and Wales to Home Office circular 69/86 on the special needs of victims of rape trauma syndrome.

61. Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to monitor the response of police forces in England and Wales to Home Office circular 69/86 on the special needs of victims of rape trauma syndrome.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to monitor the response of police forces in England and Wales to Home Office circular 69/86 on the special needs of victims of rape trauma syndrome.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has asked Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary to monitor arrangements for dealing with rape victims with police forces as part of its annual inspections. In doing so, it covers the main elements of Home Office circular 69-86.

Police (Height Requirement)

56. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the removal of the height requirement for Metropolitan police recruits.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Commissioner's decision has been generally welcomed and we have received no representations about it.

Council Meetings

58. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the public order implications of disruption of local council meetings.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None, as far as I am aware.

Crack

59. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of the possession of the drug crack are known to the Metropolitan police; and what further action he plans to take to deal with this potential threat.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Figures supplied by the police to the national drugs intelligence unit, which may not be completed, show that in the first two months of 1990 the Metropolitan police made 11 seizures of crack. This compares with 86 seizures in the whole of 1989; 10 in 1988; three in 1987; and three in 1986.

Over £2 million is being made available in 1990-91 for a new drug prevention initiative which will involve the setting up of local drug prevention teams in a number of areas at risk from drugs and in particular from threat of "crack". Areas in London are among those being considered as locations for such teams.

In December 1989 a joint police/Customs task force was set up to combat the "crack" threat. The task force, which is based in London, will target the importation of cocaine linked to the manufacture and distribution of "crack".

BBC

62. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends next meeting the chairman of the BBC; what matters he intends to discuss; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to his question on 25 January at column 882.

Crime Victims

64. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to support victims of crime; and what compensation is available to them.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns).

62. Mr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now collect information on prosecutions and convictions in sufficient detail to identify the sex of victims in each police force in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to do so. Special studies of victims are published from time to time and the sex of the victim is already known in homicide cases and for nearly all sexual offences. To record the victim's sex for all offences would greatly add to the collection of costs.

Community Policing

62. Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his monitoring of the effect of community policing on crime levels.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The effectiveness of each community policing initiative must be judged on its merits by the responsible chief office of police. This will involve both an assessment of the impact on crime levels and on police relations with the public, together with associated factors such as fear of crime. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, during its inspection of forces, examines in some detail the aims and objectives of each force and the means by which it is intended to measure effectiveness. In addition, a Home Office research study is currrently examining a wide range of community policing strategies and their effects upon local people.

Tape Recorded Interviews

69. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the pilot scheme to be launched in Liverpool to log interviews with suspects on tapes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I have received no such representations. Consultations with interested parties took place before the pilot scheme was established. The arrangements for it are described in my reply to a question from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on 1 March at column 273.

Lewes Gaol

76. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any new proposals on prison conditions in the light of Mr. Stewart Fisher's report on Lewes gaol.

Mr. Mellor: We have already announced an increase of £80 million in the prison refurbishment programme for 1990-91, bringing the total available in that year to £120 million. The additional funding will allow for essential health, safety and security measures to be carried out, particularly in kitchens. In all, £400 million will be provided over the next three years to improve prison conditions.

At Her Majesty's prison Lewes, capital expenditure of £2·6 million is already planned for the provision of a new kitchen and reception area, and an extension to the hospital.

Acid House Parties

82. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to control acid house parties.

Mr. John Patten: The police and local authorities are already taking a variety of measures under existing powers to stop or regulate parties of this kind, but we consider that the law needs to be strengthened. Accordingly, we welcome the introduction by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) of the Entertainments (Increased Penalties) Bill. This seeks to empower the summary courts to impose fines of up to £20,000 or imprisonment for up to six months, or both, on people convicted of the relevant offences against the entertainment licensing laws. In addition, the provisions will give magistrates the power to order the confiscation of profits made by those convicted of organising illegal parties or allowing their land or premises to be used for them.

Broadcasting Bill

83. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received regarding the Broadcasting Bill.

Mr. Mellor: We are continuing to receive representations, and to have meetings with groups and individuals, on a range of topics connected with the Broadcasting Bill.

Ports (Policing Costs)

87. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the costs of policing ports.

Mr. Waddington: None so far this year. There are continuing discussions between the Home Office and the police forces and authorities concerned.

Crime Prevention

89. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in response to his guidelines announcing a new framework for crime prevention partnership.

Mr. John Patten: The new guidelines on crime prevention have been issued in draft form. Written observations are requested by 3 April. Several sets of comments have been received, and I look forward to considering these, and others yet to be submitted, with my colleagues on the ministerial group on crime prevention.

Northumbria Police

90. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next expects to meet the Chief Constable of Northumbria police; and what he proposes to discuss.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has no current plans to meet the Chief Constable of Northumbria police.

Civil Disturbances

91. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the number of arrests in connection with civil disturbances and demonstrations in the last four weeks.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on arrests in connection with demonstrations generally is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, I am advised that between 5 and 13 March 247 people were arrested following disorder at demonstrations to protest against the community charge.

Citizenship

92. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken to grant British citizenship.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average time taken to process applications of all types completed in February 1990 was 25 months.

Missing Children

93. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest official estimate of missing children in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

97. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the latest official estimate of missing children in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There is no centrally collated figure. Chief officers of police are responsible locally for keeping records of missing persons and for deciding whether to keep separate records of the number of missing children.

Gambling Machines

94. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to control the use of gambling machines by young people under 18 years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Of the machines covered by part III of the Gaming Act 1968, "jackpot" machines are permitted only on premises to which young people do not normally have access. With respect to amusement-with-prizes machines, local authorities have extensive powers to prohibit them in premises where they are incidental to the main business, and local authorities also have wide discretion to refuse permits for new amusement arcades.

Devon and Cornwall Constabulary

95. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many new posts were given to the Devon and Cornwall constabulary in the current year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has approved 17 additional police posts in 1990-91 for the Devon and Cornwall constabulary. This will increase the authorised establishment to 2,863 officers.

Police Rent Allowance

96. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the representatives of the Police Federation in Nottingham, North to discuss the police rent allowance.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. This is a national issue, on which the chairman and secretary of the Police Federation have already made the views of their members clear to us.

Prosecution Statistics

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now collect information on prosecutions and convictions in sufficient detail to identify the sex of victims in each police force area in England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier to a question from the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones).

Random Breath Tests

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the issue of random breath testing.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 21 March to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) at column 635.

Probation Service

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why representatives of the National Association of Probation Officers were refused admission to the press conference launching the White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public".

Mr. Waddington: The Home Office did not hold a press conference to launch the White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public".

Private Security Firms

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answer of 21 December, Official Report, column 386, whether he has yet decided whether there is scope for further improvement in self-regulation of the private security industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. We are still considering this matter.

Fraud

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department collects statistics about fraud in Britain.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. The Department collects statistics concerning fraud in England and Wales which are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" and quarterly in statistical bulletins. Copies of these publications are available in the Library. Information for Scotland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Prison Hospitals

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will request a report on conditions in prison hospitals in the London area for Her Majesty's inspector of prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Medical facilities are examined by HM inspectorate of prisons in the course of all full inspections and some short inspections of individual establishments. In 1989 there were full inspections of Wandsworth and Latchmere house and a short inspection of Holloway, which included the medical facilities. Full inspections of Brixton (currently taking place) and Wormwood Scrubs, and a short inspection of Pentonville, are scheduled for this year. My right hon. and learned Friend is not persuaded of the case for asking the chief inspector to carry out a special study of prison hospitals.

Greater Manchester Police

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish an independent inquiry into the workings of Greater Manchester police in the light of the success of the appeal against conviction by Thomas Corby.

Mr. Waddington: No. The circumstances of Mr. Corley's case are already the subject of an investigation by Mr. C. F. Bailey, assistant chief constable of West Yorkshire, under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority.

Oracle Service

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future of the Oracle text service on television.

Mr. Mellor: The Broadcasting Bill will introduce a new regulatory regime for the allocation of the spare capacity on broadcasting signals. This regime will allow the development of new uses for this capacity, other than teletext.

In view of concern that these proposals might result in the absence of a commercial teletext service after 1992, I announced on 15 March that we intended to amend the Bill to require the Independent Television Commission (ITC) to advertise a teletext service using part of the spare capacity on the Channel 3 and 4 signals. The amount of spare capacity to be allocated to this service by the ITC would be subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. The exact amount to be allocated will be a matter for further careful consultation. The necessary amendments to the Bill will be brought forward at the Report stage of the Bill.

Subject to parliamentary approval, the new proposals will come into operation on 1 January 1993, when Oracle's present contract comes to an end. Oracle will be free to apply to the ITC for a new licence.

Drugs

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost, in the latest year for which figures are available, of customs operations directed at drug trafficking.

Mr. Ryder: I have been asked to reply.

In the financial year ending 31 March 1989 Customs and Excise estimates its expenditure on drugs enforcement and deterrence work at around £114·5 million. This includes the full costs of dedicated drugs investigation teams and the preventive staff employed at ports and airports whose duties include a prime responsibility for combating drugs smuggling.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East of 9 March, Official Report, columns 869-78, when he expects to reduce the in-patients waiting list to below six months.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The Government do not believe it to be helpful to forecast waiting times, as the management of waiting lists is a matter for health and social services boards. Under the changes flowing from the NHS review, boards as purchasers of services will be keen to have those services deemed necessary for their populations delivered speedily and efficiently. Boards can therefore be expected to regard waiting times as an important criterion in placing and reviewing contracts.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East of 9 March, Official Report, columns 869-78, how many of the persons on the waiting list for (a) less than 12 months and (b) more than 12 months who are unfit for work due to their medical condition, but who can be expected to return to work after treatment, have lost their jobs because of the length of the period of waiting for treatment, or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 20 March 1990]: This information is not available.

PRIME MINISTER

East Germany

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will make it her policy not to agree to full membership of the EEC for East Germany in advance of other east European states.

The Prime Minister: We support the integration of the territory of the GDR into the EC as soon as practicable after unification. Intensive and detailed negotiations between Germany and the EC will be required on, for example, agriculture and fisheries, trade and regional policy. I look forward to discussing this at the informal meeting of EC Heads of State or Government in Dublin on 28 April.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether the Government will make it their policy not to agree to an increase in EEC funding for East Germany until measures have been taken to eliminate the United Kingdom's net contribution to the EEC budget; and if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing that contribution for each year since 1979, the estimated outturn for 1989 and the forecast for the current year.

The Prime Minister: No. The United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Community budget was £947 million in 1979 and £706 million in 1980. Information about the United Kingdom's contribution in later years is given in the successive annual statements on the Community budget. The latest published estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1989 is in the statement on the 1989 Community budget (Cm. 680). The statement on the 1990 Community budget will be published shortly and will contain a revised estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution in 1989 and an estimate of the net contribution in 1990.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Residential Special Schools

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether membership of the joint working party for residential special schools will be affected by any new arrangements for determining the pay and conditions of teachers;

(2) what bodies form the membership of the joint working party for residential special schools;

(3) how the membership of the joint working party for residential special schools was determined.

Mrs. Rumbold: The joint working party on the future of ILEA residential special schools outside inner London was established in June 1988 to consider the future of the residential special schools maintained by ILEA but situated outside its geographical boundary. It was chaired by officials from the Department and representation was invited from ILEA, inner and outer London boroughs, the Common Council of the City of London, those county councils in whose area the schools are situated and the London residuary body.

The joint working party completed its work in January 1989 and submitted a report to my right hon. Friend. I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 22 February 1989, Official Report, columns 638-39.

Iraqi Students

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many Iraqi students have been given permission to study in United Kingdom universities, polytechnics and colleges of higher and further education in each year since 1979.

Mr. Jackson: The number of full-time and sandwich students on publicly funded further and higher education courses in Great Britain institutions, whose domicile was recorded as Iraq, is as follows:

Academic year beginning	Numbers
1979	2,484
1980	2,218
1982	2,239
1983	1,845

Academic year beginning	Numbers
1984	1,559
1985	1,378
1986	1,420
1987	1,255
1988	918

NATIONAL FINANCE

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many firms that have been operating a profit-related pay scheme for more than one year have changed the basis on which the scheme is organised during the course of its operation.

Mr. Lilley: I regret that the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Tax Threshold

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the estimated loss in revenue of an increase in the tax threshold to £150 per week for all families and £100 for individuals together with a basic tax rate of 25 per cent. inclusive of national insurance contribution.

Mr. Lilley: At 1990-91 levels of income, the cost in a full year of adopting the tax regime suggested by my hon. Friend and abolishing class 1 national insurance contributions for employees and class 2 and 4 contributions for the self-employed is estimated to be over £30 billion.

This estimate assumes independent taxation and is based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and is provisional.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in *(a)*1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Ryder: Total expenditure on publicity and advertising by HM Treasury in 1989-90 is estimated at £550,525. That figure does not include any provision for privatisation-related expenditure for which there was no requirement in 1989-90. Actual expenditure will not be known until after the close of the financial year. Comparable figures for the year 1979-80 are not available because of machinery of Government changes, and could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Inland Revenue Staff

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are employed by the Inland Revenue in (a) administering and (b) collecting income tax.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The staff costs of (a) administering and (b) collecting income tax are around 41,500 and around 6,500 man years respectively. These figures do not include the staff costs of certain central functions which relate to the running of the Inland Revenue as a whole.

Police Recruitment Examination

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a copy of the prison service psychologist's review of the police initial recruitment examination.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.
Yes.

HEALTH

Maternity Services

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide a more integrated level of hospital-based maternity and community midwifery care; whether he proposes to issue any guidelines to health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The benefits of integrated hospital and community maternity services were emphasised in the reports of the maternity services advisory committee which was set up in 1981 by my right hon. Friends the then Secretaries of State for Social Services and for Wales to advise on matters relating to the maternity and neonatal services. The three reports were commended to health authorities upon their publication in 1984 and 1985 and remain the basis of policies for NHS maternity services. Their recommendations will inform the negotiation of contracts for maternity services which district health authorities will be undertaking with provider units subject to enactment of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received to make maternity services a core service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a number of representations from doctors and midwives as well as voluntary groups working in maternity and child care. They arise from a misunderstanding about the reasons behind the need to designate certain services as "core" services. Designation will not be an indication of the importance of a service relative to other services nor the sole indicator of a service that has to be provided locally. It will be relevant only where a district health authority has only one sensible option on the location of a service and that service is managed by a National Health Service trust.

Regional and District Health Authorities (Allocations)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he proposes a further response in view of the representations he has recieved about the financial allocations to the North East Thames regional health authority and the Waltham Forest district health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: It is for regional health authorities to decide allocations to districts in the light of local needs and priorities.

Midwives

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for what reasons the grading of newly qualified midwives with the same responsibilities varies between district health authorities;

(2) if he will state the numbers of midwives, in districts with low staff turnover, who remain in posts graded D until higher posts become available; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Midwifery posts, in common with others in the clinical grading structure, are graded in accordance with the skills and responsibilities they call for. The grading of posts may vary between authorities because of differences in the way services, staff responsibilities, and management structures are organised.

Information is not collected centrally on how long midwives in particular grades have been qualified, nor on the numbers of staff who wish to apply for higher graded posts.

Deaf People (Report)

Mr. Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the report entitled, "A Better Life—Telecommunication for People who are Deaf and use Sign Language", carried out by the social research unit at the university of York, will be published; and if he will put a copy of the report in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: The report is being completed and will be published shortly. I will arrange for a copy to be put in the Library.

Hospital Facilities

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that back-up hospital facilities are maintained outside city centres in order to reduce the time and financial costs involved in travelling to concentrated facilities.

Mr. Freeman: It is for each individual health authority to decide its pattern of services locally in the light of its assessment of needs and priorities as against available resources.

Dental Service

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists joined the dentists' register in each of the last five years from individual EC countries, and from non-EC countries.

Mr. Freeman: Information provided by the General Dental Council shows that in the last five years the number of new registrations was as follows:

	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989
EC Countries
Belgium	—	—	1	1	1
Denmark	8	5	4	7	5

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth will receive a reply to his letter of 16 January about Mr. Parkes of Kenilworth, passed to him by the Department of Social Security.

Mr. Freeman: A reply was sent yesterday. I regret the delay.

Health Care Research

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he intends to increase the amount of money in real terms available for research into nursing care; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the amount of money allocated to specific nursing care research; and what percentage this amount is of the total moneys available to health care research overall.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Research into nursing care falls mainly into the following research priority themes:

Aids
Acute Sector Hospital Services
Community Care
Primary Health Care

Information about expenditure on individual projects is published in the Department of Health yearbook of research and development 1989, available in the Library.

Provision for the health and personal social services research programme in 1990-91 is planned at £21 million, compared with expenditure in 1989-90 estimated at £15 million.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average level of earnings for (a) hospital doctors, (b) nurses and (c) ancillary staff in each year since 1974 in cash, constant prices and as a proportion of national average earnings.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 1 March 1990]: Estimates are available on a consistent basis only from 1985-86, and these are given in the table.

[3] Hospital and Community Health Service Doctors and Dentists. For years prior to 1989-90, information on earnings is taken from a different source to the estimates of whole-time equivalents, and the average figures shown may be somewhat unreliable in consequence.

Hepatitis B

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice his Department has issued to health authorities regarding the risk of contracting the hepatitis B virus from discarded needles;

(2) what research his Department has conducted into the risks of infection by the hepatitis B virus through discarded needles in refuse.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 16 March 1990]: We are unaware of any specific research in this area, but advice on the risks of hepatitis B contamination from discarded needles and other "sharps" is contained in "The Safe Disposal of Clinical Waste" which was issued to all health authorities in 1982. Further advice is contained in "Guidance for Clinical Health Care Workers: Protection Against Infections with HIV and Hepatitis Viruses" which was issued to health authorities in January this year. Copies of the documents mentioned are available in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Estate Agency

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is his estimate of the total cost of establishing and implementing the new controls over estate agency as envisaged in the current report "Estate Agency" issued by the Director General of Fair Trading;

(2) whether he is able to give a firm date for when he expects the new proposals for estate agency control outlined in the Office of Fair Trading report to be in operation.

Mr. Forth: I received the director general's report on the issues that I asked him to consider in relation to my proposals to improve consumer protection in estate agency on 9 March.

I am giving careful consideration to his conclusions and recommendations, particularly in respect of the proposals for new controls under section 3 of the Estate Agents Act 1979 and under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. Examination of the resource implications of these proposals will form part of this work.

I intend to announce my conclusions shortly.

Business Lending and Hiring

Sir Neil Macfarlane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to amend the Consumer Credit Act by removing business lending and hiring from the scope of the Act as proposed in paragraph 6:8:8 of the 1988 White Paper "Releasing Enterprise"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Government intend to amend the Consumer Credit Act 1974 so as to exclude all credit and hire for business purposes, as soon as parliamentary time permits.

Penny Post Anniversary

Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the 150th anniversary of the penny post to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Forth: I gave my approval in principle to this application on 6 March.

New Businesses

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new businesses were established in the Yorkshire and Humberside region in 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; how many net new businesses were established for the same periods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The available information, based on VAT data, is given in the table. Figures are not available before 1980. Although 1988 is the latest year for which these detailed figures are available, early indications from data collected by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are that there was a net increase in 1989 in the United Kingdom as a whole of 1,500 a week on average, compared with 1,200 a week in 1988.

Germany (Privatisation)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government have offered any advice on privatisation to the Governments of West and East Germany.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

We have exchanged views with the West German Government on our respective privatisation programmes. During his talks in East Berlin with the GDR authorities earlier this year, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs emphasised the importance of attracting foreign investment. We have not yet offered substantive help in this area to the GDR, but expect to do so in future.

Czechoslovakia

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his latest assessment of the opportunities for joint trading ventures in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Redwood: Czechoslovakia introduced joint venture legislation over a year ago and although it has been refining it since to make the idea more attractive to western investors, so far only one British company has entered into a full joint venture. This is in the textile sector. As for the future, I visited Czechoslovakia recently and found great commitment in the Government and among middle management towards joint ventures. Opportunities are certainly there in such areas as food processing machinery and the automotive sector, and will also grow out of the day-to-day trade relationships which we are doing our best to encourage.

East Germany

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on United Kingdom trade with East Germany.

Mr. Redwood: In 1989 the United Kingdom exported to the GDR goods worth £106 million and imported goods to the value of £169 million. Some 25 per cent. of our exports were accounted for by cereals; and of the imports, non-ferrous metals and furniture accounted for about 35 per cent. altogether. My Department encourages the expansion of trade with the GDR and my noble Friend the Minister for Trade has just returned from the Leipzig fair where over 100 British firms exhibited and received a record number of inquiries from potential GDR customers.

Eastern Europe

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on any proposed joint ventures between United Kingdom companies and East Germany.

Mr. Redwood: I am not aware of any actual joint ventures between British and German Democratic Republic companies. Such joint ventures are certainly possible although the formal legislation is not in place yet. We are advised that although the East German authorities have specified a maximum foreign shareholding of 49 per cent., in practice it might be possible to exceed this. Several British companies have built up close trading links with East German enterprises, particularly in the food processing machinery and health care sectors, and I know of at least two companies being set up in the German Democratic Republic under British auspices to market British products and expertise in these sectors. Other legislation to facilitate trade and investment is being discussed, for example, a double taxation agreement and an investment promotion and protection agreement.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, during his recent visit to eastern Europe, he discussed the possibility of providing export credit guarantees to support the development of environment-friendly industrial plants.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 20 March 1990]: My right hon. Friend met Ministers and senior officials during his visit last week to the USSR and Poland. He did not discuss environmental issues in particular, but I am sure both Governments recognise the need to improve the environment. The ECGD will consider support for United Kingdom exports and investment to eastern Europe to the extent and on terms the Department considers prudent in particular countries.

ENVIRONMENT

Boundary Commission

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of (a) the total cost and (b) the costs of the management and opinion surveys of the Boundary Commission's proposed report on county Humberside.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The local government boundary commission has not yet completed its review of the county of Humberside. It is not our practice to reveal costs of individual contracts, but the combined cost of the two consultants' studies so far carried out in connection with Humberside is about £170,000.

North Sea (Chemical Discharges)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan of 13 March, Official Report, column 188, if he will list all the chemicals which are (a) persistent, (b) toxic and (c) liable to bioaccumulate which are not included in the United Kingdom red list or covered by the national action plan and which will continue to be discharged into the North sea via pipes and rivers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Further to my answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan on 13 March at column 188, the following 16 chemicals agreed as priority hazardous substances at the recent North sea conference are not included on the United Kingdom red list: copper, zinc, lead, arsenic, chromium, nickel, carbon tetrachloride, chloroform, azinphos-ethyl, fenthion, parathion, parathion-methyl, trichloroethylene, tetrachloroethylene, trichloroethane and dioxins. The first eight of these substances are either EEC list I or list II substances and discharges of such substances are strictly controlled under the arrangements set out in Department of the Environment circular 7/89.

For the remaining substances the Government will be introducing the necessary arrangements to achieve the substantial reductions in the inputs of these substances to water which were agreed at the Hague North sea conference.

Flowers and Fauna (Exhibition)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the flowers and fauna of Great Britain to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 21 May to Friday 25 May.

West Midlands Residuary Body

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on appointments to the West Midlands residuary body.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following appointments and reappointments are being made to the West Midlands residuary body for the period 1 April to 31 March 1991 or until dissolution of the body, whichever is the earlier:

Chairman:	T. McDonald, OBE
Members:	Cllr. J. Adams, OBE[1]
	G. N. Jackson, CBE[1]
	J. P. Meering[1]
	W. S. Page, CBE[1]
	K. Williams[1]

[1] Reappointments.

The West Midlands residuary body has already distributed £50 million in balances and £33 million in capital receipts and has made substantial progress with a major programme of property disposals.

My right hon. Friend is especially grateful to the retiring chairman, Dr. Malcolm Skillicorn, for his outstanding contribution to the work of the residuary body since its inception. Dr. Skillicorn will be taking up an appointment as chairman of the North Birmingham district health authority from 1 April. Mr. Tom McDonald will combine the chairmanships of West Midlands and the West Yorkshire residuary bodies during what is expected to be the remaining few months before both are finally dissolved.

West Yorkshire Residuary Body

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on appointments to the West Yorkshire residuary body.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following have been reappointed to the West Yorkshire residuary body for the period 1 April 1990 to 31 March 1991 or until dissolution of the body, whichever is sooner:

Chairman:
T. McDonald, OBE

Members:
K. J. Bridge
D. Hanson
F. A. Mallett, CBE
Cllr. G. E. Mudie
R. W. Suddards, CBE

The West Yorkshire residuary body has already distributed £5 million in balances and £24 million in capital receipts for the benefit of local ratepayers and charge payers. The reappointments reflect my right hon. Friend's confidence in the board's ability to discharge the residuary body's few remaining tasks before early wind-up.

Surface Water Acidification

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the results of the recently completed surface water acidification programme and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The results of the surface water acidification programme, which has been held under the auspices of the Royal Society and the Norwegian and Swedish academies of science, have cast valuable light on this subject. This programme has complemented the continuing research programmes funded by the Department of the Environment as well as those of the Natural Environmental Research Council, and the Lock Fleet studies funded by the CEGB. My Department is funding research programmes on air pollution which in 1990-91 will total nearly £7 million: a similar sum will be devoted to research on climate change and stratospheric ozone. In addition to the research programmes, the Department operates a system of independent scientific review groups to provide a critical evaluation of the emerging evidence and need for further work.

Together these programmes show that for some upland, sensitive areas of Wales, Scotland, Cumbria, the midlands, the Pennines and parts of the south-east of south-west England, as in Scandinavia, there is a direct link betwen acid disposition, soil and water acidification and effects on flora and fauna. This direct link means we would expect to observe a decrease in acidification in certain areas following a reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions. The first signs of such a recovery have been found for some lochs in the south-west of Scotland following the decreases in United Kingdom emissions of SO_2 that have occurred over the past 20 years, and further improvement is to be expected as a result of the major additional reductions to which we are now committed. As part of its research programme, the DOE is committed to monitoring these long-term trends in air pollution.

One important outcome of the science has been the development of the critical loads concept which enables ecosystems to be classified in terms of their sensitivity to pollution. This concept is now accepted internationally as a basis for discussing strategies for controlling pollution.

Transitional Relief Scheme Orders

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what debate on the transitional relief scheme orders he was referring at column 427 of the Official Report of 18 January.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 19 March 1990]: I understand that there will be a debate next Monday.

Collective Community Charge

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor the numbers and types of property which are being designated for the collective community charge.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 22 March 1990]: We are planning to collect information about numbers of properties subject to a collective community charge on an annual basis from community charges registration officers.

DEFENCE

Climate Change

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research is being carried out by the Meteorological Office on global climate change and precipitation.

Mr. Neubert: Changes in precipitation patterns are monitored on a global scale in the Meteorological Office using all relevant available data. Precipitation is one of the variables carried in the mathematical models being developed to estimate future climate changes. There is substantial research within the Meteorological Office on the processes involved in precipitation generally and on their representation in models.

A90 Building, Aldermaston

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action has been taken following the alleged contract irregularities on the A90 building at Aldermaston; and what conclusions have been reached.

Mr. Neubert: A detailed and painstaking investigation of these allegations undertaken by the MOD police has now been completed. No evidence has been found of criminal activity.

Patent Rights

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has paid or is committed to pay for patent rights.

Mr. Neubert: In strict terms the Secretary of State does not pay for patent rights. Under the Patents Act 1977, Government Departments already possess the right to use or authorise the use of any patent for the services of the Crown. In the absence of any right of free use, terms for payment must be negotiated with the patentee.

The following payments have been made on behalf of the Secretary of State in the exercise of these rights during the past two financial years:

1987-88	257,000
1988-89	210,000

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Neubert: The earliest year for which the figures requested are available is 1982-83 when expenditure totalled £10·113 million. The estimated expenditure for 1989-90 is £30·891 million.

Figures for 1979-80 are not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate expense.

Iraqi Military Cadets (Training)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Iraqi military cadets have studied at Ministry of Defence training schools in each year since 1979; and how much Iraq has been charged in 1990 prices for each cadet's study course.

Mr. Neubert: Details of military assistance provided to individual countries are normally confidential between Governments. Attendance of Iraqi students on United Kingdom service courses since 1979 has been entirely on a repayment basis.

WALES

Trefnant Footpaths

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) whether public rights of way Trefnant footpaths, seven, eight, nine, 14 and 15 are free from all obstructions; and whether he will discuss those footpaths with Mr. Michael Griffith, chair designate of the Countryside Council for Wales;

(2) whether public rights of way Trefnant, seven, eight, nine, 14 and 15 have any missing signposts where they leave or cross public roads, or are in need of way marking; and whether he will discuss those footpaths with Mr. Michael Griffith, chair designate of the Countryside Council for Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This is a matter for the appropriate highway authority.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current level of funding for each of the district health authorities in Wales; and what is their corresponding population.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is shown as follows:

District Health Authority	[1] Current level of Funding £ million	Population per District Health Authority [2] 000s
Clwyd	115·0	407·0
East Dyfed	77·2	235·8
Gwent	138·6	445·5
Gwynedd	68·3	239·0
Mid Glamorgan	161·8	535·9
Pembrokeshire	28·9	112·7
Powys	32·4	114·9
South Glamorgan[3]	186·9	403·4
West Glamorgan	123·5	362·9
Total DHAs	932·6	2,857·0

[1] Revenue and capital allocations for 1989-90 as at 19 March 1990.
[2] Unweighted mid 1988 estimates of population: Source: Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.
[3] Provides medical and dental teaching facilities.

It should be noted, however, that allocations to district health authorities in Wales are not currently based on resident population. Authorities are, at present, funded on the basis of the services which they provide and in relation to the catchment populations (weighted for age, sex, morbidity, sparsity and seasonal variation) which they serve. However, this will change in 1991-92 when a process of transition will begin towards funding authorities on the basis of weighted resident capitation in accordance with the proposals set out in the White Paper "Working for Patients". Allocation mechanisms are therefore now in the process of being reviewed and authorities will be consulted on both revised and transitional arrangements prior to allocations for 1991-92 being determined later this year.

Veterinary Laboratories

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit the veterinary laboratories at Bangor, north Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have no plans for such a visit.

TRANSPORT

A6 Windlehurst Road

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give further details of the A6 Windlehurst road scheme which he is putting out to tender.

Mr. Atkins: This scheme, scheduled for completion this summer, will improve road safety and ease traffic flow, by widening the A6 on the south side of its junction with Windlehurst road.

The provision of a ghost island, and wider turning circle at the junction, will assist vehicles turning right into and out of Windlehurst road and reduce traffic delays for through traffic on the trunk road. The existing pelican crossing will also be improved.

London Underground (Incidents)

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what information he has on recent incidents on London Underground involving doors closing while blind persons and guide dogs were entering a train; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has on recent incidents on London Underground involving the trapping of push-chairs and children in train doors out of the driver's view; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The railway inspectorate was notified of an incident involving a London Underground train at Wimbledon Park station on 9 February. A partially sighted man was caught by the doors and carried along the platform for a distance of 15 to 20 yd, sustaining injuries to his left elbow and hip.

The inspectorate has learnt from London Underground of two incidents involving children. On 23 October 1989 a train was leaving Lambeth North station when someone on the platform shouted a warning that there was a child caught in the doors. The guard stopped the train after it had travelled, I understand, half a carriage length. On 11 January 1990 a pushchair with a child in it was trapped by a wheel support bar as the doors of a train closed at Holborn station (Piccadilly line). The driver reported that on hearing shouts he stopped the train within 10 to 12 ft. I am pleased to say that neither of these incidents caused injury. Because of this, neither incident was notifiable to the inspectorate.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will indicate the nature of incidents which London Underground Limited has a legal duty to report to the railway inspectorate; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether there are published guidelines specifying the type of incidents which London Underground Limited has a legal duty to report to the railway inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Railways are required to report any accident specified in schedule 1 of the Railways (Notice of Accidents) Order 1986.

The terms of that schedule are as follows:

SCHEDULE 1 Article 3(2)

ACCIDENTS OCCURRING IN THE WORKING OF A RAILWAY WHICH ARE NOTIFIABLE ACCIDENTS

1. Accidents to persons
   Any accident attended with loss of life or major or minor personal injury to any person whomsoever.

2. Accidents to passenger trains
   (a) Any collision where one of the trains is a passenger train;
   (b) any passenger train or any part of a passenger train accidentally leaving the rails.

3. Accidents not involving passenger trains
   (a) Any collision on a running line where any vehicle sustains damage as a result of the collision, and any collision in a siding which results in a running line being obstructed;
   (b) any derailment on a running line, except a derailment which occurs during shunting operations and does not obstruct any other running line;
   (c) any derailment in a siding which results in a running line being obstructed.

4. Accidents involving any kind of train
   (a) Any case of a train striking a buffer stop, other than in a siding, where damage is caused to the train;
   (b) any case of a train on a running line striking or being struck by any object which causes damage (other than damage consisting solely in the breakage of glass) necessitating immediate temporary or permanent repair or which might have been liable to derail the train;
   (c) any case of a train striking any cattle or horse, whether or not damage is caused to the train, or striking any other animal if, in consequence, damage (other than damage consisting solely in the breakage of glass) is caused to the train necessitating immediate temporary or permanent repair;
   (d) any case of a passenger train, or any other train not fitted with continuous self-applying brakes, becoming divided.

5. Accidents and incidents at level crossings
   (a) any train striking a road vehicle or a gate at a level crossing;
   (b) any train running onto a level crossing when not authorised to do so;
   (c) a failure of the equipment at a level crossing which could endanger users of the road or path crossing the railway.

6. Accidents involving a locomotive or other power unit or any rolling stock.
   Any of the following classes of accident is notifiable if it occurs or is discovered whilst the vehicle is on a running line:
   (a) the failure of an axle;

(b) the failure of a wheel or tyre, including a tyre loose on its wheel;
(c) the failure of a rope or the fastenings thereof in working an incline;
(d) any fire, severe electrical arcing or fusing in or on any part of a passenger train;
(e) in the case of any train other than a passenger train, any severe electrical arcing, fusing, or any fire which was extinguished by a fire-fighting service;
(f) any other failure of any part of a train which is likely to cause an accident to that or any other train or to kill or injure any person.

7. Accidents involving the permanent way and other works on or connected with a railway:
(a) The failure of a rail in a running line, which results in a complete fracture through its cross-section or in a piece becoming detached from the rail;
(b) a buckle of a running line which necessitates the immediate imposition of a speed restriction lower than that currently in force;
(c) any aircraft or vehicle of any kind landing on, running onto or coming to rest foul of the line, or damaging the line, causing damage which obstructs the line or damaging any railway equipment at a level crossing;
(d) the runaway of an escalator, lift or passenger conveyor;
(e) any fire or severe arcing or fusing which seriously affects the functioning of electrical signalling equipment;
(f) any other fire affecting the permanent way or works of the railway which necessitates the suspension of services over any line, or the closure of any part of a station, signalbox or other premises for a period:
(i) in the case of a fire affecting any part of the railway below ground, of more than 30 minutes, and
(ii) in any other case, of more than 1 hour.

8. Accidents involving failure of the works on or connected with the railway.

The following classes of accident are notifiable if they are likely either to cause an accident to a train or to endanger any person:
(a) a failure of a tunnel, bridge, viaduct, culvert, station, or other structure or any part thereof including the fixed electrical equipment of an electrified railway;
(b) a slip of a cutting or of an embankment;
(c) flooding of the permanent way;
(d) the striking of a bridge by a road vehicle or its load;
(e) the failure of any other portion of the permanent way or works not specified above.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Southport of 2 February, Official Report, column 368 and 16 February, Official Report, column 430, he has any plans to increase his Department's road building programme further to combat the greenhouse effect.

Mr. Atkins: Combating the greenhouse effect will depend on many factors including reducing congestion on the roads. The road programme itself is kept under constant review in the light of our stated objectives to assist economic growth, improve the environment and enhance safety.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has made an assessment of the effect on carbon dioxide emissions of each pound spent on (a) road building programmes and (b) rail investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: No, because so many uncertain factors are involved.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, column 430, what assessment he has made of the size of the road building programme which would give maximum reductions in carbon dioxide emissions from vehicular transport.

Mr. Atkins: Many considerations—economic and environmental—are taken into account when prospective road schemes are assessed. It is not possible to devise a programme which is solely devoted to reducing CO_2 emissions.

Road Building

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of his Department's road building programme for the number of vehicle miles travelled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The national road traffic forecasts published last year predict an increase in vehicle miles of between 83 and 142 per cent. between 1988 and 2025. These are demand forecasts, not targets, and the high and low forecasts are equally possible outcomes.

Increased traffic demand is primarily a function of economic growth rather than road building. Road improvements will not affect measurably the overall level of demand although there may be redistribution effects as traffic switches to better quality roads.

SS Montgomery

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to ensure the safety of the SS Montgomery in the Thames estuary.

Mr. McLoughlin: The wreck of the Liberty ship Richard Montgomery is marked by four lighted buoys and an outer cordon of 12 unlit marker buoys. Periodic surveys are conducted to establish the condition of the wreck. The next survey is planned for later this year.

Railway Lines (Noise Insulation)

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a statement about the action he is taking to establish a noise insulation standard for new railway lines.

Mr. Portillo: I have now set up a committee whose remit is to recommend to the Secretary of State for Transport a national noise insulation standard (or standards) for the operation of new railway lines which equitably relates to the standard set by regulation for new highways. The aim will be to arrive at a standard or standards at which the duty to offer noise insulation will be triggered and to set the trigger at a level which will ensure that there is parity of treatment between those who live near new railways and those who live near new roads.

The committee will be chaired by Dr. C. G. B. Mitchell, head of the vehicles and environment division at the transport and road research laboratory. It will have the following members:

Mr. G. Llewellyn John, County Engineer and Surveyor, West Glamorgan county council

Dr. H. G. Leventhall, head of Institute of Environmental Engineering at South Bank polytechnic, deputy chairman of the Noise Council
Dr. J. B. Ollerhead, head of Noise Research and Analysis, Civil Aviation Authority
Mr. G. A. Parry, principal noise consultant, Technica Indecon Limited
Dr. J. G. Walker, Institute of Sound and Vibration Research, Southampton University
Mr. A. V. L. Williams, British Steel Track Products

Each has been selected for his expertise in the field and not as a representative of any particular body or interest. I am most grateful to them for agreeing to serve. There will also be three members from the Department of Transport. I have asked the committee to report by the end of September. Its report will be published.

The committee will be pleased to receive views and evidence from interested parties. Submissions should be sent to the committee's secretary, Dr. P. M. Nelson of the transport and road research laboratory, Crowthorne, Berkshire, RG11 6AU.

Radioactive Material (Road Accident)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the accident between a vehicle carrying radioactive material and a local bus, in January, on the road between Annan and Dumfries.

SCOTLAND

Spirits (Metric Measures)

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will lengthen the period for the introduction of metrication on the dispensing of spirits in licensed premises to date later than 31 December; and if he will use that period to hold further consultations with affected parties.

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

I announced on 14 December that, having considered the responses to my Department's consultation paper, I had concluded that the present range of imperial quantities for serving gin, rum, vodka and whisky be phased out by 31 December 1994 in favour of one round metric quantity of 25 ml. I am considering further representations that I have received and will announce a decision as soon as possible.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 21 March 1990]: The information is as per the list.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide details of local authority revenues for Scottish regions derived from central Government sources, non-domestic rates, rates and or poll tax for the years 1980-81 to 1989-90 and estimates for 1990-91 on a money and percentage basis.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The figures are given in the table. Amounts for rate and revenue support grant are final amounts or those applying to the most recent order. Figures for non-domestic and domestic rates are derived from data published in "Rating Review" for the relevant years up to 1988-89. For 1989-90 and 1990-91 amounts of non-domestic rate income and community charge income are taken from the provisional outturn-budget estimate returns made by local authorities to the Scottish Office. Domestic rates figures are net of domestic rate relief. All figures of domestic rate and community charge income are inclusive of rebates.

Member for Gordon of 15 March, Official Report, column 342, if he will list the locations of (a) the three centres at which he is reviewing applications for the release of genetically manipulated organisms to the environment and (b) the eight centres where releases have already taken place.

Mr. Nicholls: The eight centres which have notified the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) of proposals to release genetically manipulated organisms to the environment and whose proposals have been reviewed by HSE are:

Natural Environment Research Council, Institute of Virology, Oxford.
Rothamsted Experimental Station, Harpenden.
Institute for Plant Science Research, Cambridge.
Scottish Crops Research Institute, Invergowrie and Pentlandfield
Shell Research Ltd, Sittingbourne.
ICI, Jealott's Hill, Berkshire.
British Fermentation Products Ltd./Gist Brocades, Felixtowe.
Nickerson International Seeds Co. Ltd. Cambridge.

For the three centres whose notifications are currently under review, it would be inappropriate to provide this information.

Youth Training Allowance

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce an increase in youth training allowance to help 18-year-olds who will be liable to pay the community charge.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 15 March, Official Report, column 340.

ENERGY

Chemical Spillages (North Sea)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what checks are carried out to test what chemicals may be disposed of or spilled from offshore oil and gas installations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The United Kingdom Government operate a notification scheme for the use of chemicals offshore. The object of the scheme is to prevent damage to the marine environment. Chemical manufacturers and suppliers provide data on all chemicals used offshore to the Department of Energy. Based on these data maximum permitted levels that can be discharged at any one installation in a year are given for each chemical.

Discussions are under way within the Paris commission for a mandatory scheme for the use and discharge of chemicals offshore as agreed at the recent North sea conference.

Tyres

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to encourage the use as a fuel of redundant tyres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We propose to create a special place for renewable sources of energy in the non-fossil fuel obligation after privatisation. Within this scheme, the opportunity will exist for redundant tyres to qualify as a non-fossil fuel source. I would like to see them used as a renewable source where such use would be economically viable and environmentally acceptable and, to this end the energy technology support unit at Harwell is planning to hold a small workshop, to be attended by representatives from the appropriate sectors of the industry, later this summer.

Action for Cities

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what was the cost of the action for cities anniversary event held at Wynward hall, Cleveland, on 28 February;

(2) what was the total cost of the action for cities anniversary events held nationwide.

Mr. David Hunt: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) on 7 March, column 629.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the proportion of (a) all pensioners, (b) male single pensioners, (c) female single pensioners, (d) pensioner couples, (e) newly retired single men, (f) newly retired single women, (g) newly retired couples who are in receipt of a state additional pension on the basis of the 1987 family expenditure survey; and for each group what is the mean and median amount received.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available in the form requested. The family expenditure survey does not identify the additional pension separately.

Fishermen (Unemployment Benefits)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on new regulations introduced by the Department of Social Security on 10 December 1989 relating to unemployment benefit payments; and if any research has been carried out into the impact of the benefits changes on fishermen now restricted in the number of days they can go to sea.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The new earnings levels for unemployment benefit apply equally to all claimants. We are aware of the concerns of the fishing industry and the Department is in contact with fishermen's representatives. We are monitoring the effects of the changes.

Nursing Care (Upkeep Costs)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the maximum savings limit allowed before a resident of (a) a residential home, (b) a residential nursing home and (c) a long-stay hospital is liable for a contribution towards his upkeep.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Whether a resident is liable to make any contribution towards his upkeep depends not only on his savings but on his income and on any fee charged. However, the first £3,000 of any savings of a resident are completely disregarded for benefit purposes.

Benefits (Capital Limits)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much will be deducted each week from income support, family credit, housing benefit and community charge benefit claimants with capital of £3,000 and at each £250 band up to the capital limit for the benefit as a result of his Department's assumptions as to the income derived from each level of capital.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We do not make particular assumptions on the level of income from capital but a notional income—that is, a tariff income—is calculated on capital above a certain level. However, no tariff income is calculated on the first £3,000. Any actual income earned by savings is fully disregarded.

The table shows the tariff income on capital over £3,000 up to the upper limit of £6,000 in income support and family credit (increasing to £8,000 from 9 April 1990) and to £8,000 in housing benefit and community charge benefit (increasing to £16,000 from 1 April 1990).

In income support the amount of tariff income is wholly deductible from a person's entitlement. However, it is not possible to state how much of any tariff income will be deducted from family credit, housing benefit or community charge benefit since this depends on the amount of other income available, the circumstances of each individual case including, where appropriate, the amount of eligible rent or community charge and the effect of the tapers. These tapers are applied to any income above the appropriate applicable amount and the resulting figure is offset against the maximum benefit payable. In family credit the taper is 70 per cent., in housing benefit it is 65 per cent. and in community charge benefit it is 15 per cent.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give for each of (a) income support, (b) family credit, (c) housing benefit and (d) community charge benefit (i) the additional number of people who will come into entitlement and (ii) the number of existing claimants who will receive additional benefit as a result of the increased capital limits; and if he will give the net cost for each benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No existing recipients of income support or family credit will receive additional benefit although a negligible number of existing housing benefit or community charge benefit recipients may gain.

The estimated figures for new beneficiaries are set out in the table:

	Individuals (thousands)	Benefit units (thousands)	Cost (£ million)
Income support	30	25	30
Housing benefit	75	50	55
Community charge benefit	195	130	35
The number of family credit gainers is small

Note:
The above figures include some people gaining more than one benefit. Taking account of the number of couples, the total number of individual gainers is estimated at around a quarter of a million.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, with regard to the announcement on 20 March about the increase in the capital limit for housing benefit and community charge benefit to £16,000 as of April 1990, he will state (a) what safeguards will be provided for claimants whose benefit does not immediately reflect the new capital limits, (b) what is his estimate of the increased cost to local authorities, (c) what additional resources are to be given to local authorities to help them (i) administer the change swiftly and (ii) cover the additional administrative costs, and (d) by what date he expects everyone to have received their full benefit, reflecting the new capital levels.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is as follows:

(a) Claims that are made before 27 May will be able to be backdated to 1 April. Benefit is awarded from the date the claim is made. Any delay in assessment does not therefore lead to loss of benefit;

(b) and (c) The Department is discussing with the local authority associations the administrative implications of these changes, and a decision on the amount of additional subsidy support to be provided to local authorities to meet their administrative costs will be made as soon as possible;

(d) Local authorities are responsible for ensuring that benefit, once claimed, is awarded within a reasonable time.

Community Charge Rebates

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that those community charge payers who discover they are entitled to rebates after they have paid their bills would be entitled to a refund.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Benefit is normally backdated only if the claimant can show good cause for failure to claim earlier. For community charge benefit purposes there are two exceptions. In England and Wales a claim for community charge benefit will be treated as though it had been made on 1 April as long as it is made not more than 56 days after 1 April 1990, or not more than 56 days after the date of issue of the first community charge demand notice if the notice is received after 1 April. This provision does not apply where the delay in issuing the demand notice arises because of a failure by the claimant to notify the community charge registration officer that he is liable for that charge.

In Great Britain, charge payers who become entitled as a result of the change in the capital limit announced in the Budget will be treated as having made their claim on 1 April 1990, if their claim is received by 27 May 1990.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on 15 March, Official Report, column 333, if he will publish in the Official Report the maximum net weekly incomes at which 50 per cent. of the maximum entitlement to community charge benefit will be paid for (a) a single person under 25, (b) a married couple with two children under 11, (c) a pensioner couple aged 60 to 74 and (d) a pensioner couple aged 75 to 79, assuming community charge levels per adult of (i) £250, (ii) £300, (iii) £328, (iv) £350, (v) £400 and (vi) £438.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is shown in the table.

Annual community charge	Single under 25	Couple two children under 11	Pensioner couple aged 60-74	Pensioner couple aged 75-79

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on 15 March, Official Report, column 333, if he will publish in the Official Report the maximum net weekly incomes at which the maximum entitlement to community charge benefit will be paid for (a) a single person under 25, (b) a married couple with two children under 11, (c) a pensioner couple aged 60 to 74 and (d) a pensioner couple aged 75 to 79, assuming community charge levels per adult of (i) £250, (ii) £300, (iii) £328, (iv) £350, (v) £400 and (vi) £438.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The maximum net weekly income at which maximum entitlement to community charge benefit is awarded does not vary for different community charge levels. The information requested is shown in the table.

Single person under 25	32·40
Couple with two children under 11	99·65
Pensioner couple aged 60-74	75·55

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) mothers and (b) families in receipt of child benefit pay income tax at the higher rate; and how many children they have who qualify for child benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 9 February 1990]: The latest available estimates for the United Kingdom suggest that about 0·6 million families, with about 1·1 million children, receive child benefit and pay income tax at the higher rate in 1989-90. Among these is an estimated 0·2 million mothers, with about 0·3 million children. These include wives who, under the present system for taxing married couples, are liable to a 40 per cent. marginal tax rate only when the husband's earnings are taken into account.

These estimates are based on information from the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes projected to 1989-90 and are provisional.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) mothers, (b) families and (c) children in families are in receipt of child benefit with annual incomes in the ranges: (i) up to £5,000, (ii) £5,001 to £7,500, (iii) £7,501 to £10,000, (iv) £10,001 to £15,500, (v) £15,001 to £20,000, (vi) £20,001 to £25,000, (vii) £25,001 to £30,000, (viii), £30,001 to £50,000 and (ix) over £50,000.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 9 February 1990]: In the great majority of families child benefit is paid to the mother. The small number of other recipients cannot be reliably estimated and it is not possible therefore to break the figures down below family units and numbers of children. Information about the incomes of families receiving child benefit is not routinely collected. The following estimates of the distribution of gross incomes of recipient families in 1989-90 are therefore made on the basis of sample survey data which are subject to normal sampling and response variation.

Band of Gross Income	Families Receiving Child Benefit (000s)	Number of Children (000s)
Under £5,000	430	490
£5,001 to £7,500	1,010	1,940
£7,501 to £10,000	730	1,390
£10,001 to £15,000	1,520	2,620
£15,001 to £20,000	1,380	2,520
£20,001 to £25,000	740	1,340
£25,001 to £30,000	410	710
£30,001 to £50,000	450	790
over £50,000	100	190
TOTAL	6,760	12,000

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) mothers, (b) families and (c) children in families would lose entitlement to child benefit as a result of having an income below the tax threshold if child benefit were abolished and replaced by a tax allowance.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 9 February 1990]: It is estimated that 1·6 million families with 2·9 million children in the United Kingdom in 1989-90 are non-taxpayers, and of these around 1·3 million with 2·3 million children receive income-related benefits with a further 0·2 million entitled but not claiming. There are estimated to be about a further 0·8 million families with 1·4 million children who would not be fully compensated through the tax system and around half of these are, or would be, entitled to income-related benefits.

These figures are based on information from the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes, projected to 1989-90, combined with the 1987 family expenditure survey. There is no reliable basis for any further division of the figures, but nearly all child benefit recipients are mothers.

Social Security Commissioners

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the reasons for the delay in the social security commissioners working on cases submitted in July, 1989.

The Attorney-General: I have been asked to reply.

The last-minute surge of appeals under the pre-April 1988 benefits legislation took some time to work its way through the appeal system and caused a bottleneck at the Office of the Social Security Commissioners (OSSC) in 1989. This and the general increase in work load in 1989, combined with staff recruitment and retention difficulties, resulted in continuing delays at OSSC. In addition, an increasing proportion of appeals to the commissioners have become more complex and take longer to determine individually.

In view of the continuing delays, the Lord Chancellor's Department's manpower auditors are currently looking at the organisation and staffing levels of OSSC to see whether further steps can be taken to improve efficiency and reduce the delays.

The commissioners have powers to expedite hearings in exceptional circumstances. Appellants may seek expedition by applying to OSSC.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

No-fault Compensation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on no-fault compensation.

The Attorney-General: As previously announced, an inter-departmental working party is examining the feasibility of a no-fault compensation scheme, restricted to less serious road accidents and financed by private insurance. I understand that the working party is making good progress and it now expects to report to the Lord Chancellor by early next year.

Regional Functions

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Attorney-General what functions the Lord Chancellor's Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of the Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine the Department's regions.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor is responsible for providing the administration of the Supreme Court, which consists of the Court of Appeal, the High Court and the Crown court, and of the county courts. The Crown court sits at nearly 100 locations and there are some 275 county courts. Administrative control is exercised through circuit-based administrative staff headed by a circuit administrator and a number of courts administrators in each of six circuits in England and Wales. These circuits are the Midland and Oxford (with its headquarters in Birmingham), the North Eastern (Leeds), the Northern (Manchester), the South Eastern (London), the Wales and Chester (Cardiff) and the Western (Bristol). There are also 11 district probate registries and 18 probate sub-registries, which together with the principal registry in London are administered by the administrator of the Royal Courts of Justice.

The majority of the Department's staff work in the courts on the circuits. The distribution as at 1 January 1990 is as follows (the figure in brackets represents the number of staff in the circuit and courts administrators offices):

	Number	(Number)
Midland and Oxford	890·5	(60·5)
North Eastern	1,130·5	(42·0)
Northern	1,134·0	(47·5)
South Eastern	2,700·5	(101·5)
Wales and Chester	611·5	(31·0)
Western	890·5	(44·5)
Other court service staff[1]	1,419·0	—

[1] Including RCJ/PRFD.

These staff are employed in a full range of grades which include support grades and administrative and executive grades up to circuit administators at grades 3 and 4 level.

Of the 1989-90 provision for running costs, the six circuits are directly responsible for half the Department's expenditure:

	Per cent.
Midland and Oxford	8·5
North Eastern	6·0
Northern	6·3
South Eastern	17·6
Wales and Chester	3·5
Western	5·1
Other court service	9·6

In addition, the majority of expenditure on accommodation (27·8 per cent. of the total) and a proportion of the budget for headquarters and associated offices (15·2 per cent.) is controlled centrally on behalf of the court service.

The court circuit boundaries date from 1972 when the Courts Act 1971 established a unified court service. The circuits cover the counties of England and Wales as follows:

Midland and Oxford circuit
Cambridgeshire (the part formerly Huntingdon and Peterborough), part of Derbyshire, Hereford and Worcester, Humberside (the part formerly in Lincolnshire), Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Warwickshire, West Midlands.

North Eastern circuit
Cleveland, Durham, Humberside (excluding the part formerly in Lincolnshire), part of North Yorkshire, Northumberland, South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear, West Yorkshire.

Northern circuit
Cumbria, part of Derbyshire, Lancashire, part of North Yorkshire, Greater Manchester, Merseyside.

South Eastern circuit
Bedfordshire, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Cambridgeshire (except that part formerly Huntingdon and Peterborough), East Sussex, Essex Greater London, Hertfordshire, Kent, Norfolk, Suffolk, Surrey, West Sussex.

Wales and Chester circuit
Cheshire, Clwyd, Dyfed, Gwent, Gwynedd, Mid-Glamorgan, Powys, South Glamorgan, West Glamorgan.

Western circuit
Avon, Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Gloucestershire, Hampshire, Somerset, Isle of Wight, Wiltshire.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Privatisation (Eastern Europe)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has offered any assistance to the Czechoslovakian Government in producing their privatisation programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 21 March that the know-how fund will be extended to Czechoslovakia. Among the first activities will be a visit to explore particular Czechoslovak needs in the promotion of free markets and privatisation.

Cambodia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will support efforts to ensure the Cambodians in the Thailand border camps come under the supervision of the United Nations.

Mr. Sainsbury: Camps for displaced persons along the Thai-Cambodian border are administered by the Cambodian resistance factions themselves. But the United Nations has contributed to humanitarian assistance in the camps for a number of years. The creation of neutral sites under direct United Nations administration may be necessary as part of a comprehensive political settlement leading to free and fair elections in Cambodia.

Eastern Europe

Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on (a) policy towards the recent events in eastern Europe and (b) his latest assessment of the consequences of a unified Germany.

Mr. Waldegrave: We warmly welcome the rapid progress towards democracy in eastern Europe, which will lead to greater prosperity and freedom for all. The elections in the GDR last weekend showed clearly the desire of the people for unity with the FRG and fundamental political and economic change. We look forward to the elections in Hungary this weekend, and to others in the coming months.

We shall be working hard for a successful outcome to the discussions on external aspects of German unification and are confident that a united Germany will be a welcome and influential force for strengthening democracy and prosperity in Europe.

Daphne Parish

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the location of the prison in Iraq where Daphne Parish is being held; and whether she has been allowed to see any member of the British consular staff since her conviction and sentence were announced.

Mr. Waldegrave: Mrs. Parish was visited by the British consul general in Baghdad on 15 March. She was well, but was naturally distressed to hear of Mr. Bazoft's execution. At that time Mrs. Parish was being held at Abu Ghraib prison. She has now been moved to a women's prison on the outskirts of Baghdad.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has regarding Iraq's nuclear capability.

Mr. Waldegrave: Iraq is a party to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and, as such, is obliged to declare all nuclear facilities to the International Atomic Energy Agency. One facility, a research centre at Tuwaitha, has been so declared.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Religious Broadcasting

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representation he has received from the shadow Radio Authority about the interpretation of the restrictions on broadcasting religious matters in the Broadcasting Bill known as the "no undue prominence" and "no editorialising" provisions, as they will apply to the ownership of licences by religious groups; and if he proposes to issue any guidance about how the Radio Authority intends to interpret these provisions.

Mr. Mellor: The Broadcasting Bill contains no prohibitions on ownership of radio stations by religious bodies. We are currently discussing with the regulatory bodies the programme content provisons in the Bill which are relevant to religious broadcasting. Application of such provisions will be a matter for them; but our discussions include the question of whether it would be helpful to issue guidance on the effect of these provisions.

Protection of Animals

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take to provide disincentives to those who torture or abuse wild animals not covered by the terms of the Protection of Animals Act 1911.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to his question on 19 March at column 458.

Police Inspectorate

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary on its inspections of police forces.

Mr. Waddington: Yes. I shall from today publish the reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary on police forces inspected annually under the Police Act 1964, that is the 42 provincial forces including the City of London police; and also those which the inspectorate makes on the Metropolitan police at the invitation of the Commissioner. The first three reports, published today, are of the 1989 inspections of police forces in Norfolk, South Wales and Staffordshire. Copies of these reports, and of a booklet about Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, have been placed in the Library.

I have decided to publish these reports so as to increase public awareness of the significance of the inspectorate's role and functions; to draw police achievements and good practice to wider attention; to identify more publicly the scope for improvements and help accelerate the process of improving value for money in the police service; and to respond to public and parliamentary interest in the police.

Immigration

Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to make changes in the immigration rules.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has today laid before Parliament a statement of changes in the immigration rules. The main changes are the introduction of a visa requirement for nationals of Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia; changes in the arrangements for Commonwealth citizens with grandparents born in the United Kingdom so that they will qualify for settlement after four years' residence rather than on arrival; and an increase in the minimum sum or income which persons must invest or have at their disposal to qualify as a business man or person of independent means. These changes are consolidated in a new statement of the immigration rules. The new visa requirements will come into effect on 1 April 1990, the other changes on 1 May 1990. A statement listing and explaining all the changes is available in the Vote Office.

Vulnerable Prisoner Units

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the number of vulnerable prisoner units.

Mr. Mellor: An additional unit planned at Wayland prison will hold 96 prisoners and is expected to be in operation in June. The unit at Channings Wood prison is being extended to double its capacity to 112. The extension is due to be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will (a) list the national and regional vulnerable prisoner units and (b) state their current capacity and occupancy levels.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

Prison	Capacity	Occupancy at 16 March 1990
National VPUs
Channings Wood	56	56
Maidstone	102	102
Wakefield	19	17
Regional VPUs
Albany	149	147
Bristol	62	61
Dartmoor	151	149
Gartree	15	15
Rochester	67	67
Stafford	46	46

In addition, a wing of Littlehey prison, not referred to as a vulnerable prisoner unit, houses prisoners formerly segregated under rule 43. Capacity is 112 and occupancy at 16 March 1990 was 112.

Lay Visitors, Southwark

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take with respect to concerns expressed in the Southwark lay visitors panel's annual report.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As with all annual reports from lay visitors' panels, the issues which have been raised by the Southwark panel's annual report have been carefully considered in consultation with the community involvement branch and local officers from the Metropolitan police. Detailed responses have been sent direct to the panel about the reports and points which have been raised.

Drugs

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available of police work directed at drug enforcement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are more than 1,500 police officers throughout the country with a major commitment to drugs work. In addition, many other officers contribute to the prevention and investigation of drug-related offences in the course of their duties. Reliable estimates of the cost of this work are not therefore available.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available of the probation service's work with offenders with problems of drug abuse.

Mr. John Patten: The information available to the Home Office about the cost of probation service activities does not make it possible to identify separately the cost of the probation service's work with offenders who have problems of drug abuse, but this is a duty which is regarded as a priority.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost in the latest year for which figures are available of treatment facilities provided in prisons for offenders with problems of drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: Monitoring of the expenditure, including medical expenditure, of the prison service is insufficiently detailed to enable costs on specific activities such as helping drug misusers to be separately identified.

Police Consultative Groups

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide the funds for police consultative groups in London to meet on a London-wide basis to discuss policing matters.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The emphasis within the formal consultation process provided under section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 is on flexible local arrangements which cater for the varying needs of each individual local community. It would not be appropriate for the Home Office to fund a body which is not an essential part of these arrangements.

Racism and Xenophobia

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has received to his Department's memorandum COM (88) 318 Final submitted to the European Community; whether consideration of it has been concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The draft European Community resolution on the fight against racism and xenophobia has yet to be considered by the Council of Ministers. The Government's position is unchanged from that set out in the explanatory memorandum to Parliament and has been reflected in negotiations at official level on this subject.

Prison Population

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is prepared exceptionally to release all sentenced prison inmates serving sentences of six months or less with a view to bringing the total population in prison service establishments in England and Wales within their total certified normal accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. The power of executive release is one we have always kept in reserve, for use only in the last resort.

We have already taken a number of initiatives to reduce the prison population, both diverting people from custody and greatly expanding the prison building programme. These measures are now taking effect.

Payphones in Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on extending payphones in prisons in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We believe that the use of cardphones by inmates is an important way of sustaining relationships with family and friends during the time in custody and can help inmates to prepare for release.

Following the successful introduction of cardphones in open establishments and the current programme of installation at category C and equivalent female and young offender establishments, a pilot scheme to give unconvicted inmates access to cardphones, subject to certain safeguards, will start shortly at Her Majesty's prison Manchester. We hope that, if the trial is successful, cardphones can be extended for the use of unconvicted inmates in all other local prisons and remand centres. There are no plans at present to instal cardphones for the use of category B or category A inmates.

Rule 43

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what review his Department is conducting of the existing policy on rule 43 inmates in prisons in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: A review was completed last year. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on 31 October 1989 at column 116.

Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for the latest date available, how many prisoners in England and Wales serving (a) less than three years, (b) three to four years, (c) four to five years, (d) five to 10 years and (e) more than 10 years but less than life were (i) white or (ii) from an ethnic minority;

(2) for the latest date available, what was the male and female sentenced prisoner population in England and Wales; and how many emanated from an ethnic minority.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 8 March 1990]: The latest available information is given in the table.

Electronic Monitoring

Sir Charles Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defendants have been subjected to electronic monitoring at each of the three magistrates courts where experiments have taken place; how many have offended while on bail; how many have otherwise breached the conditions of bail; and how many have subsequently been remanded in custody.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 13 March 1990]: The information requested is given in the table. Electronic monitoring is a very precise and accurate method of detecting automatically even minor breaches of the relevant bail conditions, compared to conventional methods. Some defendants commit offences or otherwise breach bail conditions whatever conditions may be imposed on them by the courts. For example 40 per cent. of male defendants refused bail and remanded in custody in January 1989 had previously committed offences on bail or otherwise breached bail conditions.

Defendants monitored during trials as at March 1990.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is supplied by financial years. The total estimated publicity budget for my Department for 1989-90 is £2·5 million. Comparable figures for the year 1979-80 are not available on an identical basis due to changes in the way the figures are recorded. The spend for 1979-80 was £256,000. This figure, however, includes recruitment and other types of advertising as well as promotional publicity. It would be possible to distinguish between the two only at disproportionate cost.

No privatisations took place in the Department in the years 1979 and 1989.

Sulphadimidine

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the review of medicines containing the active ingredient sulphadimidine has yet taken place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The review of existing veterinary medicinal products containing sulphadimidine as an active ingredient is under way and those products that meet modern standards of safety, quality and efficacy qualify for reviewed product licences.

GATT

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the final position paper on agriculture prepared by the European Economic Community for the Uruguay round of general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiations in Geneva;

(2) what offers have been made by the European Economic Community to the Uruguay round negotiation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade for substantial and progressive reductions in agricultural support; how those offers would affect the scope and level of agricultural trade between the United Kingdom and Canada, Australia and New Zealand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I am arranging for a copy of the Community's comprehensive position paper on agriculture, submitted for the GATT negotiations in December 1989, to be placed in the Library of the House.

The Government are working actively with our Community partners to develop this position and to carry the negotiations forward on this basis.

A successful outcome to the negotiations will bring benefits to agricultural trade worldwide.

Dressed Poultry

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will seek a derogation under the new European Economic Community poultry health regulations to allow the continued processing and marketing of New York dressed poultry;

(2) what information he has about derogations under European Economic Community poultry health regulations for the continued use of the effilé, roped, method of dressing poultry in Italy and France.

Mr. Gummer: The EC Commission's proposals to the Council for a new regulation on poultrymeat hygiene make provision for member states to continue to authorise the marketing of partially eviscerated (effilé) poultry. At our insistence, the Commission has suggested, although only tentatively, that this authority should extend to the marketing of uneviscerated (New York dressed) birds.

There are no grounds for discriminating between the two forms of production and we shall resist firmly any attempt to prevent us authorising the marketing of uneviscerated birds under conditions consistent with public safety.

Food Products (Labelling)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce quantitative labelling of characterising ingredients in food products for human consumption.

Mr. Gummer: The European Commission is committed to making proposals requiring quantitative declaration of the major characterising ingredients of foodstuffs as part of its single market programme. The United Kingdom has been pressing the Commission to bring forward proposals and they are expected to be tabled formally within the next few months.

Genetically Engineered Yeast

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the method of announcement chosen by his Department to inform the public about the introduction of genetically engineered yeast.

Mr. Maclean: The announcement of the clearance given to this product was made by means of a news release circulated to the national, regional and specialist media and the simultaneous issue of the independent scientific advice on which the decision was based to some 240 organisations which might have a special interest in the subject.

Pet Food

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what controls exist over the safety and contents of pet food; what steps he takes to ensure dogmeat is not included in dog food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The safety of pet foods is required by sections 73 and 73A of the Agriculture Act 1970. Controls on the contents are contained in the Feedingstuffs Regulations 1988 (as amended). These controls require the ingredients used to be declared either individually or according to specific categories. Enforcement of the regulations has produced no reason to believe that dogmeat has been used as an ingredient. Indeed, my information is that pet food manufacturers maintain strict quality controls and that the meat they use is from food animals passed as fit for human consumption.

Shellfish

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish figures showing the quantity of nephrops used to produce scampi landed or imported into the United Kingdom over the last five years; and whether he is able to estimate what landings can be anticipated for the rest of the year.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 19 March 1990]: We do not collect the figures requested.

However a proportion of landings and imports of nephrops into the United Kingdom is used to produce scampi. In particular, nephrops landed as tails, as opposed to landed whole, are mostly used to produce scampi. It is too early in the year to estimate landings and imports for 1990 but figures for the last five years are as follows:

Tonnes

	Landings (whole weight equivalent)
	Total	Of which tails (estimate)	[1] Imports
1985	24,858	n.a.	90
1986	25,607	(16,110)	47
1987	24,424	(12,765)	217
1988	27,513	(16,314)	351
[2]1989	27,031	(15,417)	415

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 169

SESSION 1989–90

12th March—23rd March 1990

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
